Mr. Chairman, this intention of offering it to the Government was abandoned certainly, because Mr. Monroe, before he left France, again disposed of it without consulting his Government. He sold it for a price beyond the original purchase money, with its interest and repairs superadded. He made the contract of purchase, as also that of sale, without consultation with his Government; and, besides all, if further proof were necessary, he put the money (fifty thousand livres) paid to him on account of the sale, into his private funds, and applied it to his private purposes.

It is true a loss was afterwards sustained, in the failure to recover the balance of the purchase money from his vendee, in consequence, as it was alleged, of a defect in the title. Sir, it was not the error of this Government, that Mr. Monroe purchased a defective title, and its evil consequences ought not, therefore, to fall upon it, notwithstanding the intention manifested in the purchase, when all intention to apply it to national purposes was afterwards abandoned. It would, indeed, produce a singular state of affairs, that any foreign minister should be at liberty to purchase property, and make his Government responsible only when a loss is sustained. To what extent such a privilege might be abused, it is needless to say: one result would follow, generally; the Government would certainly have all the losses to sustain, without a corresponding chance for the gains of the speculation.

I consider, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that in this transaction there was no manner of benefit derived to the United States. That this Government was in nowise consulted with regard to that measure, and had given no instructions concerning it; and, as it could not under the circumstances be a gainer, so it should not be made the loser, and particularly because Mr. Monroe, with whatever intention or design he may have made the purchase originally, beyond a doubt in this respect changed his mind, finally considering it as a part of his private estate, and as such disposed of it.

The second item of the claim is founded upon certain gratuities or donations to the people of Paris, as also for advancements made to citizens of America then in France, and who in their distress made appeals to his generosity. Mr. Chairman, doubtless this strikes you, as I think it must every other member of this committee, as being, at least, a very novel claim. I am persuaded there is no one here willing to urge it as a debt which the Government, upon any acknowledged principles, is bound to discharge. Then I would inquire of the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. MENCHEN,] who have made it a part of their report, to show under what obligation the United States can possibly be to assume the payment of this claim.

True, it is in itself not very large, and by some, therefore, may be considered as unimportant; but still the question recurs, upon what principles is the claim to be sustained? Sir, I will not consider whether the objects of this charity were meritorious or otherwise; perhaps, if I were so disposed, the means for examination would be wanting. But, taking it as conceded that Mr. Monroe was in this respect truly benevolent and charitable, and I do not doubt but he was, I would inquire whether, in so doing, he looked for any other reward than that reward which he doubtless received and yet enjoys. Sir, when your minister is disposed to become the dispenser of alms, he acts without the pale of his ministerial functions. It forms no part of his public duty. He may, perhaps, imagine that such conduct may exert a beneficial influence upon the interests of his country, yet, as he is not despatched for the purpose of distributing his charities, the Government therefore cannot be made responsible.

I wish not to detract from the course thus pursued by Mr. Monroe; he was a benevolent man, and such conduct is worthy of imitation; but as these acts of his generosity were individual in their character, as the donations emanated solely from the purity and excellence of his heart, I feel persuaded, in our legislative character, we ought not, as I am convinced in reality we cannot add to his reward.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is a delicate subject, and I pass, without saying any thing more, to a more important item of this claim—an item which, exclusive of interest, is put down at $25,000: I allude to the compensation for loans negotiated by Mr. Monroe during the last war, whilst officiating as Secretary of War. Sir, it was truly said by an honorable gentleman from North Carolina, during this debate, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that for many years past the financial situation of this country has been unembarrassed, and perfectly adequate to all its engagements; and hence it appears to me not a little remarkable that this item, important in all its aspects, has not been presented before.

I have not taken the trouble to examine minutely into the accounts heretofore settled with Mr. Monroe, nor have I searched for any other evidence than that furnished by the two very respectable and intelligent committees to whom these subjects have been referred. From the reports, however, upon your table, I perceive that Mr. Monroe was Secretary of State from the 1st April, 1811, to the 30th September, 1814, three years and six months, at $5,000 per annum, during which he received from the public treasury the sum of $17,500; that he was Secretary of War from October 1, 1814, to February 28, 1815, five months, at $4,500 per annum, and received for salary $1,875; and that he was again Secretary of State from 1st March, 1815, to 3d March, 1817, two years and three days, at a salary of 5,000 dollars per annum, and received $10,041 65, a sum altogether amounting, by way of salary, to $29,416 65 for a period of five years eleven months and three days' service.

It is manifest, therefore, that Mr. Monroe, for the period when these loans were negotiated, received his legal compensation by way of salary. The service in question was rendered within the period I have mentioned. He has, therefore, received the legal compensation for his services, the amount affixed by law, and for which he undertook the service with all its burdens. The duty having thus been performed, and the salary received, on the part of the Government, then, the contract was terminated. Does it not follow, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the claim now under consideration is a demand for an extra compensation? In plain terms, you are asked to make an extra allowance for services performed, to compensate which there was a fixed salary, amply sufficient for all the labor bestowed. I say, sir, ample, because I am yet to hear that it is considered otherwise.

I should not, Mr. Chairman, be doing justice to this old and faithful servant of the republic, if I did not concede he rendered eminent services for his country. His history is our history; but while speaking of these services, what more to his praise can be said, than that he discharged the duties of the varied situations which he filled with fidelity? Sir, can you bestow a higher eulogium upon any man, than to say he retired from every public situation which he held, taking with him an irreproachable fame, together with the approbation of his country? Sir, I grant he rendered important services, and discharged his duty faithfully; but, for so doing, I do not consider that the Government is under any obligation to make him an extra allowance. If it be, then every other officer of the Government, whether he be found in the navy or the army, or upon your civil list, who has rendered faithful service, is also entitled.

H. or R.]

That there are such, you, Mr. Chairman, will allow: a list of such could soon be made out. Sir, upon that principle, in the very number of witnesses who, on this occasion, have testified to the services performed by the ex-President, without going further, you would find objects for your bounty. Men, it is true, who performed an humbler, but at the same time not the less necessary task, but who are on this as on every similar occasion, too frequently overlooked or forgotten in the honors and triumph which await only the few.

Now, I appeal to the good sense of all who hear me, whether a precedent such as we are asked on this occasion to constitute, is consistent with a sound policy. In effect it would be holding out salaries to men as inducements merely to accept a trust, and then to pay them besides for doing their duty. There is no obligation upon any one to undertake these responsibilities; but, when he does so, he is under a moral as well as legal obligation to discharge the duties thereof with fidelity. Such were the responsibilities in the present instance. For this duty he has been paid, and, I think, well paid. He has received all to which he was entitled by the contract. I cannot perceive, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States is under a legal or a moral obligation to pay any more. There is, in fact, no indebtedness established, which alone could bind us.

I have thus endeavored to show that, upon principles of legal liability, the Government owes Mr. Monroe nothing; and it becomes me now to consider whether we can with propriety liquidate this claim upon any other ground. As a donation, nothing is desired: Mr. Monroe asks "for nothing which is not strictly due on sound principles, and which his country shall, on full consideration and unquestionable evidence, think that it owes it to itself to allow him." Nevertheless, as an individual, I have every disposition to favor the application; but, in doing so, I very much doubt my authority to do it by any means not my own. Sir, I am at a loss to discover that we have the right to be generous at the expense of others. If I were asked the question, upon what principle the gratuity was to be made, I should not be enabled to answer; I speak with reference to the duties we are delegated to perform.

I am acquainted with no principle consistent with our duties as legislators, that will authorize the members of this House to lay their hands upon the public treasury for purposes of this kind. It is, indeed, no part of the business, to transact which we are delegated. But, sir, aside from these considerations, I ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether, in paying this very large sum of money, we should be doing justice. Are there not others whose claims are equally pressing, and who have not been so well provided for as Mr. Monroe? Are there not other men who also fought and bled for their country? Men who spent their youth and fortune and strength in her cause? Let me ask, have you paid these men the debt you owe them? Have you paid your revolutionary army? Sir, these men, the patriots of other days, have not yet been paid; this debt of honor, of gratitude, and of contract, still remains open against you. How often is it that the venerable patriot of the revolution is seen lingering about your doors; and how often is he turned away, with regret I say it, not with his honest dues in his pocket, but with a heavy heart, to reflect upon his services, and the injustice and ingratitude of his country, to live in penury, and die a beggar.

But admitting, Mr. Chairman, that you are obliged to pay this claim, I am at a total loss to conceive upon what ground interest is to be allowed also. Certainly not one of the gentlemen has condescended to show us upon what principle this is to be effected. Interest, it is true, usually follows a debt, and is given by way of damages for its detention. But, Mr. Chairman, there can be no debt outstanding, where all has been proved paid according to agreement. It is true, also, that when a payment is withheld illegally or unjustly, interest should follow by way of recompense. But gentlemen fail in the outset of their argument; the foundation is not laid, and you cannot add the superstructure. They must establish an indebtedness first, before they can set up a claim for interest; but in their attempts at this they have entirely failed.

I pass, however, Mr. Chairman, to another, and perhaps the most important view of this subject. You know, sir, that, in the year 1826, Mr. Monroe made an application similar in many respects to the present, consisting of various items, some of which are again to be found in the demand before us, and amounted to the sum of $23,570. A very able committee was appointed, who made a report, making some reduction in the amount, but still allowing for all the items of that claim, save one. I think they reported as being due to Mr. Monroe the sum of $15,533 35, together with interest from 3d December, 1810. It may not be necessary that I should here state the progress of that bill to its final passage. Suffice it to say, that to the amount thus reported was superadded the interest for a period of fifteen years, thereby swelling the sum reported as being due by the committee to $29,513.

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, a greater sum was finally allowed than the principal of Mr. Monroe's claim at that day amounted to. This doubtless was done from a disposition alike honorable to Congress as it was generous towards Mr. Monroe. In doing so, however, Congress deemed it proper to impose terms; and, with a desire that this committee may fairly comprehend me, I ask you, sir, that the act of Congress passed in the year 1826 for the relief of Mr. Monroe be read.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be paid to James Monroe, out of any unappropriated moneys in the treasury, the sum of twenty-nine thousand five hundred and thirteen dollars, in full of all demands whatever against the United States."

Mr. HIRIE resumed. Now, Mr. Chairman, I cannot perceive upon what principle we can again be called upon to legislate on this subject, without violating our own deliberate act. The money was voted, and it was received, and, in the spirit and very letter of the law, was intended as a final adjustment of all Mr. Monroe's demands. Sir, in a court of justice, the Government might, if disposed, plead a former recovery with some propriety; at any rate, upon whatever principle you may desire to place it, the plain rule of ordinary life should hold, that a debt or a claim, or by whatever name you may please to call it, being once settled and paid, should be permitted to rest. It is not equitable that the Government should again and again be called upon to account, particularly after a final adjustment, to the terms of which the parties interested have acceded.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus briefly passed through this subject. I feel it my duty to give my vote against this application, in whatever form it may present itself; a duty, sir, by no means in accordance with my wishes. Sir, I would I could conscientiously give my voice in favor of the venerable patriot whose life and reputation I have always been taught to esteem; I should deem it a pleasure, which I hope ever to enjoy, in contributing my feeble efforts to the benefit of those who sustained this republic in the hour of her need. But I cannot permit my inclinations to sway my judgment; I cannot consent to give to one, and withhold from another; I wish my country to be just before she is generous.

Mr. MERCER rose, and, in a speech of some length, replied to the arguments of those gentlemen who had opposed the bill. In conclusion, he handed to the chair the following, which, he said, if the motion now before the House should not succeed, he should offer as an amendment to the bill:

"That the proper accounting officers of the treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to adjust and settle the accounts and claims of James Monroe, late President of the United States, on principles of equity and justice, subject to the revision and final decision of the President of the United States.

"And be it further enacted, That so soon as it shall have been ascertained and determined, in manner aforesaid, that any sum of money is due to the said James Monroe, such sum shall be paid him out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The proposed amendment was read by the Clerk; when the question was put on striking out the enacting clause, (to destroy the bill,) and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 67.

The committee then rose, and reported progress.

On motion of Mr. ALSTON, it was ordered that when the House adjourns, it do adjourn to Monday next—66 to 57.

And then the House adjourned to Monday next.

MONDAY, JANUARY 17.

THE IMPEACHMENT.

After the reading of the journal of Tuesday, Mr. HAYNES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That, during the argument of counsel in the impeachment now pending in the Senate against James H. Peck, district judge of Missouri, this House will, from day to day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and attend the same; and that the Clerk acquaint the Senate therewith.

Mr. HAYNES said that it was understood that, upon the opening of the high court of impeachment to-day, the arguments of counsel would commence. He thought it the duty of the House to attend during the arguments; and with that view he had submitted the resolution.

Mr. WHITTLESEY suggested the propriety of amending the resolution, by adding to it the following words: "and that the hour of meeting of the House shall be 11 o'clock after this day."

Mr. HAYNES accepted the amendment as a modification of his resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved so to amend the resolution as that the House should attend for this day only.

This motion was determined in the negative.

Mr. PETTIS called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; but the House refused to order them.

The question being then put on its adoption, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 74.

FUEL FOR THE POOR OF THE CITY.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, said he rose for the purpose of asking the consent of the House to suspend the rule, to enable him to present for instant consideration a resolution which would lose half its efficacy by a few hours' postponement. The object of it was to give out of the surplus wood now rotting in the yard, forty cords for the immediate relief of the suffering poor of the city, some of whom might be seen from the windows of the capitol, burning their garden fences to sustain them against an unparalleled snow storm. Mr. D. then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-arms of this House inform the guardians of the poor of this city that they have leave to take from the surplus wood in the yard attached to this House — cords of wood, if so much be necessary, for immediate distribution among the suffering poor of the city.

The resolution having been read, Mr. CARSON moved to suspend the rule, so as that the House should now consider the resolution.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on this motion; but the House refused to order them.

The question being put on the suspension of the rule, it was decided in the affirmative—110 to 49.

The Clerk then read a letter which the Speaker had received this morning from George Watterston, Esq. on the subject, in which he stated several cases of suffering which had occurred in the city, and the great necessity there was for Congress to take into their consideration the expediency of appropriating some of the surplus wood in the capitol yard for the relief of the suffering poor.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, moved to fill the blank in the resolution with the word forty, and it was determined in the affirmative.

The question then recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, opposed it. He said that Congress had no right to give away the public money for such purposes. If it were proposed to get up a subscription for supplying the poor of the city with wood, he would cheerfully subscribe his share, and would freely exert himself to procure fifty cords, if necessary. He had always voted against similar propositions—and he did it on principle. He referred to several acts of legislation, by which the public money had been voted away for private purposes, and said that it had been asserted that those who had voted against such appropriations had been condemned; but those who had taken it upon themselves thus to condemn, had never looked upon the matter in a proper light. He again stated that he should be willing to unite with gentlemen in raising fifty or even seventy cords of wood for the poor of the city, by subscription; but he could not consent to an appropriation of the public money for the purpose.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he was persuaded that the House was prepared to vote on the proposition before it; and, as he considered it useless to consume time in debating the resolution, he should demand the previous question.

The House having sustained the demand, the question occurred, "Shall the main question be now put?" and it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. TUCKER called for the yeas and nays on the question of adoption, and they were ordered by the House.

[Here a message was received from the Senate, acquainting the House that that body was now sitting as a high court of impeachment for the trial of Judge James H. Peck.]

Mr. POLK asked if the House should not now, in pursuance of the resolution adopted this morning, proceed to the Senate. That body was probably waiting for the attendance of the House.

The SPEAKER replied, the House must determine for itself as to what course it would at this time pursue.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, hoped the question would be taken on the adoption of the resolution now before it, before proceeding to the Senate chamber.

Mr. RAMSEY inquired if it were not proper for the House, after the message just received, now to proceed to the Senate chamber.

The SPEAKER said that question must be left with the House to decide.

Mr. POLK then moved to lay the resolution on the table; the motion was decided in the negative, without a count.

The question was then put on agreeing to the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate. At 4 o'clock the committee returned, and reported progress; and then

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18.

RELIEF VESSELS.

The bill from the Senate, to enable the President to employ relief vessels on our maritime coast, was twice read.

Mr. CONDUCT moved its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DRAYTON moved its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, if the bill was to be acted upon at all, it was of the utmost importance it should be done speedily. He stated the object of the bill, and urged its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that it might be called up, and receive the early consideration of the House.

The latter motion prevailed.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of this hall be granted to John Foulke, a member of the Society of Friends, at 7 o'clock this evening, for the purpose of delivering a religious discourse.

A motion was made to lay the resolution on the table; which was negatived.

Mr. MERCER then offered the following amendment; which was agreed to: "And that the Colonization Society, also, have leave to occupy this hall to-morrow evening at 6 o'clock."

The question was then put on adopting the resolution as amended, and carried in the affirmative.

ORDER OF DEBATE.

Just before the hour of twelve, at which the House was to proceed to attend the sitting of the high court of impeachment,

Mr. MARTIN said he would not, at this hour, when the House was so pressed for time, throw himself upon the attention of the House, were it not in a matter in regard to which he felt himself placed in a very delicate situation. It was known to the House, he said, that, in consequence of the indisposition of the Speaker, the duties of the Chair had of late been temporarily assigned, occasionally, for parts of several days past, to him, [Mr. M.] In what manner he had discharged those duties, Mr. M. said it was not for him to decide, but he could safely say that he had brought to their discharge his best abilities, and the most earnest disposition to preserve the order of the House. It was known, further, he said, that on Thursday last a debate took place of an unusual character, (alluding to the debate on the mission to Russia.) There was certainly displayed on that occasion more personal feeling than he could have wished; but, with the most sincere desire to preserve decorum in debate, nothing had reached his ear which seemed to him to call for the interposition of the Chair. Something might have fallen from members which did not reach his ear, and which was offensive and unparliamentary. Difficulty of hearing, from the low tones of some speakers, or the rapidity of utterance of others, sometimes makes it doubtful what is the precise language in which they express themselves.

Mr. M. said he felt the full force of these difficulties when in the chair, on Friday last. But so far as he was able to understand what was uttered in debate, there was only one occurrence, on that day, which appeared to him to call for the interposition of the Chair. The gentleman from New York, referring to the gentleman who had moved the pending amendment, charged him with having made "a disgraceful motion," which language the Chair promptly checked, and declared to be out of order. Yet, looking over the report of that debate in this morning's paper, it was due to himself, to the House, and to the good opinion of the nation, to say, that words appear in that report which were not uttered in the debate, to his hearing. He would not detain the attention of the House by going over all the terms of it which appeared to him exceptionable, but he could not, consistently with a sense of duty, sit down without particularizing one expression reported as having been used by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] in the following passage of his speech:

"I shall not, Mr. Speaker, travel out of my way, and violate a rule of order, by entering now into that discussion, by examining the provisions of the Turkish treaty. Whenever I do, sir, my facts and my arguments shall be founded on something more substantial than a newspaper rumor—more unquestionable than the statement of an unprincipled partisan—more unimpeachable than the evidence of a perjured Senator."

Now, Mr. M. said he should have been guilty of the grossest and most flagitious misconduct, as presiding officer, if, hearing such language applied to a member of the other House, he had not interposed to arrest it. With this paper before it, this House could not refuse to receive a committee from the Senate to demand an inquiry into the alleged perjury. He did not say that such language as this had been actually used; but if it had been heard by him, it would have been an insult to the House not to have stopped the utterer of it. He took it for granted that the reporter of the debate had labored under great misapprehension: but, seeing that it had got into print in this exceptionable form, he had thought it proper to offer this explanation of his own conduct in the premises.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then rose, and said: It is far from my wish to trouble the House; but so grave a charge has been made against me by the gentleman from South Carolina, who, on Thursday last, filled, pro tempore, the chair you now occupy, I feel it incumbent on myself to make a very brief reply. Sir, I will, in the first place, relieve the gentleman from South Carolina from all his doubts upon the subject. I did use the words "perjured Senator;" and I shall, on a similar occasion, and in the same manner, apply them again. I used the words, and shall not retract them here or elsewhere. What, sir, was the provocation when that extraordinary debate took place? I, in common with other members of the House, had listened, without the least intervention from the Chair, to a vituperative and violent attack upon our venerable Chief Magistrate; a tirade of low abuse, and the most disgraceful insinuations against the President, the Secretary of State, and our minister to Russia. Yes, sir, I not only heard them, but I have marked in the paper I now hold in my hand, passages and epithets in his published speech, disgraceful to this House—base, gross, and infamous.

JAN. 19, 1831.] Trial of Judge Peck.—Mileage of Members.—Supernumerary Officers and Cadets.

[Here the SPEAKER observed, there was no charge made against the gentleman from New York. The member from South Carolina had only risen to state, in explanation to the House, that certain remarks were ascribed in a newspaper to another member, which he did not hear uttered, and for which, if he had heard them, he should have felt it his duty to call him to order.]

Sir, when I was interrupted by the Chair, I was coming to the point in question. What was the occasion—what the manner in which the words "perjured Senator" were used? The gentleman from Rhode Island had not only gone on uninterruptedly with his abuse, but he went into a grave denunciation of the Turkish treaty; at a moment when, as rumor says, and as it is believed, that treaty was a subject of discussion—of secret discussion in the Senate of the United States—was there not something revolting in this spectacle?—when a treaty was known only to the cabinet and the Senatorial council of the Executive—when the friends of the administration could get no information whatever—when, sir, intimate as I am with the Secretary of State, (and I am as much in his confidence as any other member of this House,) I have never heard him utter one syllable on the provisions of the Turkish treaty—when that treaty was presumed to be under discussion in the secret sessions of the Senate, the gentleman from Rhode Island presents us with the revolting spectacle of going into an examination of its provisions. Where, sir, did the gentleman from Rhode Island get his information? From one of his friends—the editor of a newspaper—an unprincipled partisan, or one who had violated his oath—some perjured Senator? Sir, I know not where the gentleman from Rhode Island obtained his information—he may take his choice of these alternatives; he may take either of his confidential friends, the editor, the partisan, or the Senator. I made no charge then, I make none now; I put the case then, as I now put it, hypothetically. All I meant to convey—and with all deference to the gentleman from South Carolina, and the SPEAKER—all that my language does convey, is this: if the gentleman from Rhode Island received his intelligence from a Senator of the United States, then, sir, that Senator has violated his oath of secrecy, and stood in the eyes of the world a "perjured Senator;" and upon such evidence I would not rely for my facts as a basis of any argument on the Turkish treaty. Whether any Senator has placed himself in that unenviable attitude, is a question the gentleman from Rhode Island may answer for himself—he may push that inquiry as far as he pleases.

[The SPEAKER said there was no question before the House; and repeated his former remarks, that the gentleman from South Carolina had made no charge against him.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG repeated that he had uttered the words attributed to him.

Mr. MARTIN replied, he was sorry to hear from the gentleman that he did use the words, even in the alternative. He [Mr. M.] had understood the gentleman to use the words "perjured witness;" and he believed, if the question was decided by the gentleman's "peers around him," he [Mr. M.] would be sustained. But, if the gentleman insists that he used words manifestly out of order, it was no longer his [Mr. M.'s] business, after the explanation he had given.

Mr. BURGESS rose to address the House.

The SPEAKER said, the gentleman from Rhode Island was out of order. He could reserve his remarks until this subject came in its proper course under the consideration of the House.

Mr. BURGESS then resumed his seat.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate chamber, to attend the trial of Judge Peck.

On returning, they reported progress; and The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Expenditures, made on the 7th instant, in relation to a uniform rule of computing the mileage of members of Congress.

Mr. CHILTON moved an amendment, so as to change the rate of mileage from eight to six dollars for every twenty miles travelled in going to and returning from the seat of Government; but

The SPEAKER declared the motion to be out of order.

The question then recurred on the motion heretofore made by Mr. CHILTON, as amended on the motion of Mr. HALL, to recommit the report to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with instructions, as follows: "To report a bill making it the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, with the aid of the Postmaster General, at the end of every session, to make an estimate, as nearly as possible, of the actual distance, in a direct line, of the residence of each member of the Senate, House of Representatives, and delegate of a territory, from the seat of Government; and that the mileage of the members of Congress and delegates be computed, and their accounts for travelling be settled, according to such estimate."

The question being put on the proposed recommitment, it was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—120 to 27.

SUPERNUMERARY OFFICERS AND CADETS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dismissing from the army the supernumerary lieutenants by brevet commission.

That the committee also inquire into the expediency of fixing the age between 17 and 21 years, as the period of admission into the West Point Academy; and that all the graduates, from time to time, at that institution, shall be discharged from the army, when not needed in the actual service of the country:

That they inquire into the expediency of authorizing appointments in the line of the army, from the meritorious non-commissioned officers of the army:

And, also, of reducing the number of cadets in said academy, now authorized by law.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he did not offer the resolution as a matter of mere form; he offered it with a sincere desire that it should receive the deliberate attention of the Committee on Military Affairs, and every member of this House; and, when so considered, he confidently believed that its principles would be carried out by the efficient action of Congress. It is possible, said Mr. W., that I have imbibed erroneous opinions and improper prejudices against the present organization of the Military Academy. (I mean no reflection upon the conduct of those whose business it is to superintend its management.) If I have been in error, the most laborious investigation and deliberate reflection have not enabled me to correct the opinions heretofore expressed; but every day's results tend, more and more, to convince me that Congress should review its legislation upon this subject.

By the act of 1802, what is now called West Point Academy, was organized for a particular purpose. It was designed as a nursery, a school of practice for the junior officers of the army. As a military institution purely, I am its friend and advocate; as a school for the education of the youth of the country generally, of one class, and that the wealthy and politically influential, and at public expense, I am opposed to it. I will not now, sir, detain the House by a statement of the reasons which have conducted my mind to its present results.

By the act to which I have referred, the corps of engineers then in service, with one chief and six assistant engineers, were stationed at West Point, and organized into a school for the education and instruction of the junior officers of the army. The President was authorized to appoint ten cadets only, who were to be stationed at West Point, and be attached to the army, to be paid sixteen dollars per month, and two rations per day. The whole corps was not to exceed twenty officers, one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, four captains, four lieutenants, and four second lieutenants. This, I believe, in the time of Mr. Jefferson, that good old time of practical republican economy, constituted the Military Academy. In 1803, the President was authorized to appoint one teacher of the French language, and one teacher of drawing, &c. In 1812, one professor of natural and moral philosophy, one professor of mathematics, one professor of civil engineering, with assistants, and the number of cadets then limited, or rather extended, to two hundred and fifty.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, given in brief the organization and progress of this institution up to 1812. With any further alterations, additions, and details, I will not trouble the House. When the cadets shall have received a regular degree from the academical staff, the President is required to confer upon them the rank of second lieutenants, by brevet commission, and attach them to the army, with the pay and emoluments of second lieutenants. What has this official nursery produced in the space of eighteen years? I do not refer to the hundreds who, having received their education at public expense, have retired to civil pursuits—I refer to the number who have clung to the army, and still cling to it, and are called supernumerary officers. If they are supernumerary, by which I understand a greater number than is warranted by law, or required in the service, I am for getting rid of them as soon as possible.

I will call the attention of the House to a single passage in the report of the Secretary of War, at the present session. By that report, we are told that,

"By the act of 1818, the President of the United States is directed to confer upon the graduates of this academy the appointment of brevet lieutenants. Already there are eighty-seven supernumerary officers thus created, and who cannot now be provided for in the line of the army. In June next there will probably be thirty-three more added, which will produce an excess of fourteen over the number authorized. The law prohibits the brevet appointments of a greater number than one hundred and six—one for each company; of course, upon a reasonable calculation, but few, if any, of the cadets, after June, 1831, will be entitled to a brevet commission. I would respectfully suggest if some rule, different from the present, be not necessary to restrict, for the future, brevet lieutenant appointments, retaining only so many as might supply the probable vacancies which would occur within the year. The number of promotions to the army from this corps, for the last five years, has averaged about twenty-two; while the number of graduates for the same period has been at an average of forty. This excess, which is annually increasing, has placed eighty-seven in waiting until vacancies shall take place; and shows that, in the next year probably, and in the succeeding one certainly, there will be an excess beyond what the existing law authorizes to be commissioned. There will then be one hundred and six supernumerary brevet second lieutenants appurtenant to the army, at an annual expense to the Government of eighty thousand dollars."

Now, sir, I put the question to the members of this House, and to the Secretary of War, does the country need these supernumerary officers in time of peace? Does it comport with a sound and practical economy to maintain, at an annual expense of eighty thousand dollars, one hundred and six young men, whose services are not needed by the Government? I say not needed, if you will keep the officers of companies at their posts, if you will not withdraw the captains of companies from the performance of service in the line, and attach them to the staff. These supernumeraries are annually increasing. Thirty-three more are to be added next June—what will you do with them? Of what service to the country are they? For one, I say, dismiss them; let them go home, and, if they cannot do better, go to work.

There is, sir, one other proposition in the resolution, about which I feel much solicitude, and will add a few remarks. Under the present regulations of the army, and by consequence of this supernumerary corps of second lieutenants by brevet, the power of the President to appoint an officer in the line of the army from and among the meritorious non-commissioned officers of the army, is taken away. Sir, no man can enter the army of his country, however well deserving and well qualified, unless he shall have been so fortunate as to have received a diploma at West Point. I would leave the Executive at liberty to seek talents and reward merit by appointments to subaltern officers in the army, wherever he can find them. At present, sir, no matter what may be the merits and qualifications of a non-commissioned officer, no matter what may have been his deeds of valor and daring, promotion to him (the highest reward of the soldier) is denied by the laws of that country he so gallantly defends. If you cut off all hope from the non-commissioned officers of the army, you will, in time, destroy its moral force. I believe it has had a tendency, a very powerful tendency, to lessen its physical force.

We have felt the effects, and witnessed the losses both of men and money, by desertion from the army. Many and various have been the causes assigned for this practice, and as multifarious have been the remedies proposed. My reflections, sir, have taught me to believe that one great cause of the increase of this evil may be fairly traced to the practice of taking the captains from their appropriate service at the head of their companies, and conferring upon them staff appointments, and of the want of a power in the Executive to reward, by promotion, the meritorious of the non-commissioned officers of the army. Every man who knows any thing of the actual service, must admit the importance of so inconsiderable an officer as the orderly sergeant of a company. In my estimation he ranks in real utility and efficiency, in the promotion of order, and the diffusion of a correct military and moral feeling among the soldiers, next to the captain. No company is well commanded, well disciplined, unless both of these officers are talented and efficient within the sphere of their duty. How important is it, then, that your non-commissioned officers should be men of correct moral habits, possessing a military feeling and spirit. These you will not have, under your present regulation. They have not that strong incentive to action, that powerful stimulus to the military man, the hope of promotion, to propel them in the discharge of their duty. They are content if they so demean themselves as to escape censure or punishment, and leave the men to the government of their own idle and dissipated passions; thus destroying what I call the moral force of the rank and file of your army; and desertion and crime are the inevitable consequences. Some of our best company officers, during the late war, had the honor—I call it an honor, sir—of having been promoted from the ranks of the army. They fought for their commissions, won them, and did not disgrace the late war. Ours, I believe, sir, is the only country at this time with which I have any acquaintance, where the avenue to promotion is blocked, eternally blocked, by a corps of supernumerary officers.

There are other subjects of much importance, embraced in the resolution, about which I forbear to say any thing at this time. I have made these suggestions, and hope they will lead others, and particularly the Committee on Military Affairs, to a minute investigation. I take the hint recently given, and now propose a measure of real re-trenchment and reform; and I hope we shall meet with no opposition from a quarter where I think them so much needed.

Mr. DRAYTON said that the fact stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] that eighty thousand dollars were appropriated for the pay and emoluments of brevet second lieutenants, was certainly correct; but that these officers performed no duties, and rendered no services, was erroneously stated. They performed all the duties, and rendered all the services, of second lieutenants in the line: why, then, shall they not be entitled to the same compensation? So far from their not performing the duties appropriate to their rank, it appeared from a document submitted to this House at its last session, that, in a recent expedition against the Pawnees and other Indians, one of them commanded a company. When brevet second lieutenants acted in this capacity, could it with propriety be said that the public money was uselessly lavished upon them? Brevet second lieutenants, who had graduated at West Point, were annexed to the army, by the positive provision of a law, with the restriction that their appointments should not exceed one to each company in the service, by which not more than one hundred and six could receive commissions.

With respect to the Military Academy, he agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky, that the number of cadets now educated there was beyond the wants of the army, or would soon be so. There are now eighty-seven brevet second lieutenants; and it was probable, after the next promotion of the cadets from the first class, that the whole number of one hundred and six would be annexed to the several regiments. As to that part of the gentleman's resolution which related to West Point, he [Mr. D.] had anticipated the object of the gentleman, by submitting a resolution, calling upon the Secretary to inform this House whether the number of cadets educated at the Military Academy was not excessive, when compared with the purposes for which that institution was established; and, if such should be the case, to report a plan for their reduction, and an organization corresponding with such alterations as might be necessary. He [Mr. D.] had moved this resolution for the information of the committee, of which he was a member; and that committee, upon receiving the report of the Secretary of War, would doubtless act upon it. Mr. D. observed, that he did not think the number of officers at present in the army exceeded the wants of the service. In proof of this, he referred gentlemen to the Register, which would show that scarcely a single company had its complement of officers upon duty with it. If officers are taken from the line for the staff, these deficiencies of company officers must exist, unless a new military organization should be adopted. If, by this organization, officers transferred to the staff vacated their commissions in the line, as these vacancies must be supplied, the number of the officers would be increased instead of being diminished, unless the number of officers to a company should be reduced, which he believed would be impolitic and injurious.

Whether it would be expedient, in order to prevent desertion, or to infuse a spirit of emulation into the non-commissioned officers, to hold out to them the prospect of commissions, was a proposition to which he [Mr. D.] had not particularly turned his attention. However this might be, as the President could not create officers of the army, but only appoint them, when authorized by law, as by law he was to appoint the cadets, after they had graduated to the number of one hundred and six, constituting all who could be added to the army, the existing legislation must be altered, before a power could be vested in the President to promote non-commissioned officers, or to confer commissions upon any other persons than the cadets. Mr. D. added, that he had not risen for the purpose of entering into an argument upon the subjects contained in the resolution, but merely to correct some misconceptions which, it seemed to him, the gentleman from Kentucky labored under. When that resolution came before the Committee on Military Affairs, he should have the opportunity to examine the several topics which it embraced.

Mr. WICKLIFFE rejoined. I was well apprised, said he, of the fact that these eighty-seven supernumerary second lieutenants were, in theory and in name, attached to the army, and that some of them did actually perform duty; but, sir, where were the captains, the first and second lieutenants of the companies? If they had been at their post, they could have performed the service assigned to these junior subalterns. If you take the captains and make staff officers of them, and give the command of companies to these young, (and without meaning any the slightest reflection upon them) inexperienced officers, you do affect essentially the organization, harmony, and efficiency of the army.

When a captain quits the command of a company, and seeks a staff appointment, he is governed by one of two motives, (perhaps both,) either to avoid the fatigue, labor, and hardships of doing duty in the line, or to obtain an increase of his pay. He should then lose his rank in the line, and allow others, who will remain and perform duty, to rise. Do this, and you will promote the moral force of the army. You will promote harmony and good feeling, and destroy that jealousy which this practice ever engenders, so baneful in its effects. I am pleased to learn that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. DRAYTON] agrees with me that the number of students at West Point should be reduced. The main and principal object Mr. Jefferson had in view in the establishment of that institution, seems to have been lost sight of. Instead of its now being a school for the purposes of the army only, it has become a free national academy. After the students of that academy receive their education at public expense, and paid for it too at the rate of sixteen dollars per month, three out of four of them return to their homes and pursue some profession. If we are to have a national university, let us establish it at once, and not avoid the provisions of the constitution, by using the means of raising and supporting an army, to the promotion of education by the Federal Government. I desire these things to be understood by the people; and when understood, if they are willing to educate at public expense, and pay them for it, two hundred and fifty young men, annually selected as the students of West Point Academy ever have and ever will be, then I am content.

The hour of twelve having arrived, a motion was made, and prevailed, for the House to go into committee, for the purpose of attending the

TRIAL OF JUDGE PECK.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN being called to the chair, and proceeded to the Senate.

At three o'clock the Committee of the Whole returned, and the SPEAKER resumed the chair.

RELIEF VESSELS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG (pursuant to notice which he gave in the morning) moved that the House go into committee on the bill from the Senate, to authorize the employment of certain relief vessels, and appropriating $15,000 therefor.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought this a bill that ought not to pass without discussion; and as it was late, and the House thin, he moved an adjournment.

The question was put, and a majority voted against adjourning; but there appearing no quorum,

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, reported the following bill; which was twice read:

"Be it enacted, &c. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives, with the aid of the Postmaster General, at the end of every session of Congress, to make an estimate, as nearly as possible, of the actual distance, in a direct line, of the residence of each member of the Senate, House of Representatives, and delegate of a territory, from the seat of Government; and that the mileage of members of Congress and delegates be computed, and their accounts for travelling be settled, according to such estimate."

Mr. CHILTON proposed to add to the bill the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, the pay of members of the Senate, House of Representatives, and delegates of territories, shall be at the rate of six dollars per day for each day's attendance on the business of the Senate or House of Representatives; and six dollars for every twenty miles' travel to and from the seat of Government, estimated according to the rule established in this act."

Mr. CHILTON did not intend to say one word on this amendment, unless called on by some member of the House for explanation. He was desirous that each member of the amendment should stand on its own individual merits; and for that purpose he would move a division of the question. The proposition to limit the charge for mileage to six dollars for every twenty miles, he had no doubt would meet the approbation of all.

Mr. SPEIGHT expressed his regret that this motion was made, the effect of which would only be to embarrass the main question. In the shape of an original, separate proposition, he should be willing to support it; but the House had already spent too much time in debating about the mileage, and it was time that that subject should be disposed of.

Mr. CHILTON begged leave to state to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] that it was not with the intention of embarrassing the bill that he had made the proposition to amend.

[Mr. SPEIGHT here denied having charged him with that intention; he had stated that, in his opinion, such would be the effect of his amendment.]

Mr. CHILTON continued. He thought that the amendment should be adopted; that it was calculated to subserve the public interests. It was true, when he first introduced this measure of retrenchment, he was not as well acquainted with matters and things as he now is; but he was still of the opinion that, by proper economy, six dollars per diem would be an adequate compensation; but, at all events, such has been the improvements in the mode of travelling by stages and steamboats, that all, he presumed, would admit six dollars for every twenty miles actually travelled would be ample compensation. Twenty miles was not a day's journey on horseback; indeed, forty miles was a moderate day's journey. It could not, therefore, be doubted, that six dollars would be sufficient for all the expenses incurred in travelling twenty miles in any part of the country. While the present law exists, he would receive the pay which it allowed, and no more; but he had pledged himself to his constituents to endeavor to repeal this law, and to retrench this branch of public expenditure; and like all pledges that he made, he would use every exertion to redeem. When he had done so, he felt that he had done his duty to his conscience, his constituents, and his country. In charging mileage, he said it would appear that each branch of the National Legislature had exceeded the respective distances when computed on the nearest mail route, with, perhaps, only thirteen exceptions.

He charged, however, no improper intention to any member, but was inclined to believe that others, like himself, had inadvertently been guided by former charges and calculations of distance.

Mr. YANCEY, of Kentucky, said he hoped that the amendment, which proposes to reduce the pay of the members of Congress to six dollars per day, and six dollars for every twenty miles' travel in going to and from the seat of Government, will be adopted, and that we shall not talk so much about retrenchment and reducing expenses, and give so little proof of being in reality, by our actions. I am surprised to hear the gentleman from North Carolina say that he will vote for the reduction contemplated in this amendment, if in a separate bill, but will not when united with this; I consider, sir, that both measures are right, and consequently should pass, either conjointly or separately. I, sir, have given pledges to my constituents, which were elicited by their interrogatories propounded to me, that I would endeavor to effect the reduction asked for in this amendment, and I was much gratified that the question was asked me, if I would be for reducing, because it gave me an opportunity to manifest my willingness to promote a measure of economy, which I was and am sincerely in favor of; and, sir, I should be glad that my views on public measures corresponded with that of gentlemen in this House. But when the sovereign people whom I represent wish a measure, I, with great pleasure, advocate and support their will, whether it is agreeable to this House or not; and, sir, I should wish the stentorian voice of an indignant people to speak into insignificance and retirement, and that, too, in strains of thunder, that representative who would dare to violate the known will of the people. Sir, it is the very vital principle of republics, that the will of the majority shall prevail, and none will dare assert, here or elsewhere, that the sovereign people of this land are not capable of wise self-government; and as the people whom I have the honor to represent, will, as they have a right to do, demand of me a faithful redemption of my pledges, I trust, sir, that my conduct on this occasion will meet their approbation, which is what I and every member ought arduously to aspire to. Sir, we talk a great deal of trying to bring our ship of State back to its republican tack. Now that we have a good and democratic statesman at the helm, let us march boldly to the mark, and not flinch when there is an effort made to reduce unnecessary expenses; and as we have the fixing our own compensation, and as the six dollars would be what it was in the good old halcyon days of pure republicanism, when the great Washington was in the Presidential chair, and the illustrious Jefferson, his right hand man, was Secretary of State, that compensation was deemed sufficient, and now that we are aiming to get back to good old times, let us demonstrate by our actions that our professions of economy are sincere. As I said before, sir, as we are the only people that can fix and reduce our wages, and as I verily believe them too high, let us not make an ostentatious display of frugality and economy in our public expenses; and when a reduction of what I deem extravagant, is so perfectly tangible in our power, let us show that our professions of retrenchment are not a mere empty sound.

Mr. CARSON said that, for his own part, he had nothing to do with the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky, in submitting his amendment; neither had he any concern respecting the pledge which that member had given to his constituents, or to the redemption of that pledge as had been promised. A statement had been made, that, with the exception of fourteen cases, all the other charges for mileage had been overrated. This statement is erroneous. I had occasion during the last session to correct a similar statement. The gentleman from Kentucky has no doubt been led into the error by the incorrect calculations of the Post Office Department, to which he has referred, and upon this he has indirectly censured the whole Congress, with the exception of one Senator, and thirteen members. Now, sir, according to the post office statement, the difference between the post office of my colleague, [Mr. CONNER,] (Brutus Fords post office,) and mine, (Pleasant Gardens,) is only three and a half miles, when, in fact, the distance is near eighty. It is insufferable, sir, that such censure should be thrown out upon such false premises. I only rise to correct this error, so far as myself and colleague are concerned.

Mr. C. concluded by calling for the previous question; and the call being sustained,

The main question (which precludes or puts aside amendments) was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

RELIEF VESSELS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to renew the motion which he made yesterday to go into Committee of the Whole, and take up the bill from the Senate to empower the President of the United States to send relief vessels on our maritime coast. He said the measure proposed was an act of humanity, and called for a speedy decision by the House. Whatever might be its opinion, he hoped the bill would now be considered.

In order to go into Committee of the Whole, it became necessary to suspend the different orders of the day, which required a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

The question being put on the suspension, it was decided in the negative—yeas 103, nays 59.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

The resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. WICKLIFFE was then taken up.

Mr. DRAYTON was entitled to the floor; but, as the hour had nearly elapsed for the consideration of resolutions, he declined making the remarks which he intended to have done to correct the errors into which the gentleman from Kentucky had fallen, and said he would content himself with moving for a division of the question, so as to take the sense of the House on the first member of the resolution:

The question being put, the first paragraph of the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dismissing from the army the supernumerary lieutenants by brevet commission."

The question was then taken on agreeing to the remainder of the resolution, and was also agreed to, in the following form:

"That the committee also inquire into the expediency of fixing the age between seventeen and twenty-one years as the period of admission into the West Point Academy; and that all the graduates, from time to time, at that institution, shall be discharged from the army when not needed in the actual service of the country.

"That they inquire into the expediency of authorizing appointments in the line of the army from the meritorious non-commissioned officers of the army.

"And, also, of reducing the number of cadets in said academy, now authorized by law."

Mr. LEIPER laid on the table the following:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to communicate to this House the causes of the irregularity of the arrival of the Eastern mail; to what the failure is attributable; and what remedy can be provided to prevent this delay.

In submitting the foregoing resolution,

Mr. LEIPER said he begged leave to be explicitly understood that, in offering this resolution to the House, he did not, in the remotest manner, intend to convey any censure, or attach any blame to the Postmaster General, or the contractors on this mail route. A report was made to this House on the 12th day of February, 1827, by the predecessor of Mr. Barry; his wish now was to elicit any new information the department could present touching a subject which was one of considerable public interest. [The resolution was adopted on the following day.]

THE IMPEACHMENT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck. Having returned, the committee reported progress, and

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

The engrossed bill "to establish a uniform mode of computing the mileage of members of Congress, and delegates from territories," was read the third time; and the question being stated on its passage,

Mr. CHILTON required the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. TUCKER requested information as to the time when the bill, if it passed, would take effect. He presumed not till the next session of Congress; in which case, he should be averse to passing the bill.

The SPEAKER replied that, if the bill should pass, it would take effect upon the present Congress.

Mr. TUCKER withdrew his opposition; and

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and was determined in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

So the bill passed, and was sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The following joint resolution was read the third time: Resolved, &c. That the rules of each House shall be so amended, as to make it the imperative duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives to ascertain, at the end of every session of Congress, from each Senator, member, or delegate from a territory, the number of days which he may have been absent from, and not in attendance upon, the business of the House; and, in settling the accounts of Senators, members, and delegates, there shall be deducted from the account, or amount of pay for each session, at the rate of eight dollars per day for every day any member of either House, or delegate, shall have been absent, except by order, on business of the House to which he belongs, or in consequence of sickness."

The question being upon its passage, a brief debate took place between Messrs. THOMPSON, of Georgia, HALL, GORMAN, SUTHERLAND, TUCKER, and DRAYTON, upon the form of the resolution, and its effect upon the rules, &c. Pending the remarks of the latter gentleman, a message was received from the Senate, informing the House that that body was now sitting as a court of impeachment: whereupon,

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARRIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend the trial of Judge Peck. Having returned, the committee reported progress; and then

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22.

PAY OF MEMBERS.

The House having resumed the consideration of the joint resolution relative to the pay of members of Congress,

Mr. HALL moved to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with instructions to report a bill, providing—"That it shall be the imperative duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives to ascertain, at the end of every session of Congress, from each member of Congress, or delegate from a territory, the number of days which he may have been absent from, and not in attendance upon, the business of the House; and, in settling the accounts of Senators, members, and delegates, there shall be deducted from the account, or amount of pay for each session, at the rate of eight dollars per day for every day any member of either House, or delegate, shall have been absent, except by order, on business of the House to which he belongs, or in consequence of sickness."

On this motion a debate of some length took place, in which Messrs. DRAYTON, SUTHERLAND, HALL, WHITTLESEY, CHILTON, and CARSON, engaged.

Mr. CARSON, as he said, in order to put the question to rest, and to put a stop to debate, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

On this motion Mr. CHILTON required the yeas and nays, and they were ordered accordingly by the House. Being taken, they stood—yeas 50, nays 135.

So the House refused to lay the subject on the table.

A message was received from the Senate, informing that that body was now sitting as a high court of impeachment: whereupon,

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck. Having returned, the committee reported progress; and

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report from the majority of that committee, on the question of repealing the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, accompanied by a bill "to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act of 4th September, 1789."

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the same committee, was desirous to present the report of the minority of the committee; but the SPEAKER stated that the question must first be put on the reading of the bill.

The bill was then read a first time, and a motion made for its second reading; when

Mr. BUCHANAN again moved for leave to present the report of the minority of the committee; but the Chair stated that, as the House could not entertain two motions at a time, that made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not now in order. He could have an opportunity hereafter to present the report.

Mr. DODDRIDGE moved the rejection of the bill, and on his motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER stated that the question would be on now giving the bill its second reading; and, if the House refused to order it to be read a second time, it would amount to a rejection of it.

On the motion to read a second time, Mr. DODDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays: pending which demand,

A message was received from the Senate, informing that that body was now sitting as a high court of impeachment: whereupon,

The House then, on motion, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend the trial of the impeachment of Judge Peck. Having returned, the committee reported progress; and

TUESDAY, JANUARY 25.

THE JUDICIARY.

After disposing of a variety of morning business, the bill yesterday reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, "to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789," was taken up—the question being on ordering the bill to a second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, hoped the bill would be allowed now to be read the second time, and that it would be made the order of the day for Tuesday next; which motion he made.

The SPEAKER said the bill could not take that course, unless the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DODDRIDGE] would consent to withdraw his opposition.

JAN. 25, 1830.]

The Judiciary.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. DODDRIDGE would not consent.

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the House. He said the measure proposed was one of great importance, and he wished to give an opportunity for members of the House to express their opinions on it freely and fully, and that their remarks might be sent to the people. He was opposed to hasty legislation on important matters; but if the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his opposition to the second reading, he would move to postpone the consideration of the bill to Tuesday next. Such a motion, he presumed, would not be in order now.

The SPEAKER—No. The Chair will read the rule of the House, for the information of gentlemen.

[The SPEAKER here read the rule, as follows:]

“The first reading of a bill shall be for information; and, if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, ‘Shall this bill be rejected?’ If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.”

Mr. DODDRIDGE now consented to withdraw his opposition.

Mr. BATES inquired whether, if the consideration of the bill was postponed to Tuesday next, it could then be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER said, that, after the bill had been read a second time, it could go to a Committee of the Whole, or be otherwise disposed of, as the House might direct.

Mr. MARTIN said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had expressed his willingness to have a free and full discussion of the subject, and the gentleman from Virginia had no desire to smother it. He [Mr. M.] had been listening for reasons why the bill should not take the ordinary course, but had heard none. The bill was one of vast importance; and he was also in favor of a free and full discussion. He should be sorry that the bill should take a course to prevent his hearing the views of gentlemen on the subject; and he was not sure that he should not take part in a discussion himself. He did not intend now, however, to commit himself.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had no disposition, on this or any other occasion, to prevent the freest discussion of the matter before the House. It was for the purpose of assuring himself, on the contrary, that a question should be taken on this bill at the present session, that he had proposed its postponement to this day week. It would thus come up for consideration, as business of course, on that day. The bill will be, on that day, precisely in the situation in which it is at this moment. It will stand higher on the calendar than it would do were we now to refer it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If, on that day, it should be thought an expedient course, the bill can then be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as well as now. We all know that there are many subjects referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and we know that there is a vast mass of lumber there too. If this subject were referred to that committee, Mr. B. said, such an expression of the opinion of this House upon it, as is due to its importance, and must be expected by the nation, would not be obtained at the present session.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, asked whether the question upon the second reading or rejection of a bill was not a question open to discussion. [The SPEAKER answered that it was.] If so, said Mr. S., then the gentleman from South Carolina, and all others, would have as full opportunity as they desired to debate it, without referring it to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said that his objection to the second reading of the bill was prompted by the same motives as had influenced the course of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, viz. that he might have it in his power to debate and decide upon this bill. He gave way only to allow of the motion for postponement, and for no other purpose.

He should not have made the objection to the second reading, but that he might subject the bill to debate, intending himself fully to discuss it.

Mr. RAMSEY asked how this bill came to be reported. Was there any petition or any instruction to the committee to bring this subject now before the House? If the people of the United States do not ask us to do this thing, said he, we ought not to take it up at all.

Mr. DANIEL said that the Judiciary committee had been instructed, by a special resolution, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the 25th section of the judiciary act; and, on considering the subject, they had come to the resolution that it ought to be repealed. Mr. D. had no objection to the proposed postponement for a week, by which time every member would be prepared to express his opinion upon it, he supposed.

Mr. ARCHER said, if there was a majority of the House disposed to obtain a decision of this question, they could, at any time, get at it by going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, should it be referred, as he thought it ought to be, to that committee, where it could be more freely discussed than in the House. This mode of disposing of the bill, he thought, was better suited also to the gravity and importance of the question, than the other mode proposed.

Mr. MARTIN said he should not have risen again, but that the gentlemen from Virginia and Pennsylvania seemed to think that he was disposed to avoid a decision upon the bill at the present session. Mr. M. said he had no such wish. But he could not but say that it was a little remarkable that a bill of this importance should be disposed of in a mode different from the treatment of any other bill since he had had a seat on this floor. Was this the ordinary mode in which bills were opposed? The gentleman from Virginia had said that he had made the motion to reject this bill, because it was a debatable one. But certainly all would admit that, in Committee of the Whole, the discussion would be more full, more free, and over a wider field. If the opinion entertained by the gentleman from Virginia, on this subject, was common to a majority of the House, he could at any time obtain a vote to go into committee upon it. The gentleman shakes his head: but he can, at any time, move to go into committee on the state of the Union, because such a motion has preference over any other. On the other hand, the advocates of the bill will not shrink from the investigation of its object. They have no desire to avoid a decision upon it, and will unite with its opponents in bringing it on.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that, as one member of the House, he should be very much gratified to have this subject discussed. But he wished to see the bill placed in such a situation as to allow of an amendment being offered to it, for a modification of the 25th section of the old law, which he should prefer to a total repeal of it. Let the bill be read a second time, said he, and then be postponed. When it should be again taken up, it would then be open to amendment.

Mr. DODDRIDGE said that he considered the measure proposed by this bill to be of as much importance as if it were a proposition to repeal the Union of these States; and for that reason he could not, with his consent, suffer it to take the course of an ordinary bill. If the House should overrule the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. D. said he should then renew opposition to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said that he should regret any delay by this House of a decision upon a question so momentous as this. It was because of its overwhelming magnitude that he would have it acted upon forthwith. He did not believe that there was a gentleman within hearing of his voice, who had, at this moment, any doubt upon his own mind as to what his vote would be on this question. It seemed desirable to him, in every view, that this question should be at once decided.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he should vote in favor of postponement.

[Here the hour for morning business expired.]

By leave of the House, Mr. BUCHANAN then presented the report of the minority of the Judiciary committee against the measure proposed, and that, together with the report of the majority of the committee, were ordered to be printed.

JUDGE PECK.

The hour of twelve was here announced by the Chair, and the House, in Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN at its head, proceeded to attend the high court of impeachment. Having returned, the committee reported progress; and

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26.

DUTIES ON IRON.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia—mechanics, employed in various branches of the manufacture of iron, viz. steam engine makers, anchor and chain smiths, shipsmiths, machinists, founders, hardware manufacturers, edge tool makers, locksmiths, coach and wagon smiths, farriers, and blacksmiths, praying that such a modification of the existing tariff of duties on iron, as therein set forth, may be adopted; which memorial was, on motion, referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

MILITIA OF THE DISTRICT.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, from the Committee on the Militia, reported a bill "for the better organization of the militia of the District of Columbia;" which was twice read.

Mr. THOMPSON then said that this bill was, he believed, of an unexceptionable nature, and its provisions were much needed by the people of this District. Among other things, it proposes to authorize the Secretary of War to select places of depot for the preservation of the arms of the United States, placed in the hands of the militia, and to employ persons to take care of the same; but for these purposes it proposes no direct appropriation, though probably some expense might be the consequence. Under these circumstances, Mr. T. inquired of the Speaker whether the rules of the House would require that the bill should go through a Committee of the Whole. [The SPEAKER answered in the negative.] It was considered so important that something should be done on this subject, Mr. T. said, that he wished to have the bill go to a third reading without delay. The bill of the last session on this subject contained some provisions which gave some little disquietude to some of the citizens. A convention of officers of the militia had, however, examined this bill, and some alterations had been made, but he thought not material ones, which made the bill more acceptable to the people. He moved that the bill be engrossed, and ordered to be read a third time.

After a suggestion from the Chair, Mr. T. waived his motion, and the bill was made the special order of the day for Monday next, when the question will be upon ordering it to be engrossed.

DUTIES ON IRON.

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, adverting to a memorial against the duty on iron, which had been this morning referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and alluding to the right of the people to petition this House, implying a right to a hearing upon their petition, said, that it was a well-known fact that a large proportion of the Committee on Manufactures was opposed to a reduction of the duties, not only upon iron, but upon every other article of import. Iron, he said, was an article of universal use and consumption; and when it was proposed to reduce the tax upon it, all the people were interested, and entitled to be heard without prejudice upon the subject. Seeing that the Committee on Manufactures had prejudged the case, he moved to reconsider the vote referring the petition to that committee, in order that it might be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. RAMSEY expressed his hope that the proposition would not be reconsidered. The petition had gone to the proper committee, raised for the express purpose of taking cognizance of matters of this kind. The gentleman from North Carolina had said it was wrong to refer a memorial upon any subject to a committee that had prejudged the case. Allow me to say, said Mr. R., that the Committee of Ways and Means has as much prejudged the case as the Committee on Manufactures. I cannot consent that this petition shall take any other direction than that which has already been given to it. The Committee on Manufactures is established by rule, and appointed by the Speaker expressly to take cognizance of such questions. The Committee of Ways and Means is established and appointed to devise the ways and means of bringing money into the treasury; and I have always thought it not the proper committee to send questions of this kind to. The Committee of Ways and Means ought not to take cognizance of such matters, unless specially sent to them; and, when so sent, they ought to move to be discharged from them, as not being within their province.

Mr. McDUFFIE (chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) said that, in reference to the matter of prejudging the question, the two committees referred to were upon precisely the same footing. It was well known, he said, that the Committee of Ways and Means take one view of this subject, the Committee on Manufactures another. He understood the object of the honorable mover, however, to be, that the matter of the petition should be fairly investigated. He understood, moreover, that one of the petitioners, perhaps one of the most intelligent practical mechanics in the United States, is now here, with materials and evidence prepared to sustain his views before any committee to whom the memorial should be referred. All that Mr. McD. desired to understand, therefore, was, whether the Committee on Manufactures would give a fair hearing to the memorialists. If they would, he had no objection to the subject going to that committee.

Mr. MALLARY (chairman of the Committee on Manufactures) referred to the rules of the House for the appointing of committees, and the specification of their duties. He remarked, however, that, when particular subjects were referred to committees, they might be in favor of a part of them, and have strong objections to other portions. The Speaker, in the appointment of committees, could not always know the sentiments of members, nor could he tell to what particular decision they would come on the matters referred to their consideration. The question seemed to be, what was the proper duties to be performed by the Committee on Manufactures. He [Mr. M.] was not disposed to prejudge the present case; he would say, nevertheless, that all matters referred to the committee of which he had the honor to be chairman, would receive the undivided attention of that committee; and he should take great pleasure, both as chairman of the committee and as a member of the House, if the subject now under consideration was referred to that committee, in directing his attention to it, and giving it the fullest possible investigation.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, made a few observations against the reconsideration. He had no doubt, when the House was disposed to act upon the subject, it would do so without considering whether any proposition concerning it came from one committee or another. For himself, he was opposed to the measure proposed, by whatever committee it might be recommended; and he still continued to think that the Committee on Manufactures was the committee to which it had been properly referred.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, said, after the declaration made by the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Manufactures, that the subject would be fully investigated before that committee, he hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would withdraw his motion. This, Mr. C. said, was one of the most important subjects ever presented to this House; and a proper investigation into it would show how imperfect is this tariff of ours, which had been said to be one of the most perfect in the world. These petitioners tell you that they are taxed twice the value of their manufacture, and that they must be prostrated unless they get some relief from you. It is thus seen how important is this inquiry.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut, said that this was not the time to determine whether the complaint of the memorialists be or be not well founded. But it would be recollected that at the commencement of the session this whole subject had been referred to the standing Committee on Manufactures, from whom the effect of the proposed reference to another committee would be to take it away. This, he thought, was not a usual if a decorous procedure. The subject would, he had no doubt, receive, before the standing committee, a full and fair investigation.

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, of Virginia; (one of the members of the Committee on Manufactures,) took this occasion to say that, as was known to the House, a report had been made from that committee, and a counter report had been presented by the minority. With the greatest respect for the gentlemen composing these two divisions of the committee, he begged leave here to say that he dissented both from the majority and the minority.

Mr. SPEIGHT then rose, and, in consequence of what had fallen from the members of the Committee on Manufactures, withdrew his motion for reconsideration.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the joint resolution "relative to the pay of members of Congress;" together with the instructions proposed to be sent to the Committee on Public Expenditures when that resolution was last under consideration.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said a few words in explanation of what had fallen from him on a preceding day; when

Mr. HALL proposed a modification of the instructions, by adding to them a proviso that the bill, as proposed, should not have a retroactive operation.

Mr. HOFFMAN was opposed to the recommitment of the resolution, and called for the yeas and nays on the question.

[Here the hour for morning business expired.]

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, of New York, three thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of the cultivation of sugar cane, and the manufacture of brown sugar, recently transmitted to Congress, were ordered to be printed.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MAURIN in the chair, and proceeded to attend the trial before the high court of impeachment. Having returned, the committee reported progress; and The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the joint resolution "relative to the pay of members of Congress," together with the motion to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Public Expenditures, with certain instructions.

The yeas and nays were yesterday called for by Mr. HOFFMAN, on the question; but this day the House refused to order them.

After some discussion, the previous question was demanded, and the demand was sustained by the House. [The effect of the previous question was to supersede the motion for recommitment with instructions, and bring the question directly before the House on the passage of the joint resolution.]

The main question being put in the following form: "Shall the joint resolution pass?" it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Arnold, Noyes Barber, Barnwell, Bartley, Bates, Baylor, Beckman, J. Blair, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Bouldin, Brodhead, Brown, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Chandler, Chilton, Claiborne, Clay, Condit, Conner, Cooper, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Crockett, Creighton, Croche-ron, Daniel, Davenport, W. R. Davis, Deberry, Denny, Desha, De Witt, Dickinson, Doddridge, Dorsey, Draper, Drayton, Duncan, Dwight, Eager, Earll, Ellsworth, G. Evans, Horace Everett, Findlay, Finch, Ford, Forward, Foster, Fry, Gordon, Green, Hall, Hammons, Harvey, Hawkins, Haynes, Hodges, Holland, Hoffman, Hubbard, Hunt, Huntington, Ihrie, Ingersoll, Thomas Irwin, Jarvis, R. So the resolution was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence, in the following form:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the rules of each House shall be so amended as that it shall be the imperative duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-arms of the House of Representatives to ascertain, at the end of every session of Congress, from each member of Congress, or delegate from a territory, the number of days which he may have been absent from, and, not in attendance upon, the business of the House; and in settling the accounts of the Senators, members, and delegates, there shall be deducted from the account, or amount of pay for each session, at the rate of eight dollars per day for every day any member of either House, or delegate, shall have been absent, except by order, on business of the House to which he belongs, or in consequence of sickness."

LANDS BETWEEN LUDLOW & ROBERTS' LINES.

The House then, on motion of Mr. STERIGERE, went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HOWARD in the chair, and took up the bill from the Senate, to "amend an act to quiet the title of certain purchasers of lands between the lines of Ludlow and Roberts, in the State of Ohio," together with certain amendments proposed by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

[This subject has been long before Congress, and the debate on the merits of the case repeatedly published in the Intelligencer. General McArthur and Philip Doddridge, as agents for others, were the owners of certain lands between the lines of Ludlow and Roberts, in the State of Ohio. These lands had been sold to other individuals by the United States, believing them to be a part of the national domain, and the proceeds were paid into the treasury. Under this state of things, Doddridge had commenced suit against the purchasers, and the United States made themselves defendants in the case. In the Supreme Court, a decision was made in favor of Doddridge. After that decision, Congress passed an act for the survey of the lands, and authorizing the appointment of commissioners to appraise their value. When their report was made, the President of the United States was authorized to treat with McArthur and Doddridge for a settlement of their claims, in order to quiet the titles of those who had purchased from the United States. McArthur agreed to receive for his lands the valuation fixed by the appraisers. Doddridge demanded the same sum, with interest, that had been paid into the treasury. An act had passed Congress, at the last session, appropriating a sum of money for quieting these titles; and the bill at present reported was to make a further appropriation, to the use of Mr. Doddridge, for one of the surveys, which he had already ceded to the United States, but for which the act before named did not make sufficient compensation.]

A debate of some duration took place between Messrs. STERIGERE, MCCOY, WICKLIFFE, VINTON, and PETTIS. It consisted chiefly, however, of explanations, and a statement of the principles on which the bill before the House was founded. Mr. STERIGERE moved that the proposed amendments be rejected.

Mr. TREZVANT had risen to speak, when

A message was received from the Senate.

The SPEAKER immediately took the chair, and the Secretary of the Senate announced that that body was now sitting as a high court of impeachment.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate chamber, to attend the high court of impeachment sitting for the trial of Judge Peck.

Having returned, and reported progress,

The House again resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the bill which was before that committee in the morning relative to lands between Ludlow and Roberts' lines: without continuing the debate, the committee rose, and reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 28.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

Mr. POLK, from the select committee to which was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States, at the commencement of the session, as relates to the distribution of the surplus revenue, made a report, [see Appendix:] which was ordered to lie on the table.

A motion was made to print 6,000 copies of the report; which motion lies one day on the table.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, moved for the printing of 3,000 copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, relative to repealing the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary law of 1789; which motion lies one day.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. LECOMPTE submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the constitution of the United States, so that the judges of the Supreme Court and of the inferior courts shall hold their respective offices for a term of years.

Mr. WHITTLESEY demanded the question of consideration, and

Mr. VANCE called for the yeas and nays on the question.

They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Angel, Baylor, Bell, James Blair, John Blair, Boon, Cambreleng, Carson, Chandler, Chilton, Claiborne, Conner, Crocheron, Warren R. Davis, Desha, De Witt, Earle, Findlay, Foster, Fry, Gordon, Hall, Halsey, Harvey, Haynes, Hinds, Thomas Irwin, Jarvis, Cave Johnson, Perkins King, Adam King, Lamar, Lea, Leavitt, Lecompte, Lewis, Lumpkin, McCreery, McCoy, Miller, Nuckolls, Pettis, Potter, Richardson, Roane, Scott, Shields, Standefer, Sterigere, Wiley Thompson, John Thomson, Tucker, Wayne, Weeks, Wickliffe, Yancey.—61.

NAYS.—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Armstrong, Arnold, Noyes Barber, John S. Barbour, Barnwell, Barringer, Bartley, Beekman, Bouldin, Brodhead, Brown, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Clay, Condict, Cooper, Coulter, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Crockett, Creighton, Crowninshield, Davenport, John Davis, Deberry, Denny, Doddridge, Dorsey, Draper, Drayton, Duncan, Dwight, Eager, Ellsworth, George Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Finch, Forward, Gilmore, Gorham, Green, Grennell, Hemphill, Hodges, Holland, Hoffman, Howard, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Ihrie, Ingersoll, Johns, Kendall, Kennon, Kincaid, Leiper, Lent, Loyall, Mallary, Martindale, Martin, Thomas Maxwell, Lewis Maxwell, McDuffie, McIntire, Mitchell, Monell, Muhlenberg, Norton, Patton, Pearce, Pierson, Polk, Ramsey, Reed, Rose, Russel, Sanford, Wm. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, Sill, Smith, Speight, Ambrose Spencer, Richard Spencer, Stanbery, H. R. Storrs, W. L. Storrs, Strong, Sutherland, Swann, Swift, Taylor, Test, Trezvant, Vance, Varnum, Verplanck, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, C. P. White, E. D. White, Wilde, Williams, Wilson, Wingate, Young.—115.

So the House refused to consider the resolution.

EXPENSES OF THE IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. ELLSWORTH stated that the witnesses attending on the trial of Judge Peck could not be discharged until they were paid. It was highly necessary, therefore, that the House should act upon the bill which he had reported this morning; and he moved to suspend the consideration of any other business on the table, for the purpose of taking up the bill to which he referred.

The motion was agreed to, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, and took up the bill "making provision for the compensation of the witnesses, and other expenses attending the trial of Judge Peck," together with the amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

[The gross sum proposed to be appropriated by the Senate's bill, amounted to $12,000; by the proposed amendments, that amount was increased to $13,500.]

Mr. POLK said, the bill provided for the compensation of the witnesses, both on the part of the United States and the respondent. In all State prosecutions, the defendant always paid his own witnesses, and he thought the

JAN. 29, 1831.] Lands between Ludlow and Roberts' lines.—Judge Peck.—The Judiciary.—Brown Sugar. [H. of R.]

United States would do enough to compensate the witnesses on the part of the prosecution. He requested information as to what had been the usage in former cases of impeachment under this Government.

Mr. ELLSWORTH replied that, in the case of Judge Chase, the United States had paid the witnesses on both sides. He was not positive as to the other cases. He would remark, that it would tend to the utter ruin of any individual brought before the Senate of the United States for trial, if he were to be compelled to compensate his own witnesses. It was right and proper that the Government should pay all the witnesses attending trials of impeachments; and whether Judge Peck should or should not be cleared, it was obvious that, if he were to be compelled to pay his witnesses, he was a ruined man.

Mr. CARSON was in favor of the bill as proposed to be amended. He remarked, that if a precedent was now established, that the United States were not to pay witnesses on behalf of the persons accused in trials of impeachment, no future prosecution would take place, however aggravated might be the offence committed. No man would undertake it. There was no analogy between the ordinary trials in the States and a trial in the Senate of the United States. In the latter, witnesses had generally to be brought from a distance, often very great, as in the present case, and their detention here was both long and expensive. What possible chance was there, he would ask, that an individual could clear himself of an alleged crime, if he was obliged to pay his own witnesses? No man could clear himself, for no man could afford the expense. In his opinion, for the United States to refuse to pay witnesses in trials of the kind referred to, would amount to a positive denial of justice, &c.

The question was now demanded; and, being put on the amendments offered by the Judiciary committee, they were agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended; the amendments were agreed to, and the bill ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

LANDS BETWEEN LUDLOW & ROBERTS' LINES.

The House then resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the bill "to amend the act to quiet the title of purchasers of the public lands between the lines of Ludlow and Roberts, in the State of Ohio," Mr. HOWARD in the chair.

Some further conversation took place between Messrs. TREZVANT, WICKLIFFE, and VINTON, when the amendments proposed by the Committee on Private Land Claims were disagreed to, and the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The House concurred with the Committee of the Whole in rejecting the proposed amendments, and the bill was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

JUDGE PECK.

The hour of 12 having arrived, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend, before the high court of impeachment, the trial of Judge Peck. Having returned, and reported progress, The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29.

THE JUDICIARY.

The bill to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act, passed on the 4th September, 1789, coming up as the first business of the morning, the question being on the motion of Mr. BUCHANAN to postpone the motion that the bill be read a second time to Tuesday next—

Mr. CRAWFORD rose, and, after a few remarks, demanded the previous question; which was the motion of Mr. DONNINGER that the bill be rejected.

The demand was sustained by the House—yeas 81, nays 69.

The question was then put, "Shall the main question be now put?"

And it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 68.

Mr. CRAWFORD moved for a call of the House—which motion prevailed; when it was ascertained that there were one hundred and seventy-one members present.

Mr. MERCER then moved to dispense with further proceedings in the call; but the motion was negative.

The names of absentees on the first call were then called over a second time. Several of them answered to their names, and excuses were made for others; one hundred and eighty-three members were now ascertained to be present.

The doors were then closed; when,

On motion of Mr. DWIGHT, further proceedings in the call were suspended.

The main question was then put, viz. "Shall the bill be rejected?"

And it was determined in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Arnold, Bailey, Noyes Barber, John S. Barbour, Barringer, Bartley, Bates, Baylor, Beckman, John Blair, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Brodhead, Brown, Buchanan, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Chilton, Clark, Condict, Cooper, Coulter, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Crockett, Creighton, Crocheron, Crowninshield, John Davis, Deberry, Denny, De Witt, Dickinson, Doddridge, Dorsey, Drayton, Dwight, Eager, Earll, Ellsworth, G. Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Findlay, Finch, Forward, Fry, Gilmore, Gorham, Green, Grennell, Gurley, Halsey, Hemphill, Hodges, Holland, Hoffman, Howard, Hubbard, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Ibric, Ingersoll, Thomas Irwin, William W. Irvin, Johns, Cave Johnson, Kendall, Kennon, Kincaid, Perkins King, Adam King, Leavitt, Leiper, Lent, Letcher, Magee, Mallary, Martindale, Lewis Maxwell, McCreery, McDuffie, McIntire, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Monell, Muhlenberg, Norton, Pearce, Pierson, Powers, Reed, Richardson, Rose, Russell, Sanford, Scott, William B. Shepard, Augustine H. Shepperd, Shields, Sill, Speight, Ambrose Spencer, Richard Spencer, Sprigg, Standefer, Sterigere, Henry R. Storrs, William L. Storrs, Strong, Sutherland, Swann, Swift, Taylor, Test, J. Thomson, Vance, Varnum, Verplanck, Vinton, Washington, Weeks, Whittlesey, C. P. White, Edward D. White, Williams, Wilson, Wingate, Young.—138.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Angel, Barnwell, Bell, James Blair, Bouldin, Cambreleng, Campbell, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Coleman, Conner, Daniel, Davenport, W. R. Davis, Desha, Draper, Foster, Gaither, Gordon, Hall, Harvey, Haynes, Hinds, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Lamar, Lecompte, Lewis, Loyall, Lumpkin, Lyon, Martin, Thomas Maxwell, McCoy, Nuckolls, Overton, Patton, Pettis, Polk, Potter, Roane, Wiley Thompson, Trezvant, Tucker, Wickliffe, Wilde, Yancey.—51.

So the bill was rejected.

BROWN SUGAR.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. HAYNES some days since, relative to brown sugar.

Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, said, that, when this subject before came up in order, it was laid over for a specific object. I myself, said Mr. W., moved its postponement, as well from my own conviction of the propriety of the step, as at the instance and suggestion of some other gentlemen. The object alluded to was, to let in a report on the subject, which we were daily expecting to receive from the Treasury Department, in compliance with a call from this House. That report, sir, has since been sent in, but, being of some volume, the public printer has not had time enough to lay it on our tables. This circumstance I regret as much as any one can; yet it does present the question, how far it be proper to proceed without it. Several gentlemen have mentioned the subject to me; and one among the number intimated that, if I did not move its further postponement, he would. As to myself, it does appear to me that it would not be over respectful to the gentleman who presides in the department, to take no heed of a document which we have caused him to prepare with no inconsiderable labor. Besides, I feel that I should be wanting in deference to the people where I live, if I neglected to use, and to imbue the House, as far as depends on me, with a knowledge of the facts which they have taken so much pains to embody. There is another consideration: we are bound by the rule we have adopted to attend in the Senate, during this week, on the debate of the impeachment we have preferred against Judge Peck. The hand on the dial plate indicates that but five minutes could now be allotted to the subject. For these reasons, sir, I move its further postponement until next Wednesday, in the hope that it may be then taken up, and prosecuted to a termination.

The motion prevailed.

The resolution heretofore submitted by Mr. DRAYTON, calling on the Secretary of War for certain information relative to officers of the army, furloughs, &c., was considered and agreed to.

The resolutions heretofore submitted by Mr. HONGES, calling upon the Secretary of State for certain information, were taken up, considered, and modified to read as follows:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what measures have been taken by the Executive in relation to the capture, on the 4th of July, 1829, of the ship Galatea, late of the port of New Bedford, by a Portuguese naval squadron then blockading the island of Terceira; and, also, in relation to the imprisonment and robbery of the crew of said ship; and to the capture of other American vessels under the same order of blockade.

“Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before this House any correspondence that may have been had touching this matter, within the knowledge or possession of the President, not incompatible with the public interest.”

After a few remarks from Mr. H. in explanation of the object of the resolutions, they were agreed to, as modified.

The resolution offered by Mr. POTTER a few days since, to amend the rule of the House which limits the discussion of resolutions to one hour, was next taken up.

Mr. POTTER was going on to state the reasons which induced him to offer the resolution, and explaining the bad effects of the present rule, when he was interrupted by the expiration of the hour—elucidating, as he said, the inexpediency of the rule, and exemplifying the great disadvantages under which members labored.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. MARTIN in the chair, and proceeded to the Senate, to attend the trial of Judge Peck before the high court of impeachment. Having returned, and reported progress,

The House adjourned to Monday.

—MONDAY, JANUARY 31.

Mr. CROCKETT presented the petition of three Cherokee Indians, who are entitled to reserves of six hundred and forty acres of land each, and moved its reference to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CLAY suggested that the proper reference would be to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CROCKETT maintained that the petition should go to the Committee of Claims. He explained the object of the memorialists. They had been dispossessed of their land by white men, and brought a suit for its recovery, but were too poor to employ counsel. They had thrown themselves on the State of Tennessee for the benefit of the pauper law, so as that counsel might be employed for them; but the benefit of that law was refused. He hoped the petition would go to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved its reference to the Judiciary committee.

After some conversation between Messrs. CLAY, WILLIAMS, WHITTLESEY, and others, the petition was finally referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MERCER, from the Committee on Internal Improvements, reported a bill to authorize a subscription to the stock of the Alexandria Canal Company; which was twice read; and the question being on its commitment,

Mr. POTTER moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. MERCER called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Internal Improvements, which reported the bill. The Clerk was about to read it; when

Mr. MERCER earnestly entreated the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion, and thus save the time of the House, and the money of the nation.

Mr. POTTER said, that, yielding to the advice of his friends around him, he would withdraw his motion to lay the bill on the table. When the bill granting a charter to the company was before the House, at the last session, it was generally understood that, if the company obtained the charter, they would not ask Congress for a subscription to their stock.

Mr. MERCER stated that the gentleman was under a misapprehension. The individuals who advocated the granting of a charter had no power to pledge the company that they would not ask Congress to subscribe to the stock of that company. He assured the gentleman that there was no pledge; and he felt convinced that, if the gentleman would read the report of the committee on the subject, and had no constitutional objections to the measure proposed, he would unite with the friends of the bill in procuring its passage.

The bill was then committed.

Mr. DODDRIDGE asked leave to submit a motion to print 6,000 copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on the Judiciary relative to repealing the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act of 1789; but the House refused the leave.

JUDGE PECK.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SPEIGHT, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair; and, on motion of Mr. HAYNES, proceeded to the Senate, to attend the further trial of Judge Peck before the high court of impeachment. Having returned, the chairman reported that the committee, in pursuance of the order of the House, had attended the trial of Judge Peck; and that the Senate had pronounced judgment in the case, and, by a vote of 22 to 21, had refused to sustain the impeachment preferred by the House; and that the court had adjourned sine die.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion made on the 6th instant to reconsider the vote by which was rejected the bill to authorize a change in the disposal of the land granted for the construction of the Illinois and Michigan canal.

Mr. DUNCAN hoped the motion for reconsideration would prevail, and that the bill would be made the order of the day for some day certain; by which time he trusted that he should be able to satisfy gentlemen on a point which was objected to when the bill was last before the House; and he called for the reading of the report of the Committee on the Public Lands, which committee reported the bill. It was read by the Clerk.

Claim of James Monroe.

Mr. VANCE said that, when the bill was taken up before, he was desirous of offering an amendment, with a view to meet the views of gentlemen. If no other member did, he should take occasion, if the House agreed to reconsider the bill, to submit an amendment, so as, if possible, to meet the views of gentlemen, and secure the passage of the bill in the best possible shape.

Mr. DUNCAN remarked that the gentleman who had made the motion to reconsider, had stated to the House, at the time of doing so, that he did it with the view to offer an amendment, proposing to appropriate money, in lieu of scrip, to aid the State of Illinois in the construction of the proposed canal. If gentlemen would prefer the appropriation of money, he had no objection; though, for his own part, he should be perfectly satisfied with scrip. Gentlemen were mistaken in the idea that the scrip would be sacrificed. Lands to the amount of $360,000 had been sold in the State of Illinois the last year; it was proposed by the bill to apply but $50,000 worth of scrip in a year; and it was evident that it would be equal to money in the hands of the State.

Mr. BELL said he had voted for the original bill, and stated the grounds upon which he did so. He should be opposed to an amendment like the one suggested, and could not vote for the reconsideration, though he had voted for the bill originally.

Mr. VANCE said that, for himself, he was willing to take the bill as it was; but it did not appear to be so framed as to satisfy gentlemen; and with a view to give more general satisfaction, the motion had been made to reconsider, so as to submit the amendment suggested.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, with a view, as he said, to have done with the subject, for the present session, at least, moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table. The motion was negatived.

The question was then put upon the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill had been rejected, and was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 109.

JAMES MONROE.

The House then took up the bill for the relief of James Monroe—the question being on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. MERCER rose, and said that, when the bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, he had suggested the propriety of retaining the enacting clause; and that, if it were not stricken out, he should move to strike out the whole of the bill after the enacting clause, and submit an amendment, referring the claim to the accounting officers of the treasury for a just and equitable settlement. The committee had, however, seen proper to strike out the enacting clause. He hoped the House would not agree with the committee in their amendment; in the event of which he should submit an amendment, [which he read.] Mr. M., in a speech of some length, then spoke in favor of the claim, and in explanation of his amendment.

Mr. CHILTON should be opposed to the amendment. He hoped, however, that the House would at once concur with the committee, and strike out the enacting clause of the bill. He called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. CARSON spoke in favor of the claim, and against the amendment of the committee. A bill should pass in some shape, extending relief to Colonel Monroe.

Mr. PATTON gave his views on the subject; he was opposed to the amendment, yet thought that the sum proposed to be allowed by the bill was too large. The allowance to Mr. Monroe for a house purchased by him in Paris, for instance, was an item to which he objected.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, in a very impressive speech, supported the claim, at considerable length. He alluded to the revolutionary services of Mr. Monroe, and his present unenviable situation.

Mr. HOWARD called for the reading of a memorial from his constituents, in support of the claim, as being couched in stronger language than he could use, and which he hoped would be read to the House instead of any remarks from him. The memorial was read.

Mr. McDUFFIE made a few very energetic remarks in favor of the claim, and its settlement by the accounting officers of the treasury. He alluded particularly to Mr. Hagner, as one of the best, most industrious, and faithful accounting officers of the Government, and said that, if the claim should be referred to him, ample justice would be done.

Mr. POLK opposed the claim.

Mr. BUCHANAN was in favor of the claim, as well as in favor of sending it to the accounting officers of the treasury for adjustment. He also eulogized Mr. Hagner as a faithful public officer, and hoped the claim might be settled as proposed.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said he did not rise to enter into the merits of this bill; his vote was recorded in the committee—a sense of duty only induced him to vote as he did. I shall not be sorry, said Mr. E., if gentlemen can find it to be their duty to vote otherwise. My object is to state the objections I have to the reference proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, viz. that the adjustment of this account shall be referred to an accounting officer of the treasury, to act under the Secretary of War, subject to the supervision and final decision of the President. The manner of reference, and the principles of settlement, are incorrect. The whole is nothing less than passing a vote that the present Executive shall allow to one of his predecessors what, on vague principles of equity, if not of mere generosity, he pleases. I would as willingly give this power to the present Executive, as to any man; but I think we should give it to no man. He ought not to be called to this duty; he must feel his embarrassment in discharging it, and he cannot act as another man might. I would not object to a reference to an accounting officer; but then I want his responsibility. As is proposed, he is to act under another; and I assure the House, under this reference, he will not assume our responsibility, and do what, in committee, we have said ought not to be done, and especially as he acts under the Secretary of War, who is thus placed over an inferior officer, to direct his course. Nor can the Secretary feel any responsibility—the amendment is that the President is to decide; and I repeat that the whole is left to the generosity of the Executive. We lay down no definite rules—we designate no items—we fix no limits—and, for aught we can do, if this amendment prevails, claims to any amount may be allowed against us. Sir, it is our duty to pass judgment upon these claims. If they are legal, then we already have accounting officers to allow them; if they are not legal, but are to be allowed on principles of indefinite equity or generosity, it is our business to determine the amount, or reject them. With the fullest confidence in the Executive, that he would do what seemed to him right, I will not consent to impose upon him this unwelcome duty—he is in a most delicate situation, when called by Congress, and that, too, after our vote in committee, to adjust the accounts of President Monroe. It is nothing less than an appeal to his generosity—the persons under him will never, in such a case as this, undertake to discriminate between the items. They have no rule for it. As none of the items are a legal charge, they will at once refer the whole to the President, and he must take the responsibility of allowing them, or incurring the displeasure of the friends of the bill—a situation in which he ought not to be placed, for in it he cannot act as in the discharge of his appropriate duties.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, was in favor of it. He made several remarks in support of the claim, and concluded, by making a very feeling appeal to the House in its support.

Mr. DWIGHT also spoke on the same side.

Mr. WILLIAMS again opposed the claim.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, observed, he should have been content to pursue his usual course, by giving a silent vote, if he had not noticed, during this earnest and protracted debate, that many gentlemen seemed to entertain erroneous views of the nature and character of the demand made upon the Government. Although, said Mr. D., I was a member of the select committee to whom this matter was referred, both in the last and in the present Congress, I had resolved to leave the discussion to others; but after what has taken place to day, I feel called on by a sense of duty to place the claim in its true light before a vote is taken; for I am persuaded it has merits which have been overlooked in the heat of debate. I have, said he, looked over the voluminous documents which are intended to illustrate and support it, not at the present session, but during a former Congress—and although I may not in my recollection be exact in their details, yet my memory will not fail me in the material facts. I may claim, therefore, without subjecting myself to the imputation of vanity, to know something of the facts as they are set forth. Let us then see what they are. Mr. Monroe was appointed to a twofold mission: first to France, and then to England, by Mr. Jefferson, who, having an over solicitude to economize the public funds, informed him, when the appointment was made, that he must be content with one outfit instead of two, as had been usual under similar circumstances, both before and since. It was then believed, both by the President and the minister, that this arrangement would cover the expense; but the latter found on experiment that it was a great mistake, for he had been compelled to draw largely upon his private resources to maintain himself.

On his return, after much delay, the second outfit was allowed to him, and he received it, protesting that it fell far short of indemnifying him. This is, said Mr. D., the substance of the story; and, in order to understand the grounds of appeal to this Government, it is necessary to advert to the state of public affairs at the time, and to notice some of the items of claim presented for our consideration. I shall not trouble the House, however, with that kind of examination which has been gone through by many gentlemen, for it is wholly unnecessary as I view this matter, for I do not consider Mr. Monroe as having established a strictly legal claim, and shall not, therefore, draw in question the reasoning which has been pressed upon us on this head, and which has occupied the time of the House for several days.

What, then, said Mr. D., was the state of public affairs? It was a momentous crisis—a crisis big with the fate of Europe. It was the period of the French revolution, when the mind of that nation was on fire, threatening to consume itself, and whatever approached it. It was a time of great embarrassment, which called for great skill, for uncommon prudence, and the most patient forbearance; which demanded a spirit of unexampled temperance and conciliation to maintain and secure the interests of the country. In these extraordinary circumstances, the minister declares he felt himself bound, by his regard for the peace and prosperity of this nation, to adopt measures attended with unusual expense. His protection was sought by a large number of his countrymen against the imminent dangers and misrule of the times. It was not sought in vain. He threw open the doors of his hospitable mansion to all who sought a place of refuge, and limited his family only by the number of his countrymen.

To give the French nation an assurance which its watchful jealousy seemed to demand, that we were desirous of a lasting peace and friendship with them, he bought a house in Paris, for which he paid a large sum of money. He declares most solemnly that his sole object was to give the French unequivocal proof of our sincere desire for perpetual amity, and that he should not have made the purchase upon any other consideration, or for any other purpose. The title to this estate has failed, and he has lost the whole amount of the purchase money. He admits that he had no instructions to purchase it for this Government, but took it at his own risk, believing himself called upon so to do for the good of the country. It is said this furnished no ground of legal claim upon the treasury—agreed—but I appeal to gentlemen on this floor as individuals, as men bearing the relations of honorable, high-minded citizens in the community; as men having just conceptions of the moral obligations which exist between principal and agent, between master and servant; and ask each, if he had employed an agent in his service, who, in a difficult and embarrassing crisis of his affairs, had advanced his private funds without instructions, but solely for the benefit of his principal, and with the hope of rescuing him from imminent peril, and should thereby ruin himself while he protected the interests of his employer, whether, to such an agent, he could turn a deaf ear if he should appeal to his sense of justice and equity for relief in his distress? Whether he could spurn him away, and leave him to perish with hunger and nakedness? And, if he could, whether the world would not condemn such an individual as cold, selfish, heartless? as destitute of the sympathies of our nature, and an idolater of money? Sir, there would be but one opinion in such a case—the servant sinks his private means in his most sincere endeavors to promote the interests of his master, and without a thought of benefiting himself; that master can never live honored and respected in the enjoyment of wealth among his fellow-citizens, while that servant is perishing with poverty. Now, sir, what is the difference between this and the case before us? We are not, as some gentlemen seem to suppose, a judicial tribunal to decide between parties, but we are the master settling with the servant; and shall it be said that we cannot, or that we will not, deal justly? Mr. Monroe sunk a large portion of his private property in this house—it is gone, and we are assured the act was done with the best intentions, and solely for our good—and I appeal to gentlemen to decide in this case as they would in a private transaction. I ask them whether they are prepared to say there is no equity in this demand; whether they are willing to push it from them by striking out the enacting clause of the bill, and obtain for their country a reputation which, as individuals, they would be unwilling to own.

I see, said Mr. D., another item to, which I will also ask the attention of the House for a moment. It is money advanced to relieve the necessities of Thomas Paine. The sum is not large, but too large for a poor man to lose. At the period of indiscriminate slaughter, during the French revolution, Paine was seized and incarcerated, but through accident his life was spared, though he was kept immured in a loathsome cell until he almost perished from suffering. In this situation he made an appeal to the minister for protection as a foreigner, and through his interposition was liberated; but he was worn down with disease, penury, and want. He had no one to appeal to but the minister of his adopted country. This appeal was made, and for the honor of my country I feel sincerely thankful it was not made in vain.

I am aware, sir, that this individual has justly forfeited much of his character, and that in aftertimes his memory has been held in low estimation by a large portion of the people of this country; but sir, if we go back to the revolution, and read the effusions of his pen at that period, the patriotic feeling kindled by them will teach us that the author of the Crisis will not be forgotten while we are a free people. What, sir, would have been said of the American minister if he had repulsed the appeal, and left the man to perish? His conduct would have been reprobated as disgraceful to himself and dishonorable to the nation. It would have fixed on him a stain which neither time nor circumstance could efface. He knew too well his obligation as a minister, and a citizen, to pursue such a blind, selfish course. He took him under his protection, and provided for his wants; and it is said this lays no foundation for a legal claim. Agreed; but will gentlemen say there is no equity in it? Will they plead the statute of limitations? Will they lay hold of an expression of Mr. Monroe, where he says he asks no pay for it? This will do, sir, for clerks of yonder department, who have no power to act otherwise, but it cannot become a magnanimous and generous people, in settling the accounts of one of their most distinguished servants. The money was paid—it came out of private funds—it was advanced by the individual for the honor of the country—it has never been refunded—I repeat, are gentlemen prepared to say there is no equity in this?

I see among the enumerated items certain claims for interest, because the principal was withheld. Now it may be said that the matter should have been settled earlier. This may be so, but still there are reasons for the delay, which ought to be respected. The individual says his relations to this Government were such, that he felt unwilling to bring forward his demands, lest he should be thought to use the powers and influence of office to aid selfish purposes. Sir, this is a feeling honorable to him who entertained it, and worthy of all imitation—he was willing to come to the level of a private citizen before he asked you to settle a disputed claim. Sir, I will not say interest is due, but I would have the matter looked into by the accounting officers; and I should not stand upon nice technical rules, but do that which in itself is right and honorable; and I hope the claimant expects no more.

I could go more at large into this account, and speak of the arduous services of this individual while he did the duties of two departments, and put forth the utmost of his exertions to replenish the empty treasury, by pledging his honor and property, but these observations illustrate my views. The claimant has not a strictly legal demand, but he appeals to our justice—he calls on us to deal by him as one honest man deals by another; and for one, sir, I will not disobey the call. I will not stand on the ground of special pleaders, but will look into the whole matter; and if it be right to grant a sum of money, I will vote for it, under a full belief that I ought so to do, and that it will be the most acceptable service I can perform to my constituents, for they are too liberal and too enlightened to desire to enrich the public by wronging an individual.

I could say something of the public services of Mr. Monroe, and of the humiliating spectacle of a fellow-citizen who has held the highest places of honor and trust in this great republic, struggling with abject poverty, but I forbear, as this topic has been pressed with great eloquence on the one hand, and repelled with equal ability on the other. Perhaps it ought to have little influence in deciding this question. One thing, however, is certain; this man has not grown rich at the public expense, and this is a strong proof of honesty.

Sir, I rose to make these explanations, merely that the House might not vote under false impressions; and I will resume my seat, by expressing a hope that the enacting clause will not be struck out, but the bill will be so amended as to give the claimant some suitable compensation for his public services and sacrifices.

After a few remarks from Mr. MERCER, and a reply by Mr. POLK to Mr. M. and Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts,

The question was taken on agreeing with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the enacting clause of the bill, and decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 109.

Mr. MERCER then moved to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert the amendment which he had before read. Pending which motion,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved an adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, hoped the gentleman would withdraw the motion for one minute, to enable him to ask leave of absence for his colleague [Mr. GORHAM] for ten days.

Mr. WILLIAMS consenting, leave was granted, as requested.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

The resolution of Mr. POTTER, to amend the rule which limits debate on resolutions and the presentation of reports to one hour in each day, was again taken up.

[When this resolution was under consideration a few days ago, Mr. POTTER made a few observations in regard to it, one of which produced a general smile in the House. Adverting to the operation of the rule which limits the consideration of resolutions to a single hour on each day, frequently cutting off a speech which might have been near its conclusion but for the intervention of the rule, he said that the effect of it was to give time to the orator to recuperate, and resume his speech the next day with fresh materials and fresh vigor. Mr. P. had scarcely pronounced these words, when the Speaker apprised the gentleman that the hour had expired, and he must suspend his further observations for this day. Whereupon, Mr. P. observed that there could not have been a better illustration of the remark which he had just made, than that which the present case furnished, if he should feel disposed to avail himself of the interval of a day to prepare a set speech.]

Mr. POTTER added a few words on the subject. He spoke of the numerous and complicated rules of the House, and of the many instances in which gentlemen were declared to be out of order, from the want of a proper knowledge of them. He concluded by moving to refer the resolution to a select committee, with instructions to amend the rules generally.

Mr. MERCER had one suggestion to make before the resolution was agreed to. By the present rule of the House, should the previous question be demanded, and sustained, it shut out all amendments which had been previously made to a bill, and the question recurred on the original bill itself. He hoped that rule would undergo an amendment, so as to avoid this singular operation.

The resolution was then agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE SURPLUS REVENUE.

The resolution submitted some days since, to authorize the printing of 6,000 copies of the report of the committee to which was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States as relates to a distribution of the surplus revenue, was next taken up.

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, said, he would ask the indulgence of the House but for a very few moments, while he stated his objections to the motion under consideration. Having had the honor to be upon the committee by which the report was presented, and dissenting as he did to most of the doctrines contained in it, he availed himself of that mode and opportunity to explain the extent of his dissent, and very briefly to give his views of the subject referred to the committee, in preference to the more common one of submitting them in the form of a counter report. This being the chief object for which he had risen, said Mr. E., I trust it will not be imputed to me, that I have any desire to suppress this report, or to withhold it in the smallest degree from the public eye, or to restrain it from the most extensive circulation which its friends can wish. All such motives I utterly disclaim. Indeed, if I could be governed by such considerations, and were really anxious to restrict its circulation, I am fully sensible how utterly unattainable that object is. The questions discussed in the report have for a long period agitated the public mind; and all that argument, and learning, and eloquence could bring to aid the decision of them, has long since been exhausted. The controversy is, however, still carried on in the public journals, and political parties have taken different sides, and are endeavoring to sustain themselves in their views upon these topics. Now, is it for a moment to be supposed that the report in question will not be extensively circulated and spread before the people, even if the present motion should fail? If it be an able and convincing argument, will not the presses, and the party who concur in it, spread it as on the wings of the wind? Will it not be published and republished, applauded, scrutinized, canvassed; nay, forced upon public attention? Such surely is the fate of all public documents of this description. If, however, I regarded it as of an opposite character; if in my judgment it is feeble and unfounded, then surely I can have no other motive than to give it the most extensive circulation possible: for in proportion as it fails to establish the truth of the propositions which it maintains, it adds strength and support to the opposite principles. When, too, it is considered how very small the number proposed to be printed is, compared with the number of people to be supplied, can it be supposed that a refusal to adopt the motion will, in any sensible degree, restrain it from the public attention? What is six thousand distributed among the two millions or more of qualified voters in the United States? If this number be ordered, the share of each member is about twenty-five; and what is twenty-five to be distributed among more than ten thousand? Sir, I make these suggestions only to show that I cannot be influenced by any wish to withhold the report of the committee from the public examination; and I hope, after this avowal, I shall not have occasion again to repeat it.

My objection, Mr. Speaker, to the motion before you, is of another character. It is this—that, by ordering this extraordinary number printed for the avowed purpose of distribution among the people, the House will give its sanction to the doctrines contained in the report—doctrines which I am sure a majority of this House does not entertain. Sir, this case stands upon different grounds from those usually presented, where a large number of documents have been ordered to be printed. I am aware that we have in many instances caused as numerous an edition of public papers to be issued as is now requested. In relation to Executive reports, communicated to Congress at each session by the heads of departments, there is manifest propriety in the practice which has obtained; for these contain the history of the operations of the Government in its different branches, of which every citizen ought to be truly informed. These are collections of facts and useful knowledge never before published, and not arguments upon disputed points of constitutional power, of which there is already an abundant supply in print. The motion, I think, can derive no aid from this precedent. The House have, it is true, caused reports of its committees to be published in the manner now requested, on various other occasions; and I presume these will be relied upon as precedents for the present motion. But I apprehend they will also fail to sustain it. How stands this case, compared with those? The reports of committees are generally in accordance with the known sentiments of a majority of the House. The House does not, therefore, by printing an extraordinary number, give its sanction to doctrines which it does not profess, and which, by its action upon subjects before it, it expressly negatives. Again, reports are usually accompanied by bills, or resolutions, which are presented to the House for its adoption or refusal; and, by its proceedings upon these, it has an opportunity of expressing its assent or dissent to the reasonings of the report. But, in the present instance, no such opportunity exists. The report is accompanied by no bill or resolution; it recommends nothing to the adoption of the House; it invites no legislative action, and has been laid upon the table at the motion of the chairman, never again to be disturbed. Sir, if the report had been accompanied by a series of resolutions expressive of the sense of the House, in accordance with the sentiments of the report, and upon which the House could be called to pronounce its judgment, the objection which I have urged would have less force. But, in the absence of this, the House has no possible mode of avoiding the conclusion which to me seems inevitable, that the printing of the report for general distribution is a sanction and adoption of the principles which it maintains. I am not forgetful, sir, that a practice has obtained latterly, of printing the same number of the report of a minority of a committee, as of the majority, in those cases where opposite reports have been made. This is a practice of modern origin, and is not liable to the objections existing against the present motion. It stands upon a different ground, and is allowed merely from a feeling of courtesy and respect to the members who differ from a majority of the committee, and a majority of the House, upon a subject which that majority deem it suitable and proper to discuss, and to spread the results of that discussion before the people. Nothing more could be drawn from that precedent than this—when the majority of the House have ordered a large number of reports containing their opinions and doctrines, and the arguments in support of them, to be published, a proper sense of courtesy will induce them also to publish the sentiments, upon the same topics, of the minority. In such a case, the whole proceeding shows that the House does not intend to give its sanction to the views of the minority. It could never be understood in that sense. But, in the present case, the majority of the House have no report expressive of their opinions upon the great subjects under discussion, which they propose to publish: they do not attempt to send a labored argument to the people, to sustain the principles by which they are governed in their legislative action. It is not a case, therefore, where the minority of a committee, or of the House, ask of the courtesy of the majority that their sentiments may be heard in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the majority deem suitable to adopt in relation to their own opinions. But the case is this—the minority of the House, speaking through a majority of the committee, ask that their opinions and arguments may be published and distributed at the expense of the Government, upon a subject which the majority have not discussed, and where they do not propose to embody their opinions in the form of a report, for distribution among the people. For a case of this description, sir, I know of no precedent. For myself, I will never refuse to allow the minority to appeal to the public in this mode, when the majority assume it for themselves; but in no other case will I give my sanction in this form to a report of a committee in which I do not concur; more especially when the subject of that report is not presented to the cognizance of the House, and no mode is left by which it can express its judgment upon it.

Having thus, said Mr. E., explained the ground of my objection to the motion before you, I will now proceed very briefly to state what the report is, and the extent of my dissent from the doctrines which it advocates. And, in the first place, I had the misfortune to differ from my colleagues on the committee as to the precise subject which was referred to it. In my judgment, the only subject which they were directed to consider, was that part of the message relative to the distribution of the surplus funds among the several States, in proportion to their representation in Congress. This was the simple inquiry; and there is surely enough in it to engage the calm and deliberate attention of Congress. It involved an examination of the constitutionality of the proposed measure, into its expediency, into the proposed rule of distribution, and the extent to which Congress ought to retain control over the disbursements, should the proposed plan be adopted. In a proper consideration of these and other topics necessarily connected with the subject, I did not suppose that the subject of internal improvement, generally, was involved, and much less that an inquiry into the constitutional power of the General Government to prosecute works of this description was submitted to the committee. It seems to me that the House, having appointed a select committee upon internal improvements, and having referred to it expressly so much of the message as relates to the mode of prosecuting them by subscriptions to stock in incorporated companies, have very clearly marked the line of separation between these topics, which, in some degree approached each other, and have designated the appropriate duties of each of these committees. The majority have thought otherwise, and have discussed at considerable length the long-debated question of the constitutional power of Congress to make appropriations for works of internal improvement, and have arrived at the conclusion that the exercise of this power, in any of the modes in which it has been practised, is an infringement upon the constitution. I also differ with the majority in this conclusion, believing with the President, whose opinions the committee have not failed copiously to bring to their aid on other particulars, "that the right to make appropriations for such [works] as are of a national character had been so generally acted upon, and so long acquiesced in by the Federal and State Governments, and the constituents of each, as to justify its exercise on the ground of continued and uninterrupted usage." I am aware, sir, that the sentiments of the President, conveyed in his message at the last session, returning the bill for the Maysville turnpike, have been differently understood in different places, and by different parties, and are, perhaps, not readily to be discovered. Yet, I believe, in that document, as well as in the message at the commencement of the present session, the President means to assert the constitutional power of the General Government over works of this description, and places his objection only upon the local and limited character of the particular works in the bills before him. If the subject were now presented for the first time, I should be disposed to give to it the most full and deliberate consideration, and perhaps to obtain from the people, by spreading our sentiments before them for their examination, an expression of their opinion; but it is now quite too late in the day to discuss a question upon which argument has been exhausted, and a decision long since made, and sustained, as the President asserts, "by the Federal and State Governments, and the constituents of each." Sir, this House has sustained that decision in repeated instances, and has passed acts appropriating money to works of internal improvement, founded clearly upon its constitutional power so to do. Now, sir, what are we asked to do? Why, to give our sanction to a report expressly denying this power—to accuse ourselves of gross inconsistency, and a violation of the constitution, in numberless instances. I think, sir, the time has gone by, when a discussion of this question can be useful. At the last session, a distinguished gentleman from Virginia, no longer a member, [Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,] who has been among the ablest and most constant and persevering opposers of the doctrine, expressly waived the discussion: he said it had been practically settled—that argument had been exhausted upon it—and nothing now remained to be said. Every thing which ingenuity, and talent, and learning, and eloquence, could contribute, had been lavished in its discussion; and I then thought, and still think, that no new light can be thrown upon the subject, by further discussions. Is it right or useful further to agitate the public mind—to open a question which the people have already settled—to renew arguments which they have overruled, and more especially to accuse ourselves before them of a direct violation of the constitution? In my judgment, it is not. Having disposed of the question of the constitutional power of Congress over the works in question, the committee proceeded to a consideration of their constitutional power to make the proposed distribution among the several States; and I do not know, sir, that I dissent from the opinions of the majority on this part of the subject. I am rather disposed to concur with them in believing that Congress does not possess the power, or rather that it is of a character too questionable to admit of its being exercised. It stands, in my opinion, upon a totally different principle from that upon which internal improvements have been made. The funds of the country belong to the whole people, as one people, and one country, and are to be disbursed for the benefit of the whole people. The proposition is, to distribute them among the States, in the language of the message, "for domestic use."

Distribution of the Surplus Revenue.

Now, sir, while I can readily believe in the power of the Government to disburse its funds for the general welfare and defence, and to make improvements of a national character, I cannot so easily find the authority to dispense it for the domestic uses of the States. Having come to this conclusion, as the committee did, unanimously, I believe, it seemed to me that nothing more was required of them than to report their opinion to the House, and to leave the subject to their pleasure. As to the expediency of making the proposed distribution, provided the constitution had authorized it, I have not felt it necessary yet to form an opinion. That it has recommendations worthy of consideration, probably will be denied by no one; and that it is not "free from objections," and is "attended with difficulty," the President himself asserts in his message. What, sir, would be thought of the idea of distributing the money expended in fortifications, among the States according to the rule proposed, to be appropriated by them for those objects? What would be said of a proposition to make this equal and exact appropriation, in time of war, to the States for their defence and security? Would these be listened to for a moment? Certainly not. All public expenditures must be made according to the particular exigency of the case, and in a manner best to promote the public safety and welfare. And yet, sir, why is it not as just and proper that these and all other public disbursements shall be expended equally in the several States according to their representation, in order that each may share in the favors of the General Government, as that this particular disbursement should be so distributed? Works of internal improvement are designed and prosecuted with a view to the defence and security of the country, and to augment its strength and power, as well as fleets and fortifications; and ought there to be any other rule in the construction of them, than to regard their importance to the general welfare? The President suggests in his message that it may be proper for Congress to reserve the power in certain cases over the disbursement of the funds by the States. Now, sir, it appears to me that the cases of this description are the only cases, where the public funds ought to be expended at all; and, therefore, that Congress ought to retain the power in all cases. But, sir, it is not my purpose to go into a full discussion of these subjects at this time; and I have alluded only to some of the difficulties suggested by the Executive, which seem to me to have much weight. To obviate these, and to render the scheme successful in its operation, he regards it only necessary to appeal to the patriotism of the people—to the example of the framers of the constitution, and to a spirit of “mutual concession and reciprocal forbearance,” which he trusts will never be invoked in vain. Sir, these are powerful considerations, and such as will never be disregarded by the friends of our country and its institutions. But I am at a loss to know why they are not as effective to overcome the evils supposed to exist in the mode at present pursued, why they may not be wished with equal success now, as to obviate the difficulties of the proposed substitute.

If, at every obstacle, real or imaginary, which may spring up in the progress of our Government, experiments are to be tried, new paths explored, new provisions incorporated into the constitution, what shall we exhibit but the perpetual fluctuations and instability which have been characteristic of popular Governments in all ages? And is this a spectacle we are solicitous to hold up to the view of the world?

There is another topic introduced into the report of the committee, which I did not regard as submitted to their consideration; and that is, the expediency of so modifying the tariff as to diminish, if not wholly prevent, the accumulation of funds more than are required for the ordinary expenses of the Government. The message assumes that a surplus will remain in the treasury after the public debt shall have been paid, and, in the happening of that contingency, proposes the inquiry as to the mode of its distribution. Now, sir, whether or not such a surplus will remain, is not a matter for the consideration of this committee, or this Congress. If, when the anticipated period arrives, I shall be honored with the confidence of my constituents, and retain a seat in the councils of the nation, I shall not fail to co-operate in affording relief from any duties or taxes which can be granted, consistent with that protection to American industry and enterprise, which is required by a proper regard to the happiness, prosperity, and independence of the country. I shall not aid in raising a revenue by any species of taxation upon the people, for the purpose of prosecuting works of internal improvement, or for distribution among the States for their “domestic use;” but, on the other hand, I shall not acquiesce in withdrawing the plighted protection of the Government from these branches of manufactures, which are regarded as “objects of national importance,” “essential to national defence,” or which, after temporary protection, may fairly be expected to become sources of national wealth, and to compete successfully with the productions of foreign labor.

Mr. JARVIS, of Maine, said, when I made the motion for printing an extra number of copies of the report of the Committee on the Surplus Revenue, I certainly did not expect to encounter any opposition; still less, sir, did I expect that the opposition would come from my colleague, who is a member of that committee. Had he favored us with his presence when the question was considered by the committee, I cannot but believe that he would have acquiesced in the propriety of having the subject submitted to our constituents. Sir, I will not be seduced into following my colleague through the mazes of his arguments. If, upon the bare question of printing, the custom should prevail of taking so wide a range, and of entering into constitutional discussions, the House of Representatives would cease to be a hall of legislation, and would degenerate into a debating club.

The question of the disposal of the surplus revenue was first offered to the consideration of Congress by the patriarch of the republican party; it has been twice, ay, thrice, urged upon our attention by the present Chief Magistrate. It is a subject which involves the yearly disposal of millions of treasure; it is a subject which involves constitutional considerations of the greatest importance. My colleague objects to the printing of the report in which these matters of high moment are considered, because it contains no facts. How long, sir, have we adopted this criterion?

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads made at the last session an able report on the subject of the Sunday mails. It contained no facts; it was merely an argument; and yet no opposition was made to the printing. At this session, the Committee on Manufactures made a report, which was ordered to be printed; notwithstanding the committee had told us on the very threshold of their report, that we were to expect neither facts nor arguments from them; their report was one of opinions!

Another objection is, that, by printing the report, the House gives its sanction to the opinions it contains. If so, sir, this House may be, and often is, placed in an awkward predicament; for an illustration of which, I will again refer to the Committee on Manufactures. That committee, as we have lately been informed by a member of it on the floor of this House, is split into three parts. One part looks upon the tariff of 1828, that child of many fathers, as a model of beauty and perfection; another part considers it a rickety, deformed urchin, which, however, has some stamina, and, by dint of great care and good nursing, may be reduced into some shape and comeliness; a third part regards it as a monstrous abortion, which ought to have been strangled at its birth. The report, and a counter report from different parts of this committee, have already been printed, and the opinion of the third part would also have been printed by the House, if its views had been submitted to us. Then, according to the doctrine of my colleague, the House would have exhibited the singular anomaly of entertaining three different opinions upon one and the same subject. It would have regarded the tariff as perfect, indifferent, and execrable! Sir, my colleague would transform us into a moral monster, surpassing the fabled monsters of antiquity. In the legends of former days, we read of monsters having three heads; but we, sir, should be a monster having three minds. A flight of the the imagination beyond the wildest fictions of poetry.

Sir, the subject of the surplus revenue has been carefully, diligently, and scrupulously examined and scanned by the committee to whom it was referred. The result of their investigation is contained in the report of which I have moved to have an extra number of copies printed. The report has been drawn up with great care, and not without labor; and I trust that the House will extend to it the same indulgence which it has extended to other reports not surpassing it in interest or importance.

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, said he was in favor of the proposition to print six thousand copies of the report in question. The time was now distinctly in view, at which, in all human probability, it would be necessary to provide for the disposition of a large annual surplus of revenue. There was, it seemed to him, great propriety, at this time, in drawing to it the public attention. This report, by being circulated among the people, will have that effect. The public mind being drawn to the subject thus early, will probably have digested some mode of disposing of this surplus, before the occasion for immediate action arrives, and all the difficulties usually attendant upon a matter of so much magnitude on its first appearance, be avoided.

He would now attend to some of the objections which had been advanced by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] against the motion to print an extra number of this report. And first, if he [Mr. C.] rightfully understood that gentleman, he objected to the printing of the proposed number of the document, because that number was too insignificant to answer any good end; the share of each member would not amount to more than (about) twenty-five copies, and this number, distributed in each member's district, could produce no sensible effect. [Here the gentleman from Maine rose, and, the floor being yielded to him, stated that the gentleman from Virginia had misconceived him. He did not intend the remark which had been quoted as an argument, but merely as a remark to show that he had no fears that, by printing this small number of the document, impressions would be made upon the public mind, unfavorable to his views of the subject which it professes to treat.] Mr. C. said he was glad to be corrected. He had no wish to misinterpret the arguments or remarks of gentlemen.

Mr. C. said he had understood the gentleman to say, that to print this document would be, in effect, to give the sanction of this House to the principles which it contains. This is an assertion, not of intuitive truth, and requires proof. The proof had not been furnished, and, therefore, he might be excused for disputing its correctness. He contended that the order to print would not usher the document forth to the world under its implied sanction of the principles which it contains. The order to print would only sanction the propriety of submitting the subject to the public, for examination—to be approved if deemed to be correct—to be rejected if deemed erroneous.

The object of the motion he [Mr. C.] understood to be, not to forestall or act upon public opinion, but, as he had already stated, to arouse the attention of the whole people to a subject of great interest—to the subject of a distribution or other disposition of the annual surplus revenue, after the extinguishment of the national debt; an event which would, with a moral certainty, take place in three or four years.

Can it be believed that the early agitation of principles among the people is calculated to expose them to the influence of error? Sir, said Mr. C., I apprehend this is the very mode of avoiding error. Truth is great, and gains strength by exposure. The more it is agitated in the public mind, the surer is its final triumph over its natural adversary—error. I cannot then think that any bad consequence can possibly result from the printing of this document. But, on the contrary, it may produce good effects, by offering inducements to the people at large to take, thus early, into their consideration the great subject of the surplus revenue, and to prepare their opinions for the emergency when it shall arrive.

The gentleman from Maine, said Mr. C., asks with considerable emphasis, will the House permit the printing of a document which contains principles in opposition to the sentiments of a majority of the House? Has the gentleman considered the extent of the principle indicated by this question? Does he intend to deny to the minority all rights and privileges? Shall the majority be allowed to avail themselves of all the means afforded, by a command over the treasury, to propagate their dogmas, to the exclusion of the minority? Or does the gentleman mean to assume that the majority is infallible? This question savors strongly of Popish intolerance—we are right, you are wrong. In mercy to your dangerous condition, we will force you to the standard of our faith. We will, at least, prevent you from giving currency to your heresies. [Mr. C. was proceeding, when the Chair announced the expiration of the hour allotted to the discussion.]

[The following are the resolutions submitted by Mr. MARTIN, to the report of the Committee on the Distribution of the Surplus Revenue:

“Resolved, That the power of taking money from the people, by laying and collecting duties, imposts, and excises, is one of the most sacred of the trusts vested in Governments; that it is conferred solely to enable them to command the necessary means to execute the objects for which they were instituted; and that to exact money from the people when not necessary for those objects, or more than may be necessary, would be, on the part of the Government, a manifest breach of trust, and to the people unjust and oppressive.

“Resolved, That the General Government was created by the people of the States for certain general objects, to execute which, particular and specific powers, enumerated in the constitution, were conferred on it, and, among others, the power of laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, which, like the other powers, was conferred solely as means for effecting the common objects entrusted to the Union; and that, for the General Government to collect taxes, to distribute the proceeds among the several States, would be in fact to acknowledge that the money is not necessary for those common objects, and would, therefore, be not only unjust and oppressive, but a direct and palpable violation of the constitution itself.

“Resolved, That to collect money to be distributed among the States, must, in its consequences, put to hazard all the objects for which the General Government was formed, as it would necessarily create in all the States powerful factions, whose object would be to obtain a control over the sums distributed, and whose influence would be directed to increase the surplus to be distributed, by arresting or demolishing the appropriations of the General Government, however constitutional or proper they might be, while they would be under the most direct and powerful influence to sustain the General Government as a mere engine for the unconstitutional, unjust, and oppressive purposes of collecting money from the people for an object never contemplated by the framers of the constitution, and wholly inconsistent with the purposes for which it was created.

“Resolved, therefore, That to distribute the surplus revenue among the States, would be unjust, unconstitutional, and oppressive, and dangerous to the General Government; and that the only plan that can be devised, that will be at once economical, just, constitutional, and safe, is, by a reduction of taxes, to leave the money, not necessary for the purposes of the Government, in the pockets of those who make it.”]

WOOD FOR THE POOR OF GEORGETOWN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Mayor of Georgetown, relative to the distressed situation of the poor of that city, and soliciting the House to grant a donation of some of the wood in the vaults of the capitol for their present use.

Mr. WASHINGTON said he would not take up the time of the House in explaining the necessity for acting immediately on the application just made. The letter sufficiently explained itself, and he should content himself with simply submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to cause thirty cords of wood to be delivered to the order of the Mayor of Georgetown, for the use of the suffering poor of that town.

Mr. POLK said he knew it was an ungracious task to oppose a resolution in behalf of the suffering poor of this District, or any other country. He must be permitted to remark, however, that the precedent of appropriating the public funds for such purposes was a bad one. The resolution now before the House had come upon it suddenly, and it was not of sufficient consequence to move its postponement. He recollected that, some years ago, there was a fire in the District, to be seen from the windows of the capitol, and an application was immediately made for extending relief to the sufferers. While he was disposed to do full justice to the motives which prompted members, on that occasion, to draw money from the treasury for the relief of the sufferers, he would ask, was the course adopted a proper one? Was the obligation to contribute to the relief of sufferers within the ten miles square greater than to those of other parts of the Union? The very same day that the fire occurred in Alexandria, property, to a far greater extent, was destroyed by the same element in Cincinnati, Ohio; but he had never heard that those sufferers applied to Congress for relief. There were many sufferers in the United States—many objects of charity—but they did not call upon Congress to help them. Continue to pass resolutions of the character of that now before the House, and what would be the consequence? Why, every winter, when the snow fell, or the Potomac was frozen over, applications would be made to Congress, and members would be engaged in the dignified object of buying and stowing wood, to give to the poor of the District of Columbia. Mr. P. remarked that, in opposing the resolution now under consideration, he did it on principle: the House had not the power to make the donation requested. He might be told that Congress was the exclusive Legislature for the District. Be it so. But was that any good reason that they should give away all the revenue of the nation to the people of the District of Columbia? If so, the poor of the other sections of the country had nothing to do but to come and sit down here, in this District, and apply to Congress for relief. It was not to the amount proposed to be given that he objected—no, not the paltry cost of thirty cords of wood; but he would state that gentlemen came here to legislate on the great concerns of the Union, and not to give away the public property. It was not money from the treasury, but the expense was to be defrayed by the contingent fund of this House. That fund was voted for the use of the House; there should be some discretion in its application; and if we may give away a part of it, for purposes other than for what it was intended, we may give away the whole. He might well address himself, on this occasion, to those who, by the operation of the previous question, had cut off all opportunity of remark on a former similar subject. Their motives were kind, no doubt, and he gave them credit for them; a severe storm was raging, and they yielded to their feelings as men. No such reason could be urged now, however; for the present was one of the most pleasant days they had enjoyed for some time. But it was said the poor of Georgetown were suffering—so may be the poor of New York, and other sections of the Union. In conclusion, he trusted that the House would, by its vote today, put a check to legislation on matters of this sort.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina contended, that it was not competent for the House to vote donations of fuel for the people of the District. If so, it would have power also to vote millions of the public money to feed and clothe the suffering poor of the District. The House had no right to give away the public money for any such purpose; and if gentlemen were disposed to be liberal, let them be liberal out of their own money. He, therefore, moved the following substitute, by way of amendment, viz.

“That the Sergeant-at-arms be required to deduct from the compensation of the members of this House one day's pay, and deliver said sum to the Mayor of Georgetown, to be applied to purchase fuel for the paupers of that town: Provided, nevertheless, that such deduction shall be made from the compensation of such members only as vote in favor of this resolution.”

Mr. POLK asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment, observing that he would vote for it with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, asked, what was the Legislature of the District of Columbia? As the answer to that question would imply the power of the House to grant the proposed relief, yet not to grant a similar relief to the people of Ohio, or any other State having its own legislature, Congress stood in the same relation to this territory as the Legislature of New York did to hers. He concluded a few remarks, by demanding the previous question.

The call was seconded, 90 to 86; and the main question was ordered.

The effect of this decision being to set aside the amendment of Mr. BLAIR, the question was put on agreeing to the resolution, and decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 79.

REVOLUTIONARY TRANSACTIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the memorial of the heirs and representatives of the house of Basmarien and Raimbeaux, merchants, of Bordeaux, in France, in the period of the revolutionary war, upon the subject of the claims of said house against the United States, arising out of transactions during the said war; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL CONTEMPTS.

Mr. DRAPER, of Virginia, by leave of the House, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of defining by statute all offenses which may be punished as contempts of the courts of the United States.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. DRAPER said that he had offered this resolution under the deepest sense of duty. It was not his intention, he said, on this occasion, to agitate a question which had been recently much agitated elsewhere. But, said he, I do wish to know upon what tenure the people of this country hold their liberties. I wish to know whether, if I myself choose to go into the public newspapers to vindicate any vote I give here, it be not competent for any man, who thinks proper to do so, to enter the same forum, upon equal ground, to show that my opinion is wrong. If I, as a member of this House, or this House as a body, should set forth to the world any opinion upon a matter before us, has not any one a right, through the same medium, to question the correctness of that opinion? Does not that opinion, from the moment of its publication, become public property? Does it not present as fair a subject for discussion as any that can be presented to the mind of man? The object of such a publication of an opinion is to convince the readers of it that a certain proposition is right. If the object of a publication be to convince the public at large that any particular proposition agitated here is correct, is it not competent for any citizen to call in question the correctness of such an opinion? Surely it is. If, then, we have not the power of promulgating our opinions, under the protection of a garb of official sanctity, I should like to know if any other department of the Government has a right to go before the public with a vindication of its opinions, without any citizen who chooses having the right of reply to them, or comment upon them. This body has, I admit, a right to preserve decorum and order within these walls, and to remove from within them any one who may disturb the proceedings of this House. But if, after having acted upon any subject, a majority of this House shall choose to go into the newspapers, to state the grounds on which we have acted, I maintain that any citizen whatever has a right to meet us there, and contest those grounds. Any solitary individual has, under such circumstances, a right to meet and confront the whole body of the majority of this House. If this reasoning apply to the legislative body, does it not, in an equal degree, apply to every other department of the Government? I maintain that it does. Whenever an individual in office lays aside his official capacity, and endeavors by argument and reason to convince others that any thing which he has done officially, has been done properly, he has a right to be met by whomsoever, differing in opinion from him, in any forum which he himself may select. Believing this, I have prepared this resolution, under a deep sense of the duty which I owe, not only to myself, but to the sixty thousand freemen whom I represent on this floor. I am not for holding my liberty for one moment at the discretion of any individual. It may be said, sir, in opposition to the object of this resolution, that there will be difficulty in defining contempts of court. Though this may be true, we shall find no difficulty in defining what are not contempts. We can embrace, in any legal provision on this subject, many cases which are not contempts. We might say, for example, that it would not be a contempt of court to express an opinion upon any decision finally made in court, &c. We might declare that it should not be a contempt of court in any one to say that a judge is not immaculate. I beg not to be understood, said Mr. D., as here referring to a case which has been lately before the other branch of this Legislature, sitting as a high court of impeachment. Far be it from me to reflect upon the conduct of any individual, who for such conduct has been constitutionally tried, and legally acquitted. But the law ought to be so clear, that every individual may be able to look to the statute book, and know whether, in any thing that he may do, he acts within the law or not. For the security of the rights of the whole people, and for no purpose of invidious allusion or personal gratification, I invite this inquiry. It is proper, sir, that every individual in the community should know what are the laws which he is bound to observe at the peril of his liberty.

Mr. DODDRIDGE, concurring with his colleague in the expediency of this inquiry, suggested to him the propriety of modifying his resolution, by adding to it these words: "and also to limit the punishment for the same."

Mr. DRAPER accepted this modification.

And, thus modified, the resolution was agreed to without a division.

CLAIM OF JAMES MONROE.

The House then took up for consideration the amendment yesterday submitted by Mr. MERCER to the bill for the relief of James Monroe; which was as follows:

"Strike out from the bill all that follows the enacting clause, and insert—

"That the proper accounting officers of the treasury, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of War, and subject to the approval of the President of the United States, be, and they are hereby, authorized to adjust and settle all the accounts and claims of James Monroe, late President of the United States, upon principles of justice and equity.

"And be it further enacted, That, so soon as any amount shall have been found due to the said James Monroe, it shall be paid to him out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to amend the amendment, by striking out all after the word treasury, and inserting the following:

"Be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust all the accounts and claims of James Monroe, late President of the United States, upon the principles of justice and equity.

"And be it further enacted, That the amount of the several accounts and claims, when examined and adjusted, in the manner aforesaid, together with the principle on which each item is founded, shall be reported to Congress for final decision and allowance."

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the House in support of his amendment.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, preferred the amendment submitted by Mr. MERCER, to that then under consideration.

Mr. CHILTON addressed the House at some length against the claim, and replied to the remarks of Messrs. SPENCER, EVERETT, and MERCER. Of the two, he had a preference for that of Mr. WILLIAMS, but thought Congress, instead of Mr. Hagner, should settle the claim.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, thought it would be perfectly safe to refer the accounts of Mr. Monroe to the accounting officers. He hoped they would be settled by them, and never come before Congress again.

Mr. HUNTINGTON would vote for the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, and trusted that, if that should not prevail, the House would act upon the matter at once.

Mr. MALLARY was decidedly in favor of the claim, and would have been willing to relieve the distinguished individual referred to from all his embarrassments. He should support the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DRAYTON thought enough had already been allowed to Mr. Monroe. He referred to former legislation of the House, and spoke, not hearing the arguments of others, but from his own experience.

Mr. ANGEL addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] I shall vote for it on the ground that it reserves to this House the settlement of the principles on which the appropriation for this claim, if allowed, shall be made. By the constitution of the United States, the appropriating power is specially confided to this House. As the immediate representatives of the people, the members of this House are responsible for all moneys drawn from the treasury. The amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] proposes to transfer this responsibility to the Executive Department. Sir, the subject of Executive legislation, as it is called, has become the subject of loud and long complaint. Session after session, and day after day, in each session, we hear gentlemen upon this floor uttering complaints against it. I have not made an examination or estimate, but I have frequently heard it asserted, that the amount of money drawn from the treasury, under Executive legislation, is nearly equal to that drawn from it under the legislation of Congress. The complaints against this irregularity are not confined to this House; they appear in the columns of the newspapers throughout the country, and the people at large are strongly inclined to restrain this practice.

By a reference to the debates upon the constitution, when it was before the people of this country for adoption, you will see that strong fears were entertained that, if the entire revenues of the country were placed at the disposal of the Federal Government, abuses would grow out of that power, and appropriations would be made, inconsistent with the public interest. It was urged that no lasting abuse would ensue; for that, by the constitution, the appropriating power was exclusively confided to the immediate representatives of the people; that they were to be elected once in two years, and were immediately responsible for the exercise of their power to their constituents; that, should they attempt to make an improper disposition of the public funds, a speedy remedy could be found in the frequent recurrence of elections. This argument prevailed, and this House was recognised as the safest depository of the appropriating power. Should this House prove recreant to its duty, and refuse to hold the purse strings of the nation, who will hold them for us? When the immediate representatives manifest an indifference as to the appropriation of the public treasure, can we expect that agents, whose responsibility is more remote, will protect the interests which we abandon? Before we sanction an appropriation, it is our province and our duty to know, to understand, and to settle the principle upon which that appropriation is made. The amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] proposes an unlimited appropriation, and refers the settlement of the principle upon which it is to be made to the Executive Department. What principle that department may adopt, and what amount it may award under the provisions of this amendment, should it become a law, no gentleman here can tell. We endorse the claim in blank, and hand it over to the party, and to agents of remote responsibility, to fill up.

Claim of James Monroe.

Sir, I see no necessity for this reference. The claim, agreeably to the statement of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MERCER,] consists of only nine items. It is not a long account, requiring a tedious examination, or a solution of intricate or embarrassing questions: the facts are all comprised within a narrow compass. They are detailed at length in the report of the committee, and may be examined and understood in two hours, by any gentleman who will devote his attention to them for that length of time. They have been a long time before Congress, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are understood by the members of this House, as well as they can be by gentlemen in the Executive Department. To this House the settlement of the question belongs, and, for one, I will not attempt to evade the responsibility of settling it. From the high character of the claimant, the decision of this claim will unavoidably be drawn into future precedent. It is not the amount which Mr. Monroe alone may draw, that I fear. The appropriation of millions to other individuals, for similar claims, may be made under the rule which this case may establish. This is a claim of dollars and cents, asked as a remuneration for services rendered, and moneys disbursed for the benefit of the Government. The rule established for its allowance must serve as a governing principle in all future cases of claims for like services, and like disbursements. Under this Government, we cannot establish a criterion of partial application. That which is "equity and justice" when applied to the claim of Mr. Monroe, must be equity and justice when applied to every other claim of similar character.

From the peculiar character of this claim, and from its general notoriety, I feel extremely desirous that it should be settled by the appropriate tribunal—by the public agents, under an immediate responsibility to the people, who feel the weight of that responsibility, and who can be most readily brought to account for their discharge of this duty.

My objection to sending the claim to the Executive Department for settlement and liquidation, does not arise from a want of confidence in that department. For the President, and his cabinet, I entertain a high regard; but, great as is my confidence in them, I desire that they should not be required to execute a duty not properly devolving upon them. I am also averse to embarrassing them with this question. Let the appropriate duties of each branch of the Government be kept separate, and let each stand responsible for its action. I consider it ungenerous, on the part of this House, to attempt to shift its responsibility to the President of the United States. I have no doubt but that he would do justice; and let him be ever so just, there are those who will endeavor to torture his acts to his prejudice.

Sir, it was with great reluctance that I was impelled to say any thing upon this subject; but, from the course which the debate upon the question has taken, and from the remarks which have fallen from the advocates of the claim, I should have been wanting in duty and respect to myself, had I given a silent vote, without repelling the charges of illiberality and ingratitude made against those who vote against the claim. I am not content to be branded with illiberality or ingratitude, and yield a seeming assent by passive silence.

In doors, and out of doors, every thing that could be put in requisition, has been brought to bear upon this claim. Gentlemen upon this floor have addressed us in the most feeling and pathetic manner, in behalf of the claimant. We have been told of his early, constant, and devoted patriotism; of his long, arduous, and valuable services; of his sufferings, his wants, and his distresses: the power of eulogy has been exhausted in portraying the virtues and character of the man. Far be it from me, sir, to detract from his merit. I acknowledge the high character that has been assigned him. I acknowledge his patriotism, his services, and the debt of gratitude we owe him. If he be poor, and in want, he has my sympathies; and, were it in my power, consistently with the duties I owe to the station I hold, I should cheerfully aid in his relief; but, in the discharge of my duty to the public, I must be governed by my judgment, not by my sympathies.

In addition to what has passed upon this floor, an extraneous influence has been put in motion, with a view to operate upon the members of this body. Public meetings have been held in different places, and resolutions have been passed expressive of their sense of the justice and equity of this claim. These resolutions have been ushered upon us as the evidence of public sentiment, and universal anxiety of the people for the relief of Mr. Monroe. When it is alleged that, from the complicated nature of this claim, the members of this House, who have examined it, and whose duty it has been to investigate and understand it, are incompetent to decide it, and that it is, therefore, necessary to send it to the Executive Department to be settled, shall we take the expressions of those meetings as the rule of our action? Probably not one in a hundred who attended them, had ever looked into the documents relating to it, or could assign any reason for its allowance, other than that Mr. Monroe deserves well of the country.

The only ground on which this claim could be sustained for a moment, is, that of a pecuniary indebtedness by the Government. Mr. Monroe does not ask us to bestow it upon him as a gift; and should we be so regardless of our duty as to abandon the well established rules of legal adjudication, and, instead of awarding him a debt actually his due, should insult him with the offer of a gift, has he not too much of the American in him to accept it? It is a debt that he claims, and Congress is both court and jury to try the question, and assess his damages. Now, sir, what would be said of a court or jury who, in forming a judgment on a claim for money, should look at, hear, or regard the decisions or recommendations of a town, county, or city meeting? These are designed to express the general judgment on subjects of policy; but they are unfit tribunals to prescribe rules for the legal adjustment of pecuniary demands, and it savors somewhat of the demagogue to apply them in such cases.

Letter writers at Washington have furnished the editors of papers with statements reflecting upon the conduct of members of this House, some for voting against, and others for their inattention to this claim. These letters have been published, and the papers sent here; and is it uncharitable to suppose that the design was to influence the final vote upon this question? Now, sir, in the discharge of my duty as a member of this House, I cannot permit myself to be seduced by any art of persuasion, or intimidated through fear of popular denunciation, to act counter to my views of justice and propriety.

Sir, if it be now in order to advert to the merits of this claim, I will take the liberty to express my opinion upon them. I am aware of the ungracious office I have to perform in opposing this claim. A claim identified with the name, and services, and sufferings of James Monroe, is calculated to draw to it a generous feeling, and to inspire a confidence in its merit.

In 1826, a portion of this claim, together with other items, was pending before Congress. The subject elicited great interest, and underwent a thorough investigation by the members of this House at that time. I then had the honor of a seat here; it became my duty to act upon it, and I bestowed great attention upon its merits. I sat down to an examination with feelings of strong predilection in its favor. I had a high veneration, and boundless regard, for the character and services of the man. I felt an earnest desire to find proofs which would authorize me to give it my support. I will not say that I examined it impartially; for my feelings strongly preponderated in favor of the claimant. I was reconciled, then, to an allowance of a portion of the thirty thousand dollars then allowed him; but such was the result of my examination, that I was compelled to vote against the allowance of the whole amount.

Previous to presenting the claim to Congress, Mr. Monroe had applied to the proper department for its allowance. It had undergone the examination and decision of gentlemen who were then in the administration. The examination by the department took place at a period when the facts and the circumstances connected with the claim were fresh in the recollection, and clearly within the knowledge of those whose duty it then was to pass upon it. The gentlemen of the department, who then audited and liquidated Mr. Monroe's claims, were his contemporaries in service, and were his personal and political friends. Not satisfied with their rejection of certain items for extra expenses, and for interest, he presented the question to Congress, and asked that those items might be settled by that body, upon principles of justice and equity. After a lapse of more than fifteen years from the time the subject was passed upon by the department, Congress was induced to pass a bill allowing, in addition to the allowances by the department, the sum of twenty-nine thousand five hundred dollars, which was then deemed and considered by the majority of Congress who voted the allowance, to be an ample and liberal liquidation and payment of all that was due to Mr. Monroe, upon principles of law, justice, and equity; and inserted a clause in the bill, declaratory of its being in full of all his claims upon the Government. It seems that further justice and equity is now called for. If the bill of 1826 was a satisfaction in full of all his claims, the appropriation to be made by the present bill, if it became a law, must be a donation, and not a payment. The Congress of 1826 became the arbiters between Mr. Monroe and the Treasury Department. Their award was obligatory upon the treasury to pay; and, under the terms of the act, the acceptance of the money by Mr. Monroe cannot but be considered as obligatory upon him. Reciprocity of obligation upon the parties must be irresistibly implied.

In looking into the report of the committee of last session, who reported the bill under consideration, it will be seen that upwards of twenty-four thousand dollars now reported as being due to Mr. Monroe, and incorporated in the bill, consists of items rejected by the Congress of 1826. Three thousand dollars and upwards, of this latter sum, is for contingent expenses, alleged to have accrued in England and France during his mission to those countries. In 1826, when his claim for contingent expenses was before the committee, they allowed him for those expenses a sum equal to the average allowed to other ministers in like cases. His charge for those expenses was not backed by vouchers, but exhibited in gross. The charge was found to exceed the average allowed to other ministers by upwards of three thousand dollars, and the excess was therefore rejected by that committee. The balance of this twenty-four thousand dollars is made up of interest alleged to have accrued upon his claims against the Government previous to December, 1810, at which time he exhibited his accounts, and settled with the department. The committee of 1826 rejected this interest, on the ground that its allowance would be contrary to the usage of the Government in all other cases. It was upon the principle that no laches were imputable to the Government; that it was always ready to pay its creditors when they should exhibit their accounts, and demand payment. This principle is in consonance with the principles of the common law, which declares that an unliquidated demand shall not draw interest, though the creditor may omit to make his demand for years. This rule prevails both in law and equity, and the allowance of this interest would be a perversion of the established rule of each. Sir, I object to its allowance in this case, for the reason that it would be a manifestation of fickleness on the part of the Government. It would be an innovation upon its fixed and established rules; those rules to which the claims of all its creditors are subject. Adopt this principle in your settlements, and there are claims enough of this description, to draw from your treasury many millions of dollars. Give notice, by the establishment of this precedent, that such claims are allowable, and you will be overwhelmed with them. Suppose you relax the rule in this particular case only, what will the next claimant say to you when you reject his claim, predicated upon the identical principle with this? Will he not have a right to demand of you even-handed justice? and will he not have just grounds for murmur and complaint, if you try his claim by one rule, and Mr. Monroe's by another?

Sir, it is our pride, and our every day's boast, that our citizens all enjoy equal rights, and are all entitled to equal privileges. What room for comment upon your boasted equality would not the allowance of this claim afford?

In 1826, the items exhibited for services and disbursements amounted to about eighteen thousand dollars. The excess then claimed over that sum was exclusively for interest accrued upon it. The principal was reduced by deducting from it the three thousand dollars before mentioned, and Mr. Monroe was allowed, by the bill passed at that session, above fifteen thousand dollars of the principal of his alleged demand, with the interest on the same from December, 1810, up to the passage of that act; which interest amounted to more than fourteen thousand dollars.

Should we now allow the twenty-four thousand dollars then rejected, we should pay to Mr. Monroe the eighteen thousand dollars of principal he then claimed, with upwards of thirty-five thousand dollars interest upon the same. No such claim ever was, or ever should be, allowed by this Government. Since 1826, several additional items have been annexed to those then claimed. The merits of these items have been canvassed, and clearly explained upon this floor, by gentlemen who have preceded me in opposition to this bill. I will not say that these additional items have since been hunted up, as an apology for allowing to Mr. Monroe a sum of money; but I will say, that it appears to me extraordinary that they should have been omitted when the claim was before presented. I have examined them, and I concur with the gentlemen who have represented their utter groundlessness. It is unnecessary to repeat their arguments, and I will not detain the House by doing so.

We have heard it alleged in this debate that the people of this country desire the allowance of this claim, and that, should its decision be submitted to them, they would be nearly unanimous in its favor. Sir, it is possible that, if it should go to them under the partial representations of its friends in this House, they would declare in favor of its justice; but should the other side of the story be told them—should they be told, as is the fact, that Mr. Monroe had, within the last thirty-four years, received the sum of about four hundred thousand dollars for his services and expenses, which amounts to an allowance of over thirty dollars a day for all that time; that, in addition to this allowance, we voted him money enough in 1826 to load a wagon with Spanish milled dollars, and that we were now called upon to give him sufficient to load two other wagons, it is not so clear to me that they would call us illiberal or ungrateful for withholding it.

Sir, a pecuniary debt to an individual for services rendered, and moneys disbursed, is one thing: a debt of gratitude for his patriotic devotion and unyielding fidelity to the cause of our country, is another. Could I find, amongst the proofs exhibited, the evidence of a pecuniary indebtedness to Mr. Monroe, I would be amongst the first to vote its payment. That we owe him a debt of gratitude, I most cheerfully acknowledge; and when a proposition shall be made to grant him a sum of money as a donation, or pension, I shall be prepared to act upon it. How I should act, is now unnecessary to say. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." I cannot reconcile my judgment to voting a donation, under color of paying off a pecuniary demand.

Mr. CROCKETT remarked, that the talking of gentlemen would not change a single vote, and he therefore demanded the previous question; but withdrew the demand on being informed of its effect.

Mr. HAMMONS renewed the demand.

Mr. MERCER and Mr. WILLIAMS both rose to inquire the effect of the previous question. If sustained, it would do away both the amendments, and the question would recur on the original bill.

Mr. HAMMONS would not withdraw his demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS was perfectly willing that the previous question should be sustained.

The demand for the previous question was not sustained by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS then called for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

Mr. MERCER, in a few words, replied to those gentlemen who had spoken in favor of the amendment of the member from North Carolina, and referred to the statute book to show that seventy-seven cases had been settled on the principles of justice and equity, since the establishment of the present Government.

After a short explanation by Mr. WILLIAMS, the question was put on the amendment offered by him to Mr. MERCER's amendment, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 81.

The question then occurring on the amendment of Mr. MERCER, as amended by the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Mr. HEMPHILL inquired if it would be in order for him to offer an amendment, to supersede that now before the House.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order; but if the House refused to agree to the amendment now under consideration, the gentleman would then have an opportunity to offer his proposition.

Mr. HEMPHILL desired that the amendment he held in his hand should be read, and it was read by the Clerk, as follows:

"Whereas James Monroe has repeatedly memorialized Congress, concerning certain claims: and whereas several committees of the House of Representatives have reported favorably thereon: and whereas, from the lapse of time, and other causes, an accurate opinion cannot be formed as to the amount, leaving a compromise as the only alternative: therefore,

"Be it enacted, &c. That, for public services, losses, and sacrifices, the sum of thirty-six thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid to James Monroe, immediately after the passing of this act, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; which shall be in full of all demands of the said James Monroe for his claims as aforesaid."

The yeas and nays were then ordered on agreeing to Mr. MERCER's amendment as amended; and,

The question being finally put thereon, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Angel, Armstrong, Bailey, Noyes Barber, Barringer, Baylor, James Blair, John Blair, Bockee, Boon, Cahoon, Campbell, Chandler, Chilton, Clay, Conner, Cooper, Cowles, Craig, Cranc, Creighton, Davenport, Warren R. So the amendment as amended was rejected.

The question then recurred on ordering the original bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

On this question Mr. HAYNES demanded the previous question; pending which demand,

Mr. MCCOY moved an adjournment; which prevailed. The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

SALT SPRINGS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the sale of lands in the State of Illinois, reserved for the use of the salt springs on Vermilion river, in that State; which was twice read.

Mr. I. moved that it be made the special order of the day for Monday next; but the motion did not prevail.

Mr. I. then moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MCCOY said that the practice of the House was not what it ought to be. He was tired of hearing the many motions submitted to make bills the special order of the day—thus giving one subject a preference over others. He moved the commitment of the bill.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, explained the object of the bill. It provided for the sale of certain lands in Illinois, reserved for the use of salt springs. The sales of similar lands had taken place in Ohio and other States, for the use of those States; and he could see no good reason why the same course should not be pursued towards Illinois.

Mr. DUNCAN hoped that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McCoy] would not urge his motion to refer the bill to a committee, as such a disposition of it would be equivalent to its rejection. He said that the bill had been reported in conformity with a memorial from the Legislature of the State, and he understood that the proceeds of the sale was to be applied to objects of internal improvement in the State, and the improvement of the navigation of the Wabash river. He said that this subject had been several times before the Committee on the Public Lands, where it had met with some opposition; but he said that committee was now unanimously in favor of the bill just reported, and he hoped the House would now pass it without further delay.

Mr. MCCOY having withdrawn his motion, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

FEB. 2, 1831.]

Surplus Revenue.—Claim of James Monroe.

JAMES MONROE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, for reasons which he stated, moved the reconsideration of the vote by which the House yesterday rejected the amendment to the bill for the relief of James Monroe. He said, if he could possibly see a semblance of correctness in the claim preferred to the House, he would cheerfully vote for it. His object was again to get the amendment back again before the House; if that amendment, as amended on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, should pass, he would prefer it as less questionable than any other shape that could be given to the bill. He called for the yeas and nays on his motion, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. MERCER assigned his reasons for voting against the reconsideration.

The question being put on the motion for reconsideration, it was decided in the negative—yeas 98, nays 101.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

The resolution for printing 6,000 copies of the report of the committee to which was referred so much of the message of the President as relates to the surplus revenue of the Government, next came up; but the hour for the consideration of resolutions having nearly elapsed, the subject was further postponed till to-morrow.

JAMES MONROE.

The House then took up the bill for the relief of James Monroe—the question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HAYNES, at the time of adjournment, yesterday, had demanded the previous question; but the House this day refused to sustain the demand.

Mr. HEMPHILL then moved the amendment which was yesterday read at his request, viz.

“Strike out of the bill all after the word ‘That,’ and insert—

“For public services, losses, and sacrifices, the sum of thirty-six thousand dollars is hereby appropriated, to be paid to James Monroe, immediately after the passing of this act, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; which shall be in full of all demands of the said James Monroe for his claims aforesaid.”

Mr. HEMPHILL declined entering into any argument in favor of his amendment. Various sums had been suggested as proper to be appropriated: he had fixed, after some attention to the matter, on that proposed in his amendment.

Mr. HAYNES said that, if for no other reason, he should oppose the amendment, because the claim seemed to be put up to the lowest bidder. He had given the subject some attention, and was convinced there was not a dollar due Mr. Monroe.

Mr. CHILTON said he would make one more attempt to get rid of the subject, and with that view he moved to lay the bill and amendment on the table. Negative—yeas 84, nays 111.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. HEMPHILL,

Mr. TUCKER opposed the amendment. He said he had examined the matter with considerable attention, and could not discover that Mr. Monroe had any claim upon the Government. He viewed the whole concern in the light of a donation.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS referred to the concluding clause of the amendment, and asked if it would be of any avail. The act formerly passed for the relief of James Monroe contained a similar provision, but it had not prevented the introduction of the present bill.

Mr. PATTON said he did not like the form of the amendment, yet, as he was disposed to go for the substance, he should not take exception to forms. He would move, however, to strike out $36,000, and insert $52,000, as the proper sum to be allowed to quiet Mr. Monroe's claim.

This motion was promptly negatived.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. HEMPHILL, and determined in the negative—yeas 93, nays 99.

Mr. HEMPHILL then renewed his amendment, reducing the sum to be appropriated to $30,000.

Mr. HAYNES demanded the previous question; but the House refused to sustain the demand.

Mr. ELLSWORTH submitted an amendment; but the SPEAKER declared it to be out of order, the House having yesterday rejected a similar amendment.

Mr. POTTER then submitted the following amendment, to come in after the word “sacrifices:”—

“In addition to the sum of four hundred thousand dollars, heretofore paid to said James Monroe, for the same consideration.”

Mr. CARSON was sorry to differ with his colleague: he could have wished the amendment had not been offered; but, if it prevailed, it could do no harm to Mr. Monroe. He then commented upon what fell from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ANGEL,] yesterday.

Mr. ANGEL explained, and vindicated himself.

Mr. BUCHANAN remarked upon the short time that was left, before the close of the session, to attend to the public business. He hoped the claim would be decided on to-day. Mr. B. said that, before he resumed his seat, he would take this occasion to remark, that, after the present generation had been gathered to their fathers, and when the men of other times came to review the proceedings of this day, it would be a stain upon the character of the nation, if we should suffer the illustrious individual who preferred this claim to go to his grave without its adjustment. Such conduct towards an individual, now in poverty and old age, who had rendered most important services, both in peace and in war, to his country, would be blazoned to the world by the enemies of our free institutions, as another proof of the ingratitude of republics.

Mr. POLK said he would be the last man to inflict a stain on the country. He entered into an argument to show that the individual referred to had no claim on the nation. He remarked upon the character of the debate—sometimes gentlemen in favor of the bill argued as if there was a claim, at other times they appealed to the feelings of members. Some gentlemen thought there was a claim upon Congress—others viewed the matter in the light of a gratuity. If he believed there was anything due Mr. Monroe, he would provide for his payment; but he did not believe there was one dollar due him.

Mr. MERCER stated, in reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, on his own authority, and as a member of the House, that Mr. Monroe had not received 400,000 dollars from the Government for his services.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, considered it a solemn duty on his part to oppose the claim, and he should be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. POTTER hoped the gentleman from Virginia would excuse him if he thought that gentleman was not altogether accurate on the subject. He [Mr. P.] had taken some pains to examine into it, and was satisfied that the sum named in his amendment was not far from the truth. He remarked upon what had fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the score of ingratitude, and expressed his opinion that any man who had filled the Presidential chair, and had been commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, had been fully compensated for all his devotion to the interests of his country.

Mr. WAYNE was of opinion that there was a large sum due to Mr. Monroe, and that it should be paid.

Mr. DORSEY opposed the claim, in a speech of some length; in the course of which he examined the grounds upon which the claim was founded, and replied to gentlemen who had spoken on the other side.

Mr. MERCER made an energetic reply, and repelled some of the assertions made by Mr. D.

Mr. DORSEY rejoined with equal warmth.

Mr. POLK replied to some of the remarks of Mr. MERCER.

Mr. MERCER again took the floor, and animadverted warmly on what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. D.] He also replied to the remarks of Mr. POLK.

Mr. POTTER now modified his amendment by inserting 354,000 dollars, instead of 400,000.

The question being then put on the amendment of Mr. POTTER, it was negatived, by a large majority.

Mr. RENCHER then submitted the following proviso, to come in at the end of the amendment offered by Mr. HEMPHILL; and stated that, if it was adopted, he should vote for the amendment:

"Provided, The accounting officer of the Treasury Department shall, upon an examination of his accounts, believe so much is due him upon principles of equity and justice."

On motion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, the yeas and nays were ordered on the amendment proposed.

Mr. HEMPHILL, to save the time of the House, said he would accept of the amendment as a modification of his own motion.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, moved an adjournment; the motion was negatived—87 to 96.

The question then recurring on the amendment of Mr. HEMPHILL, as modified,

Mr. HOFFMAN moved the previous question; the effect of which would have been to take the question on engrossing the original bill. The House refused to sustain the demand.

Mr. WILLIAMS then demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. HAYNES moved that the House do now adjourn; which motion was negatived—yeas 81, nays 102.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. HEMPHILL, as modified, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 83.

The question then occurred on the engrossment of the bill, as amended, for a third reading, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the question.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. MALLARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, reported the following bill:

"Be it enacted, &c. That so much of an act entitled 'An act to reduce the duty on salt,' approved, May 29, 1830, as will take effect on and after the 31st of December next, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the duty on salt imported into the United States be and remain at fifteen cents per bushel."

A very long report accompanied the bill.

The bill having been read the first time, Mr. LAMAR moved its rejection.

Mr. TUCKER objected to the second reading of the bill, and hoped it would be rejected. He regretted that it had been introduced. The tax on salt was complained of, and justly complained of, by the greater part of the American people; it was a tax that operated with great severity on the poor. The tax was laid for war purposes, and should not be continued in a state of peace. An act to repeal the tax passed at the last session, after full discussion, and it was but just that the repeal should take place. We have a bill on the tables of the House, relative to a reduction of the duties on sugar; was this bill intended to have any effect upon that measure? Mr. T. hoped that every gentleman on the floor, who desired the prosperity of his country, would promptly vote for the rejection of the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures. Mr. T. defended the vote he gave the other day against the rejection of a bill; he did it with a view to allow an opportunity for discussion.

Mr. MALLARY said, there was nothing unusual in reporting the bill now before the House. The Committee on Manufactures had considered the subject; it was an interesting one; and they had very fully given their views upon it in the report which accompanied the bill. If the gentleman who had just taken his seat, felt irritated at the course pursued by the committee, he could not help it; he claimed the right to present his views to the House, and so did the committee. He was not disposed to go into an argument upon the subject at this time; he should prefer that the bill should lie on the table, and the report be printed, so that gentlemen might have time to reflect upon and understand the question for themselves. He was desirous that the bill should take the usual course—be read a second time, and committed. He assured the gentleman from South Carolina that he had no idea that this measure should have any effect on the sugar bill; nor would the effect of its passage be to operate upon the poor—it was rather intended to relieve the poor. The gentleman had said that the object of his vote the other day was to admit of discussion—his object now was to prevent it, by strangling the bill. If the House chose to reject the bill, he had nothing to say against it, but, before doing so, he should be pleased to have the views of the Committee on Manufactures read.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he had been unprepared for the introduction of a measure of the nature of that now before the House. There had been a full discussion on the subject at the last session, and the House, by a considerable majority, had passed a bill to repeal the tax on salt, now proposed to be continued. In the debate on that occasion, it was declared to be one of the most grievous and oppressive taxes to which any people were subjected. Neither the poor nor the rich, said Mr. P., should be burdened with a tax on an article that entered into the necessary consumption of every family. Pass this bill, and what would gentlemen have to tell their constituents when they went home, this measure following directly upon the act of the last session?

Mr. S. then spoke of the effects which the measure would have upon the people of the South, and said he warned gentlemen to be cautious in their repeated attempts to keep them down. He denounced the vengeance of the South on the majority of this House, if they persisted in a course of measures like those pursued for some years past. Last year, he said, the lords proprietaries of the United States had been petitioned to reduce the duties on salt, and their prayer was granted. Now it was proposed to restore the duties. Would not such legislation create excitement? Yes, said Mr. S., such a system of robbery and plunder will create excitement. Was the South to have no redress of grievances? And when she had thrown herself on the liberality of her sovereigns, and obtained some partial relief, was she to be again subjected to the same burdens? The day was coming when the South would be heard. The oppressive measures under which she labored must be repealed—it will be done—and shall be done. The South was on the eve of a rebellion. Yes, sir, the day is fast approaching, when the people of the South will rise in their majesty, and stalk the avenues of this House, and take vengeance on their oppressors. Yes, sir, and I fear this Government, under which they claim the right to tax us, will be made "to reel to and fro like a drunken man." Sir, I am done.

Claim of James Monroe.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, rose to address the House; but gave way to

Mr. TUCKER, who said that, when the bill should receive its second reading, he should move an amendment to provide for the repeal of the duties on salt in toto. He felt sorry that the gentleman from North Carolina had expressed himself as he had done. It was his [Mr. T.'s.] wish to put down excitement. Every section of this country was oppressed by this odious tax, except the persons engaged in the manufacture of the article. There was an aristocracy in this House—they had power, and they exercised it to oppress. They were led into error themselves, and they deluded the people. The yeomanry of the country never had been represented on this floor. The object of the tax on salt was to take from the pockets of the poor, and give to the rich; to make the poor poorer, and the rich richer. He implored gentlemen, for the good of their constituents, for the good of the country, to take such steps as would put an end to excitement, by endeavoring to do justice to all. For himself, he cared no more for one section of the country than for another; his object was to do justice to all. The people were oppressed, and, in a measure, slaves; the Union was in danger of being rent asunder, and he feared the day was not far distant. Heaven avert it! Should this be the result, however, of the measures of the majority, they would not only have to answer before the people, but before their God. He was determined that no act of his should bring about such a state of things. Referring to the remarks of Mr. MALLARY, he said it was to him matter of astonishment, how a high duty on any article could make the article cheaper; as well might it be said that a coal black piece of paper was as white as snow. It was a contradiction in terms, &c.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, next rose, not, he said, for the purpose of discussing the merits of the proposition reported by the Committee on Manufactures, but to beg of gentlemen who are in favor of what is called a protecting tariff, to pause before they proceed too far with it. We of the South, said Mr. T., have been somewhat amused by the prospect of relief from the burdens heaped upon us by the majority in Congress by a repeal or reduction of the duties, and the excitement on that account has always been repressed by the hope of it. But when we get up and tell the House that we are oppressed, and that we must have relief from this oppression, and see how our remonstrances are met by those who are trying to oppress us still further, do gentlemen suppose that we can submit to this? What is the object of gentlemen? Is it their intention to goad us on to extremities? Recurring to the history of the last session, Mr. T. said that it was then solemnly decided, after debate, that the duty on salt was oppressive to the great body of the people, and a law was therefore passed to reduce it. And what, he asked, was now proposed? After this discussion, and the conclusive expression of the opinion of the House that the duty was too high, and ought to be reduced, for what purpose could it now be proposed to reinstate that duty? The chairman of the Committee on Manufactures (for whom Mr. T. said he felt great respect) had said that he had no objection that the bill should lie on the table, that members might have time to reflect upon the subject. In the best feelings of his heart towards the House and towards that gentleman, Mr. T. begged of those who favored this project to pause. For, he repeated—and he hoped that he should not be considered as making a vain boast or threat when he said it—that the people could not submit to this manner of legislation. If it be persisted in, said he, we shall be driven to the necessity of resistance. In discussions on this subject, when I have stated the effect of the existing duties upon the people of the South, I have been told by the friends of the protective system that I did not understand the subject; that the experience of five or six years would convince me that our Eastern brethren were our best friends. I am sure, sir, that no gentleman in this House has ever resorted to this argument to blind me whilst he was robbing my pockets; but, sir, I do feel that I am insulted when an effort is made to take from my pocket my hard earnings, for no necessity of the Government, and for no public benefit. Again I beg gentlemen, I appeal to them as individuals and as representatives of the American people, to pause before they go further. I repeat, that in the South we have looked to a deliverance from the oppression under which we labor, and we have considered the reduction of the duties on salt and some other articles as pledges that we shall not be disappointed. A confident belief that the duties would be repealed, has induced the people of the South, a large majority of them, so far to submit to their oppressive operation. Pass this bill, and I apprehend they will no longer forbear resisting. Mr. T. concluded, by saying that, if the friends of this bill persisted in bringing it before the House, he should move to amend it so as to propose a total repeal of the duty on salt.

Mr. LAMAR then withdrew his motion to reject the bill.

Mr. CHILTON renewed it. He said that, believing, with great deference to the committee, that this bill, if passed, would further oppress the people, not only of the South, but of every other portion of the country—and apprehensive that it would lead to an unnecessary and irritating debate, and, it might be, to a decision of the question by wager of battle, (judging by the excitement of debate yesterday,) to get rid of these discussions, he felt it to be his duty to move the previous question.

A call of the House was then moved by Mr. WILDE, and ordered. One hundred and ninety-three members answered to their names.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. MCCREERY asked if a motion to lay the bill on the table would now be in order.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

The question was then put on the demand of Mr. CHILTON for the previous question; but the House refused to sustain it.

Mr. MCCREERY stated that he was one of those who had opposed the reduction of the duty on salt: but he saw no use in agitating the question of restoring the duty at this time. He would, therefore, move to lay the bill on the table. [The motion, however, was declared not to be in order under the pending question.]

[Here the hour allotted for morning business expired.]

JAMES MONROE.

The bill for the relief of James Monroe, as yesterday amended, again coming up, and the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said that, however important the passage of the bill might be, there was a vast mass of business on the table, of much more importance, and which it was necessary should receive the early consideration of the House. In order, therefore, if possible, to bring the discussion to a close, he demanded the previous question. The demand was sustained by the House—83 to 40.

Mr. ELLSWORTH inquired whether the preamble introduced by Mr. HEMPHILL constituted any part of the bill in its present shape.

The SPEAKER replied in the negative.

The question was finally put on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the affirmative, as follows:

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time today.

Mr. RAMSEY gave notice that he would, on Monday next, call up the bill regulating the compensation of clerks in the Post Office Department, together with the amendment proposed by him on the 31st ultimo.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1831—the question being on striking from the bill so much as relates to an appropriation for the salary of the minister to Russia.

Mr. CHILTON was entitled to the floor, but declined addressing the House.

Mr. POLK demanded the previous question, but the demand was not sustained.

Mr. BURGESS then again rose. Permit me, Mr. Speaker, said he, to justify myself, under all which has been said, both against me, and against whatever has been advanced by me in support of the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio. With the indulgence of the House, it may be well to look back to the question made by this motion; for gentlemen, in their zeal to eulogize the minister, or to abuse those who doubt the correctness of his appointment, have departed almost entirely from the matter in issue before us.

The objection to this appropriation, and the motion to strike it from this bill, have been made, because it is proposed for payment of a salary to a foreign minister, who, by his commission of legation, or by certain secret articles given to him, is authorized to leave the court to which he is sent, to go to any other country, whenever, in his own opinion, his health may require it; and not to return to that court so long as, according to the same opinion, it may be injurious to his health to do so. We deny such mission to be a legal one; we deny that the salary provided by law for foreign ministers, is, or ever can be, due to any man sent abroad under such credentials, with such privileges reserved, and such powers granted to him, not to the public, but to his own use. The objection to this appropriation has, therefore, not been made because the gentleman was, when sent abroad, and had long been, a valetudinarian; or because, if then in health, that health, exhausted by the toils of diplomacy, might require refreshment by relaxation and relief from public service. No, sir; nor because that refreshment might not be found unless under a milder sky, and by removing to a more genial climate than that of Russia. Such things may excite, as they certainly have excited, the special wonder of the nation; and they are, and will be, very proper topics of debate, when considering the "State purposes" of this mission; but they have not been, nor will they be, made the grounds of objection to the appropriation of this item in the bill.

We object to this salary on account of the illegality of this mission, and because the Secretary of State, knowing the enfeebled health of Mr. Randolph—knowing his inability to attend to the laborious details of that public service—knowing that his constitution could not endure either the winter or summer climate of Russia, did invent this mission, and did advise the President to send out this gentleman with credentials as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia; and at the same time to give him a commission, no matter for what cause, to reside, as such minister, in whatever country he might choose to reside. Such a mission cannot be formed—such a minister cannot be sent abroad, either under our laws or our constitution, or under the usages and laws of nations. I ask the attention of the House, therefore, to the inquiry, whether this salary can be due for an illegal and void mission? whether it can be due as a quantum meruit, or as a pro rata compensation for the services which were rendered at the court of Russia? or, last of all, whether it can be due, because this mission may subserve certain purposes, highly useful to the Secretary of State? Before these inquiries can, to the best purpose, be made, it is proper to give some reply to what has been offered by several gentlemen against this motion. These gentlemen have said less to support this appropriation, than to impugn the motives of those who oppose it. With my motives the gentlemen are welcome to amuse themselves. The storm of their abuse passed over me as the winter storms of my native New England have often passed over the humble dwelling of my boyhood, without shaking a stone from the chimney, or starting a shingle on the roof. I have too much respect for myself to believe that they have abused me from the wantonness of malice, but do believe it was done simply because they could find nothing to say more appropriate to the question.

This motion has been made to protect the rights of the nation against the encroachments of power. Those who resist such encroachments and assaults of power, must always expect to encounter vociferous, if not infuriated, adversaries. I have not entered this warfare without "counting the cost." A school of high authority taught me that, in a war of aggression, "He who takes the sword shall perish by the sword"—but in a war of defence "let him who has no sword sell his coat and buy one."

How, then, has our defence been met and answered? How by the gentleman from Virginia? [Mr. BARBOUR.] First of all, I am accused of objecting to this appropriation, because it is for the use of a Virginian. In this the gentleman is utterly mistaken. I informed him of this error in a few moments after he had taken his seat. He has, notwithstanding, chosen to put this error in print. Suffer me, sir, in my place, and before this House, to protest against this procedure. The gentlemen who heard me then, and who do me the honor to hear me now, I call to witness that I said no such thing; and I should have nothing to regret, could my protestation be made the printed companion of the gentleman's allegation against me, and travel side by side with it under the eye of the nation. This, I know, cannot be done; and I must suffer the imputation wherever his speech is read, without my correction of its errors. Be it so: but I believe there is too much good sense, and too much moral sentiment, in Virginia, to set down one of their fellow-men as quite so stupid, or quite so malevolent.

The gentleman alleges that I considered this mission as a bribe offered to Virginia. This might have been said by me, because I believed it to be true. If said, was it said, or could it be intended, in derogation of Virginia? Is Virginia dishonored by this attempt of the wily Secretary? I did not, and no man will intimate that Virginia had even looked with a favorable eye on this bribe, this splendid bestowment. Not those who hear, but those who listen to the song of the siren, and are allured by the enchantment, become debased by the temptation. Sir, temptations are spread over the whole path of our lives, from the cradle to the grave. The enticements of pleasure beset our youth; the toils of ambition are spread for our vigorous manhood; and in old age, the honest amor habendi, when all other loves are frozen in the heart, allures the dim eye to gaze at, and the surd ear to listen to, the glittering beauties and golden melodies of avarice. Are we dishonored, because, in the language of Sir Wm. Jones, "vice is permitted to spread her snares around us, that the triumph of virtue may be more conspicuous?" The ermine of the judge is not tarnished because some unprincipled litigant has craftily proffered a bribe to the court. The name of the insulted Lucretia has arrived to us after a journey of more than two thousand years. Is it soiled by time, or by the breath of any one of the millions of millions who have pronounced it? That name, sir, like the Alps of her own Italy, whose tops nearest to heaven are covered with eternal snow, is the monument of imperishable purity—while the name of the treacherous and cowardly Tarquin, scarred with infamy, will be, as it has been throughout all time, the name of whatever is most vile and odious. Sir, Virginia is not dishonored; the tempter, and not the tempted, will suffer the infamy of the deed.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARNOUR] would overthrow our objections to this appropriation, by eulogizing the man sent on the mission. He alludes to the monuments of Mr. Randolph's fame; and, lest men might call on him to show where they are, he has placed them in the hearts of his countrymen, where no being but "the searcher of hearts" could discover their existence. What indications has Virginia given that those monuments are where the gentleman has located them? He has long been a representative in Congress from that State. This is something in his favor; but, from a State so long separated into districts, it is not conclusive. It is confined to his constituents, and only proves what the gentleman himself has often asserted on this floor, "that never had man such constituents." He represented the whole State in the Senate—true; but this was for the fragment only of a term. Why was he not re-appointed? The interests, the honor, and high dignity of Virginia had been placed under his guardianship. How did he perform the offices created by these trusts? His conduct as a Senator from Virginia was brought before the Legislature of that State, on a question concerning his re-appointment. In this great Areopagus, than which none is more dignified, each judge, if he had a monument of this man in his heart or his house, read the inscription upon it. On what was he tried? Not on his political creed—he did not suffer, as the best of men have, for heresy. His faith was, for every purpose beneficial to himself, sound; his works alone were brought into question. On this question a deep and interesting debate arose. The gentleman may have been present and heard it; or if not, as it was published, he must have read it. It belonged to Virginia, and was a part of her great commonwealth concern: nor would I have brought this wholesome example of family discipline before the nation, had not the eulogist of this froward son of Virginia told us that the monuments of his exploits were in the hearts of his countrymen. Does this debate, or the result of it, confirm the gentleman's assertion? He was weighed, and "mene mene tekel upharsin" was written on all his monuments. He was rejected, and a distinguished Virginian was chosen to represent that State in the Senate, and restore her ancient honor and dignity in the councils of the nation.

I ask again, where are the monuments of this man's glory? Has he improved his native State in the great arts of civil life? In agriculture, his own peculiar vocation? It has never been said of him. Have manufactures been fostered by his encouragement? Sir, the very name is odious to him. The sheep, the most innocent of all animals, and supplying by its wool the material for perhaps our most useful manufacture—the sheep is so hateful to him, that, with all the poetry of the golden age in his blood, this gentleman has said, "I would go twenty rods out of my way to kick a sheep." Commerce has been as little encouraged by him as either of her sister arts in our family of national industry. He is one of a class of men, now grown quite small in our country, who despise traffic and traders; and would have considered Cosmo de Medicis, the princely merchant and founder of Florence, as no better than a tin pedlar. He is literary, moral, I trust pious; but what has he done to advance learning, morality, or religion? In this House, where he so long had a seat, where are the fruits of his sage councils; the laws originated or sustained by his eloquence; and which will carry his name to posterity, as a patriot statesman? When the gentleman shall point to these monuments, and show them to belong to Mr. Randolph, he may realize a fame somewhat less fugitive and perishable than mere words.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARNOUR] would carry my opposition to this salary to mere political account; and says I am opposed to it because Mr. Randolph overthrew the fabric of federal power. Be it so; let the man enjoy the entire fame of all the benefit, and all the mischief he has done. I had no share in that power, which every citizen did not equally enjoy. It gave me no honor, no emolument. I do not believe, and I think thousands who aided in its overthrow do not now believe, that any structure, since that time erected on its ruins, has given a holier sanctuary to the constitution, or a more secure shelter to the rights and liberties of the people. If this giant partisan did overthrow that fabric, he could not bury under its ruins the great principles of the revolution—"Union and independence," the song of my cradle, the political creed of every hour of my life, and not sooner to be forgotten than the sainted bosom which nourished my infancy. What did this man build, what could he build, in its place? Sir, when daylight first dawned on the world after this event, John Randolph sat, in the glimpses of morning, like the genius of the earthquake amidst the ruins of some splendid city, without the power or the will to move a single stone to rear a new edifice. Nay, sir, when the statesmen of those times, forgetting the storm of party, set themselves in earnest to rebuilding, this man of monuments resisted their labors. Little does the gentleman know me, if he believes I feel anger at the labors, or envy at the fame, of the man whom he has eulogized. He will be remembered, when much better Virginians, and perhaps the gentleman himself, may be forgotten; but he will be remembered as the years of mildew, and blight, and famine are remembered, when those of plenty and prosperity are forgotten. He may live in story, but not, like Washington, "in the hearts of his countrymen."

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

I should have said no more of the secretary of legation, had not the gentleman transmuted his confirmation by the Senate, into the Roman ceremonial of bestowing the toga virilis. This toga, this gown, was, in the open forum, given annually by all the Romans to all their boys who had, during the year, arrived at the age of seventeen years. By this classical allusion, I presume the gentleman intends to assure us that Mr. Randolph's secretary of legation has fully arrived at that interesting period of his life. I had asserted that he was twenty-one; but I willingly admit the gentleman's correction.

The other gentleman from Virginia [Mr. COKE] has reinforced his colleague. Will these gentlemen never have done with misstating me? Have I reproached Virginia? Never, sir, never. When speaking of any one of her citizens here, I have spoken of him as an American citizen. When speaking of that State, I have, on this floor, and elsewhere, spoken of her as one which poured her whole Spartan soul into the revolution, which sent to the field of conflict a band of patriot warriors, "who have filled the world with their and our glory;" and which, to secure the benefits, in addition to the triumphs of victory, relinquished her territorial claims to an empire, preferring, to State sectional interest, the more glorious objects of union and independence. I reproach Virginia! Is it not the birthplace, is it not the burial place, of Washington? Sir, who can reproach that most fortunate, most consecrated region; or even suppose the enormity possible, "and hope to be forgiven!"

I have, as the gentleman says, abused the President, and his Machiavelian policy. I have spoken of the President as of the first dignity of the nation, and in no terms of disrespect. I have alleged that, like monarchs in the old world, he has been advised by ministers; and, under that advisement, has permitted those ministers to furnish, in his name, his annual message to Congress. Will the gentleman pledge his literary reputation upon a denial of this allegation? I have said the President has been mis-counselled; has suffered his confidence to be abused by an artful minister; and that, too, in this very appointment. I put it to the gentleman, upon his conscience, to say whether he believes this question could have come up, in this House, if Mr. Tazewell had been Secretary of State.

Of the Secretary of State I have spoken, and will speak, as I believe he merits. He is a power constitutionally connected with the Executive; but now, like the parasite plant under shelter of the oak, it has crept, and clasped, and wound itself around the trunk, spire above spire, until it overtops the loftiest branch of the magnificent tree. The leaves of the ivy will soon conceal those of the oak; and, unless the insidious plant be removed, render it a sapless trunk.

The gentleman recommends to us charity, christian charity. Where does he learn that the delinquencies of rulers are to be visited only in charity? While the messenger of divine charity wept over the coming ruin of his nation, did he not severely rebuke those rulers, that generation of vipers, stinging and poisoning that nation, and hastening on that destruction?

Sir, we are charitable. The people have looked on in charity. Charity has done her utmost. Her "mantle has covered a multitude of sins;" but the brood has multiplied, and increased in size, and outgrown the covering.

This gentleman unites with his colleague in eulogizing Virginia. It is all supererogation. History has done it justice. The lofty-minded matron, we knew, thought well of herself; but no one deemed her quite so proud as the gentleman has announced her to us. In wielding the broom, or scolding her household, she may well scorn Neptune's trident, and Jove's power to thunder, as the gentleman says she does; and some of her children have given us fair samples of the family lectures.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WAYNE] has come forward to support this "State mission." To support, do I say? His effort seems rather suited to rebuke me, and those engaged with me in support of this motion, into utter silence. Nor would he silence us only, but stop the public press. Silence this House! silence the public press! what more can be required for the establishment of a despotism over national opinion!

The gentleman has advanced an argument on the question. It is drawn from analogy. He will permit me to say that such arguments are, of all others, the least conclusive. Founded on the resemblance of things, they have all the uncertainty of their foundation. He who should affirm that all human forms are alike, would affirm the truth; but what conclusion could be drawn from it? For he who should affirm that all human forms are different, would equally affirm the truth. The gentleman affirms that we ought to make this appropriation to pay this salary, notwithstanding Mr. Randolph, by permission of the Executive, left the court of Russia a few days after his arrival there, and has not returned, or may not return, to that court again. He alleges this, because the members of Congress are paid, notwithstanding they may be taken sick, either on their journey hither, or while here, or on their return home. It is true; but the analogy between the cases extends no further. Suppose a case just like Mr. Randolph's; suppose a member of this House arrive here, is here taken sick, and, on leave of absence, departs from this city for Charleston, Savannah, or New Orleans, to regain his health, and does not return during the session; would he receive his pay? Could he receive it? I regret the gentleman thought it proper to say that we, in support of the motion, had used falsehood; "a thing equally dishonorable in argument, with the use of poisoned weapons in war." I regret this, because I had expected from him nothing but what was fair in debate; and pure, classical, and urbane in language. This expectation had been sustained by my own attention to the gentleman's demeanor in this House; but it had been raised by the report of him, made to me by one in the relations of friendship to him, and than whom no man on earth is dearer to me. Will the gentleman do himself the justice to mark and point out the items of falsehood set down and used by us in our account of objections to this appropriation?

All these gentlemen agree in the argument against this motion, drawn from the incompetency of this House to question this appropriation. The President and Senate, to whom the constitution has confided our foreign relations, have, they tell us, established this legation; and this House cannot, as they affirm, refuse this appropriation in support of it. Are we placed by the people as the constitutional keepers of the public treasure, and yet bound to follow every Executive call for their money? Is it our whole fiscal duty to obey orders, and grant subsidies? Does not deliberation, and debate, and discretion, belong to this House? We can grant, and every power which can grant is, by its very nature, endowed with the power of refusal. Sir, our power to refuse appropriations is the constitutional check placed in our hands not to stop, but to regulate, the movements of the Executive. Without this power, and its discreet and diligent use, the nation would be at the disposal of the President and cabinet council.

Sir, this mission may be regarded as the commencement of a system of sinecure appointments, of salaries without services. Sent to one court, where he did nothing; and, in the exercise of his powers, gone to another, where he can do nothing, what service is required, or was, or could be, expected from him? When he shall return next June, what will he have done? His most zealous friends must say, nothing. If, then, he receive this salary, he will receive it without service of any kind rendered to the nation for it. The Secretary does avow, in the message; that the "power to leave the Russian court for the advantage of a more genial climate, was given to Mr. Randolph, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service." What were those services? The duties of a member of this House or of the Senate, and for which he received his legal compensation, like every other member. Was "his constitution impaired" by these services? Were not the constitutions of others impaired, and even their lives consumed, in like services? Is this gentleman alone selected for a place where he may, "in consideration of the extent to which his constitution has been impaired by those services," receive in one year the sum of $18,000? This, sir, is the first pension for civil service on our records. How many hearts of revolutionary soldiers would this have made glad? Into how many abodes of desolation and widowhood it might have carried the light of joy, and brought on you the blessings of how many now ready to perish? Such a system of sinecure appointment and civil pensionage may be extended alike to the courts of all civilized nations, and to the hordes of Nomadic barbarians, requiring no residence, either near the palaces or tents of the foreign Power; the formality of a visit and a presentation may soon be omitted, and the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary will, "in consideration of his public services," be permitted to receive his outfit and salary, while he continues to reside on his plantation.

What a scheme of speculation does this system open to the crafty and unprincipled, to men always at market either to sell themselves or to buy others! By this, unstable politicians of every variety of creed may be kept to the true faith. By this, tempest-beaten partisans, shipwrecked in principle and fortune, may be towed into port, and laid up and preserved for future use. Establish this system, sir, and add to it a Government treasury bank, and the Secretary might buy into the Presidency, with your own money; nor, like that Roman who bought the imperial purple at auction, be obliged to lay down his own gold and silver for the purchase. Shall we, sir, through any fear of transcending our jurisdiction, give our sanction to such a system? A bolder stand than is now required was taken sixteen years ago, on this floor, by an honorable member, now high in office, and presiding over the deliberations of the other House of Congress. "I will," said he, "vote no appropriation for the navy until the Secretary of that department is removed." What was the result? The Secretary was removed; and the naval branch of the service did receive, as it always has received, his cordial and efficient support. In 1795, when the appropriation was under consideration for carrying into effect the second treaty with Great Britain, Mr. Gallatin declared, in this House, that a treaty had no binding force as a law of the land until such appropriations were made; and that this House, holding the power to control such appropriations, held the constitutional power of rejecting treaties. Mr. Madison contended that this House had the right to judge concerning the expediency of treaties; and, as they might decide that question, to grant or refuse appropriations for carrying them into effect. This case does not require the aid of these doctrines; for public faith will not be touched in our foreign relations, if Mr. Randolph should not receive a salary for residing in England as minister at Russia. Has the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. J. S. BARBOUR] forgotten that the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill appropriating salaries for the Panama mission was sustained by sixty-one members of this House, and that he himself, with nine of his colleagues, voted for it? Will gentlemen still contend for their own incompetency to question this appropriation? Sir, we are, by the constitution, vested with a high competency and discretion on these important matters; and to these constitutional attributes of this House has this motion been addressed.

It is humiliating, said Mr. B., but I must reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] For myself I would let him pass. It is a kind of Domitian amusement, this killing flies with a bodkin. Gladly would I say, with the commiseration of Uncle Toby, to the little buzzing inconvenience, (when I have him in my hand,) "Go, poor insect, go; the world is surely wide enough for thee and me."

I have some apology for giving some attention to the speech of the gentleman from New York. The place, however it may be filled, does give a kind of character to what is said or done in it. No matter how utterly inconsiderable, or even contemptible, a person may be, whenever a constitutional portion of the people has placed him at one of these desks, replying to what he may have said, though it may not be very creditable, yet must be excusable, in any member of this House. The Romans were wont to place a wooden image in their gardens, as the special protector of the place; and Horace has related to us the soliloquy of one of these Roman deities, wherein he gives some account of his own apotheosis: "I was," said the Priapus, "a useless log, until the carpenter took me in hand: but he has now worked me up into a god!" The people of New York can surely turn out as good work as the Roman carpenter.

We are by this learned and honorable gentleman reproached for a want of magnanimity; and are told that no objection, for any such cause, was made by him and his party to any appropriation. The true difference between his and our efforts will be found in this: we labor to save money from illegal and useless appropriation; he labored to abuse those who had, in pursuance of legal and useful appropriation, honestly paid it away.

What were the doings of this magnanimous gentleman in a committee of which he was a remarkable member? Here is the record-book of that committee. I have selected, as an ordinary sample of this gentleman's labors of retrenchment, four cases, and will trouble the House with a few quotations, and a few remarks upon them.

On the 25th of April, 1828, the committee being in session—

"The chairman then stated to the committee, that he felt it his duty to mention that a citizen, now a resident of this District, had inquired of him whether, in any of the accounts of the contingent expenses of the Government, the United States were debited with the sum of five thousand five hundred dollars, paid to the late Daniel P. Cook, late representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, for certain diplomatic services, upon which Mr. Cook was supposed to have been sent abroad during the last summer."

"The chairman stated that he did not feel at liberty to communicate the name of his informant, but in regard to the purport of the communication he felt no such reserve; and it was for the committee to make such order on the statement as they might deem proper.

"It was, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG,

"Resolved, That the committee consider the communication."

Sir, this committee, under this resolution, sent for witnesses: honorable members of both Houses, and the Postmaster General, were called before them. Why not call for the man himself, for Daniel P. Cook, against whom this anonymous information had been made? He was dead. The man at whom the gentleman from New York magnanimously aimed his arrow, slept quietly in the green bosom of his own beloved Illinois. The voice of the nameless informer, embodied by the resolution of the gentleman, though it might pollute every threshold, and violate the harmony of every house in the nation, could not reach the sanctuary, or interrupt the repose of the tomb. Permit me to speak a word concerning Daniel P. Cook; because every man who hears me did not know him, as many of us did, who sat in this House with him. He was a man whom the gentleman from New York would probably not call a genius; but his mind was of that cast and capacity in the transaction of human affairs, to which every man would wish to commit the management of his own. His sense was that of the every day intercourse of men; and would pass, like the most precious or most useful metals, wherever such a commodity could be in request. A man, in whatever may be required of manhood; a child, in all that singleness of heart and purity of purpose which render childhood so amiable. With those who knew him well, he had so fixed himself in their hearts, that though they might wish to forget the pain of their loss, they can never cease to remember his useful public labors, and many endearing social qualities.

Our relations with Cuba have long been interesting and important. Gentlemen will call to mind that we have frequently heard from Europe that Cuba might be transferred from Spain to some other sovereignty. Such a report was rife in this country in the winter of 1826-'27. It was believed by friends of the last administration, that a confidential agent was by Mr. Adams sent to Cuba, to ascertain, if possible, the truth of this report; and that Daniel P. Cook was that agent. He had, it was believed, been paid out of that fund which Congress has ever since the foundation of the Government annually or otherwise appropriated, and placed in the hands of the President, for the compensation of confidential services. All this may be known to the gentleman from New York now; and, had there been fraud in the transaction, we should have heard it on this occasion, called, at his mouth, by its harshest English name.

The gentleman might have known the whole affair at that time. This appears from the following letter from Mr. Clay, then Secretary of State:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 1, 1828.

SIR: I have received your letter under date this day, stating that "it having been ascertained that the late Daniel P. Cook, late a representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, received a sum of money from the Government, during the spring or summer of the last year, for certain services supposed to have been either foreign or diplomatic, you are instructed by the Committee on Retrenchment to request me to inform you where they are to look for the auditing of the sum said to have been received by Mr. Cook, and, if not audited in the usual course, what was its amount."

Without admitting or denying the correctness of the information which the committee are stated to have received, I have the honor to observe that I am not aware of the disbursement of any money through the agency of this department, the account of which has not been, or, in a regular course of settlement, is not to be, audited in the usual way at the treasury, or passed upon a certificate of the President, in conformity with the provisions of the 3d section of the act of the 1st of May, 1810, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of public ministers and consuls residing on the coast of Barbary, and for other purposes." I cannot presume that it was the intention of the committee to inquire into any disbursement which may have been made agreeably to that section; and all others are accessible to them, in like manner with other expenditures. I have, however, the authority of the President for saying that I will make to the committee a confidential communication, in relation to the expenditure to which they are supposed to allude, if they will signify their desire for such a communication. In that case, I should be glad to learn their pleasure as soon as convenient, as I purpose leaving the city, on the 4th instant, a few days, on account of the state of my health.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,
Your obedient servant,
H. CLAY.

TO JAMES HAMILTON, JR. ESQ. &c.

Why not receive and communicate this confidentially to the House? Every statesman must perceive at once the indecorum of giving it to the House in any other manner than confidential. What! place on our ordinary journal, publish in our papers, and send to Europe, that the friendship of General Vives, the Intendant General of Cuba, had induced him confidentially to communicate to the agent of our Government, concerning the disposition of Spain to sell, and of England to buy, the colonial sovereignty of that island. A confidential communication would not do. A plain, honest, and full statement of facts was not wanted. The magnanimous gentleman from New York wished to strike a blow at the President and Secretary; he chose to do it by mining; and if, in his subterranean course, he should dig into the grave of Daniel P. Cook, how could he doubt that the exigencies of the public service would justify this violation of the sanctuary of the tomb? He chose to follow the trail of an informer, who had so little confidence in this inquisition, that he would not "commit" even his own foul name to the gentleman's safe keeping. Mr. Cook, it was known, was in very delicate health, and was about to visit Cuba for the benefit of the climate. In the examination of the witnesses, the whole labor of the gentleman was directed to prove that the state of his health would not permit his doing any public service, and that, if he received any compensation, he must have received it for nothing. The gentleman was discomfited by the result; for it came out in evidence, that, feeble as was his health, he had performed all that was required of him. His compensation was not ascertained; but it is probable, say the committee, that he received more than one thousand dollars; and this is set down by the magnanimity of the gentleman as an act of "Executive favoritism, or flagrant abuse."

Compare this service and expenditure with the mission, and minister, and appropriation, now under debate. Mr. Cook was in delicate health; but that served to place him above suspicion of any sinister purpose in visiting Cuba. His acquaintance with General Vives, while in this country, the known integrity and obvious simplicity of his character, the amenity of his manners, and even his delicate health, all combined, must have placed him at once in relations of entire confidence and frank intercourse with the Intendant, and enabled him to obtain speedily from that Governor all which it was proper for him to communicate, or for our Executive to know. Let the gentleman taunt us for a want of magnanimity. Let the nation judge between us.

The next case in this record, to which I ask your attention, is that of John H. Pleasants. The House will have a full knowledge of this case from two letters, the first from Mr. Pleasants to Mr. Clay, the second from Mr. Clay to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. Pleasants to Mr. Clay.

LIVERPOOL, July 7, 1825.

MY DEAR SIR: If you are surprised at the date of my letter, I am scarcely less surprised at the circumstance myself. To be in England at all, is what I never expected. To be here when I expected to have been in Buenos Ayres, seems rather the effect of enchantment, than of ordinary causation. It remains, sir, for me to account for this apparent dereliction of duty; and I cannot but hope that a plain statement of the circumstances which changed my destination, will exculpate me from any blame in your eyes, solicitous as I am to preserve that good opinion which procured for me the charge conferred by the Department of State.

After many ineffectual attempts to secure an earlier passage, in which I was baffled by the diminished intercourse between the United States and the provinces of South America which lie beyond the Spanish Main, I succeeded in procuring a passage in the brig William Tell, which sailed from New York on the 28th May for the River Plate. This vessel was not such a one as I should have selected, had I had my choice. Being simply a merchant ship, it was destitute of comfortable accommodation; nevertheless, becoming impatient for action, and foreseeing that if I neglected that opportunity, I might meet with no other, I availed myself of it, and sailed, as stated, on the 28th May. I speedily had cause to regret my precipitation in choosing such a ship. The cabin, not fifteen feet square, was destined to accommodate, in a voyage which would occupy from sixty to ninety days, twenty-five passengers. * * * When the horrors of sea-sickness were superadded to the other painful circumstances attending my situation, my sufferings became greater than I can describe. Deprived of every comfort, with not ten feet square for exercise, a pestilential air, and most offensive smell, pervading every part of the ship, and even without the most common medicines, I assure you, sir, that death would have been no unwelcome visitor. I was seized with a high fever, and in ten days reduced, in my own opinion, and in that of those around me, to the brink of the grave. At this time, we spoke an American ship from New York, bound to Antwerp: the captain, who was likewise ill, was bearing for Fayal, in the Azores, and, by great persuasion, was induced to take me on board, in a miserable condition. Two days after this removal, my new captain recovered his indisposition, and resumed his course for Antwerp. Having no inclination to visit Holland, I determined to avail myself of the next ship that we might speak, and return to the United States, or go to England. From the time that I boarded the vessel in which I then was, I had begun slowly to recover, from the superior comforts of its accommodations. On the 20th of June, we spoke the brig Olive, from New York to this port, and the captain consenting to receive me, I arrived in Liverpool on the 1st instant, having been at sea thirty-three days. The despatches which were entrusted to my care, I forwarded to Mr. Forbes, in charge of Captain Hinman, of the William Tell, to whom he was consigned; stating the reasons of my not bearing them in person, and requesting him to forward those for Mr. Raguet at Rio. If the William Tell goes safely, the despatches will safely reach their destination.

These, sir, are the circumstances which have brought me to England, and I hope that they are such as to excuse my abandonment of my charge. As I am here, I have determined to devote a few weeks to the purpose of seeing the country; after which, I shall have the pleasure of giving you, in person, a more detailed account of my voyage.

With high respect, your obedient servant,

JNO. H. PLEASANTS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Clay to Mr. Hamilton, chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment.

"It was not believed that the visitation of Providence with which he was afflicted, ought to deprive him of all allowance for expenses, and all compensation for services; but it was not thought right that the per diem should be continued during the whole period of his absence from home, and until his return to New York, on the 22d October, 1825. It was therefore limited to the 22d August, 1825, that being the time when it was estimated he might have returned to the United States, if, after abandoning the voyage to South America, he had sought an opportunity of coming home, instead of proceeding to Europe. It was within the discretion of the department to have compensated him as the bearer of despatches from Mr. King; but it was not deemed proper to make him any allowance for that service."

Were these explanations satisfactory? What did the committee say then? These are their words:

"Amidst the numerous appointments of messengers made by the present administration, they will select the account of J. H. Pleasants, editor of the Richmond Whig, because that case, in their estimation, presents the most flagrant example of abuse."

"Either his despatches were or were not of importance: if they were of importance, like a soldier on post, no consideration should have induced him to have deserted them: if they were of no higher importance than to have rendered it safe that they should be confided to the captain of an ordinary merchant vessel, then they should have gone through this channel, and Mr. Pleasants ought not to have been appointed."

Sir, Daniel P. Cook was pursued by the gentleman, because he was dead; John H. Pleasants was in like manner pursued, because he was alive.

The case of Mr. Brooks is another on this record. He was a clerk in the office of the treasury. Grown old and becoming enfeebled, his fellow-clerks, with a generosity of purpose peculiar to themselves, performed his duties in the hours of recess, or by extra labor, and permitted this aged and destitute man to receive one-half of the salary. This instance of redoubled diligence and charitable provision for a superannuated fellow-laborer, in these generous men, is set down in the gentleman's diary of abuses, and the Executive is censured, because this aged man, with his family, was not thrown out to perish in the streets.

The case of Anthony Morris is another. He is a clerk in the Register's office. Mr. Morris is an old man, is one of those few veterans of the revolution and old Congress now alive, who by their employment and memory connect the present with the past Government. He is a literary man, the only one, says Mr. Michael Nourse, in the office. What of that? In consideration of his advanced age, infirm health, and that of his daughter, he might be absent from the service three months in the year—one month more than the ordinary allowance to all the clerks.

This case, sir, is, by the magnanimity of the gentleman, marked down among the instances of gross Executive abuse. What can the gentleman reply to these exploits of his magnanimity?

I leave it to the nation to compare Rufus King with John Randolph; and the mission of one to England with that of the other to Russia. Let them also compare the recess of Mr. Brown, minister to France, after years of service, and after sending home his resignation; let them, I say, run the parallel between this recess of Mr. Brown for a few days to the South of France, or the Lake of Geneva, and the Hegira of John Randolph, after a ten days' visit from St. Petersburg to some place, no one can tell where, in England. The people will do justice in all these cases.

The gentleman from New York has thrown his ponderosity into the scale of panegyric, thereby to render the weight of eulogy on the Russian minister overwhelming—scrap iron increases the weight not the value of gold. He does admit some sort of talent in speaking, to the parliamentary rivals of himself in eloquence—to Lowndes, to Clay, and to Webster. Cicero took his family name from a bean on some part of his face; and doubtless many a coxcomb has believed himself to be an orator, because, like Cicero, he had a wart on his nose. Somebody has said that "Man, of all the animal creation alone, is endowed with vanity." Who ever saw the cock sparrow measuring his wing in flight with the falcon? I believe there are gentlemen in this House who could give us good reasons why the eloquence of the orator of Roanoke is so well recollected by the gentleman from New York. No worker on the Roanoke plantation has better reasons to remember the eloquence of the overseer. Much as that eccentric man loved his joke and his sarcasm, he loved his fame more; and he would have spared the lash on that occasion, could he have suspected it might bring him into the poor condition of enduring praise at the hands of the gentleman from New York. Such revenge for such a cause is said to be peculiar to that gentleman, and one species of one other race among us.

Has the gentleman so long been a mere adjective to the Secretary of State, that he thinks it slanderous to associate the name of that politician with any other accident? Children, in these scientific times, who have advanced somewhat into the mysteries of chemistry, do, after beating up soap and water together in a basin, amuse themselves with a clean pipe in blowing up bubbles, and sending them off from the bowl inflated and glittering, to sail away a moment, and then burst and vanish into their original nothingness. For aught I know, the Secretary may be amusing himself by the same innocent experiment. Who would interrupt the sentimental harmony of political friendship! For all which he is distinguished, the character of the Secretary is fixed; it cannot be elevated by any labors of the protégé—it cannot be lowered by the efforts of others. God forbid that I should throw astray in the way of any man's advancement. Their friends are daily carrying and laying at the gate of the treasury those who have every thing to recommend them except the piety and good works of the beggar in the parable; and who, all alike, desire to be fed from the crumbs which fall from the tables of these feasting within. "Hope deferred," we find, does "not make every heart sick." Gentlemen, doubtless, have assurances that each political Lazarus shall be served in his turn. The next basket of broken meat brought out may be sent to New York, and amply satisfy the appetite, sharpened by a two years' want of it.

The gentleman accuses me of a departure from the question, to bring into the debate our late treaty with the Sublime Porte. Sir, every thing rendering our Russian relations important, comes into any question concerning them. Do not our new relations with the great European rival of Russia demonstrate more strongly our need of an efficient mission at the court of St. Petersburg? The Secretary has told us in the message, that the Black Sea has been opened to us by our treaty with the Sublime Porte. The gentleman does know full well that the swords of our brave Russian friends not only hewed their way through the Balkan down to the plains of Adrianople, but that, by the treaty of that city, they, for all purposes of navigation, widened the Bosphorus to a breadth equal to the Hellespont, and thereby united the Euxine with the Egean, Levant, whole Mediterranean, the Atlantic, and all other seas and oceans. What may our Russian imperial friend say to us for receiving from the Turk as a boon, to say nothing of our promise in return, what his valor, blood, and treasure had conquered for us and all nations? Omitting, therefore, the secret article, does not the opening the Euxine, either by the Russian power, or by the Turkish treaty, mightily enhance the importance of this question, and call imperatively on the Executive for an efficient mission at the court of St. Petersburg? If the gentleman cannot perceive this, he is less a statesman than he would seem to be; and even much less such, if that were possible, than others have esteemed him.

But I drew my facts from unprincipled partisans, and newspaper rumor! I said so before; I drew part of the truth from the Secretary—the treaty: the other part, the secret article, from the newspaper.

Sir, it has been the labor of the Secretary's life to establish newspapers, entitled to no credit; and to discredit all others. He has founded a school, and is at the head of it. In that school the great axiom is, "every thing is fair in politics;" and, to him, are not politics every thing? Let him go on to improve the condition of the press. Let him extinguish the light of truth wherever he can extend the finger of power. Let him do one thing more—aided by his minions, no matter where—let him persuade the people that the honest, the independent papers of this country, are vehicles of falsehood, and mere rumor; let them be, as they have been on this floor, branded as false, foul, and dirty; and let the member who quotes from their pages the history and impress of the times, be reproached as a blockhead, a blackguard, a slanderer; and what more could the Secretary of State desire, which he would not be sure to obtain? Sir, such a consummation would have saved to Charles the throne of France; and to the patriots of that country, their revolution.

I did quote for the secret article, in the Turkish treaty, from the newspaper: dares the gentleman question the truth of the quotation? Had I drawn a bow with a more advised aim, could the pigeon on the pole have fluttered more manifestly? The gentleman has, notwithstanding all these assertions, accused me of drawing my facts from a perjured Senator. Has it come to this? Was it found necessary not to commit our first treaty with the great disciple of Mahomet to the christian Senators of the United States, until their lips were sealed by the solemnities of an oath? It is a new formula in the executive department of the Senate, and will appear, by the published journals of that body, to have had no place in their proceeding until the present session. When a treaty in 1795 was published by a Senator against an injunction of that body, who accused him of perjury? The gentleman whose mission is now under consideration, did, on this floor, pronounce a studied eulogium on Stephens Thompson Mason, the Senator who published that treaty. Would he eulogize perjury? Sir, the secret article was published before the treaty was announced to the House, or sent to the Senate. The correspondence on the West India question was published in the same manner. Has the Secretary of State adopted this method, and put out his feelers to take the national pulse?

I do not ask what warranted, but who authorized, or instructed, or encouraged the gentleman to connect perjury with that venerated word which designates the members of a national council, the most dignified and honorable on earth?

How could I shun insult, when such men are reviled? I do not ask by what statesman, or gentleman, but by what apology for a man? In what other assembly on earth has "the hoary head" been used as a term of reproach? Has the gentleman passed so far beyond the vigor, and bloom, and modesty, of juvenescence, that he has forgotten the amiable instinct of our nature, which warns our youth to pay in advance that consideration to age which it may come to desire for itself? Though grey hairs have been held in respect by barbarians in all countries, and by even the most profligate and unmannered in all ages, yet, knowing him, (ab ovo ad plumas;) I am not disappointed in the language or demeanor of the gentleman from New York. Men, better than I am, have been reviled in their age, by men no better than he is. Washington was called a "hoary headed incendiary," by a vagabond of almost unparalleled mendacity and impudence. The "bald head" is, I assure the gentleman, no joke, though he seems to be original in using it as such. This inconvenience, or, if you please, imperfection, has been suffered by some very great men, but quite rarely, if ever, has it been experienced by any very little ones. Caesar is said to have been more grateful to the Roman people for granting him the right to wear the laurel crown, than for any other of their gifts, because the wearing it enabled him to conceal the exterior baldness of his head. If it be true, as Shakspeare tells us it is, that what nature has scantied men in wit, she has made up to them in hair, then the gentleman, I believe, should he win a laurel crown, would never, like Cæsar, have occasion to wear it, for any lack of that commodity. Who reviled the prophet, returning from the blazing translation of his master, with a countenance bright with the glories of opening heaven, and wrapt in the mantle of Elijah—who, sir, reviled the prophet for his “bald head?” Profligate young men, boys, children, as they are called; the scum and sweepings of the city, and, as we find by the historian, fit only for food for those animals which are fed on offal.

The gentleman is equally out in his ornithology, as in every thing else. The bird of Jove, not the vulture, is that soaring wonder, by men called the “bald eagle;” and, sir, never was that “soaring eagle, in his pride of place, hawked at, and brought down by the mousing owl.”

Sir, my remarks have been excursive, but I have travelled over no ground where some one of the gentlemen had not placed himself before me. If these gentlemen are out of the field, and I do not see them in force on any point of the argument, I will return to the questions made by us under our motion.

[At this period of his speech, Mr. BURGESS gave way to a motion for adjournment. On the Monday following, when the subject was resumed by the House, Mr. B. continued as follows:]

I ask the House to inquire, whether the salary to be provided, under our law, by this appropriation, can be due for an illegal and void mission? Ambassadors and other public ministers, though they may be appointed by any sovereign community, yet, being officers sustained and sent abroad by the laws of nations only, must be appointed and commissioned in conformity to those laws. The power of every nation is confined to its own territory; and, therefore, no officer of one nation can, as such, pass into the territory of any other, and there exercise any official functions whatever. Nations being moral persons, like individuals, have established certain laws for their own mutual intercourse. Under these laws the offices of heralds, legates, ambassadors, envoys, and other public ministers, have been created, and by them are the powers, rights, and immunities of all such officers governed. Our Executive can, therefore, create public ministers; but it must be seen that the foundation of their power to do so is laid down in the laws of nations. (Vat. book iv, ch. 5, § 56-7.)

“Every sovereign State, then, has a right to send and receive public ministers; they are the necessary instruments in affairs which sovereigns have among themselves, and to that correspondence which they have a right of carrying on. In the first chapter of this work may be seen what we mean by sovereign and independent States which constitute the great society of nations. These are the powers which belong to the right of embassy, and an unequal alliance or treaty of protection does not take away this right.”

Our law providing salaries for public ministers and consuls, and the constitution, by vesting the power of appointing them in the President and Senate, has neither created nor recognised any new power in the United States, nor incident to them in common with all other nations; nor can any authority be drawn from this law, or the constitution itself, to appoint public ministers or consuls, other than such only as are known, acknowledged, and established by the great code of laws governing the intercourse of all civilized nations. Our Executive can, therefore, neither give powers to consuls or public ministers, nor send them abroad for purposes unknown to those laws.

Should the President and Senate appoint, and send into foreign countries, consuls, as France once did, with admiralty powers on questions of capture under the laws of war, would these be consuls under our constitution, unless they were such under the laws and usages of nations?

In like manner, if the Executive create missions, and appoint ministers to go into the territories of other nations, there to hear and decide controversies arising among American citizens, or to try and punish crimes mutually committed by such citizens against each other, could we be called upon, under our law or constitution, for appropriations to pay their outfits and salaries? Why not? Because the laws of nations have established no such consulate, no such mission, no such minister; and no nation can create a new embassy, or one unknown to the laws of nations.

A sovereignty may send abroad ambassadors, envoys, or resident ministers. It may also send envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary; a grade of diplomatic functionaries comprehending the especial officers of the envoy and the resident minister. These ministers, however, must be sent for some specific purpose, which must be in its nature public and national, and they must be addressed, and carry credentials of their appointment and character, to some designated sovereign. Sovereigns can accredit and receive resident ministers; but will it be pretended that they can accredit and receive non-resident ministers, such as, when so accredited and received by the Government of one nation, are thereby authorized and empowered to reside as ministers to that nation in the territories of any other! The act of accrediting and receiving public ministers is one of the highest acts of sovereignty. Under the confederation, it was done in Congress assembled. By the constitution, this august attribute of sovereignty is conferred on the President. In all the Governments of the old world, this act of sovereignty is, I believe, in like manner, performed by the Chief Magistrate of the nation. Although the whole sovereignty of a nation be, in accrediting and receiving a public minister, put in requisition by the potentate who performs this great State ceremonial, yet the legal effects of this act of sovereignty must be limited by whatsoever limits all the acts of each and every sovereignty. The legislative, judicial, and executive powers of every nation are limited by the territory of such nation; and, therefore, every exercise of any of those powers must, in their operations, be confined to the territory of the nation exercising them. The august act of sovereignty, therefore, by which a public minister is accredited and received by the Executive potentate of any nation, like the laws and judicial decisions of that nation, can have no efficiency, no legal existence, otherwise than as a mere matter of fact, beyond the territorial limits of that nation. Whenever, therefore, any sovereignty does accredit and receive a resident minister, such minister receives thereby no powers which are not, like the powers of that sovereignty itself, limited, and confined to the national territory. For the Executive power of one nation to accredit and receive a minister as a resident minister at its own court, and in its own territory, and, at the same time, to authorize and empower such minister, thereby, to reside at any other court, or in any other country, would be nothing short of direct usurpation in the Executive doing it; for, to accredit and receive a public minister, is one of the highest exercises of sovereignty, and, therefore, whenever the Executive of one nation does accredit and receive a minister, to reside in the territory of another nation, such Executive does exercise one of the highest acts of sovereignty over that nation. This would be usurpation.

Before gentlemen contend that this power of accrediting and receiving non-resident ministers belongs to sovereignties, they must show some warrant for it from the laws of nations. Do they contend that the right of embassy is derived from the law of nature, and not from the convention and agreement of nations; and that, therefore, one sovereign might, by the laws of nature, receive ambassadors from another, and, by endorsing their credentials, authorize them to pass into the territories of any other nations? It is admitted that heralds, envoys, and ambassadors were sent, and received, and respected, between armies and armies, nations and nations, by virtue of the law of nature, I presume; for this was certainly done both in Asia and Europe, before any such code as the law of nations existed in the world. These ministers derived their powers, and protection, from the necessity of the case, and were compelled to go right forward on the errand for which they were sent; and, when that was finished, to return in the most direct route. These principles, as the historian of Cortes tells us, were found by the Spaniards to exist in Mexico. For the envoys, sent by him to Montezuma, were protected while they kept directly on their journey, and in the highway; but, if they left that path, they forfeited all protection. Even these necessary messengers of war or peace, of congratulation or alliance, between sovereignties, could receive no powers, either from those who sent them, or from those to whom they were sent, to sojourn for any purpose in any other country; nor were they permitted to tarry, either in the place where their business was to be done, after that was finished, or to loiter on their way home. This power of non-residence, therefore, was wholly unknown to the intercourse of nations, derived from the laws of nature.

Resident ministers do not derive their powers from the laws of nature. For surely that could never require any community to permit the citizens of any other community to come and reside in their territory, unless they become subjected to their laws and jurisdiction. Accordingly, we find such ministers were unknown in Europe until the sixteenth century. Ward, in that part of his history and foundation of the law of nations which relates to the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, says:

"Within this period, among the States of Europe, began that remarkable and characteristic custom, of entertaining ordinary or resident embassies at one another's courts: an institution peculiar to themselves, and particularly evincive of those many distinctions which there are between their law of nations, and that of other sets of people."

"Ambassadors in ordinary have been attributed by some to Ferdinand the Catholic, whose policy led him to entertain them at various courts, as a kind of honorable spies; by others, with no small probability, to an imitation of the Pope, who had long been in the habit of sending nuncios to reside at various courts in the service of religion. But, whatever was their origin, the jurists seem to agree that they are not of natural right; and, however universal they may since have grown, doubts, about the period before us, were apparently entertained of their utility. Henry IV of France, while King of Navarre, entertained none at other courts; and Henry VII, 'that wise and politique King,' says Lord Coke, 'would not in all his time suffer Leiger, [residence of] ambassadors of any foreign king, or prince, within his realm, nor he with them; but upon occasion used ambassadors.' So late as 1660, a member of the Polish Diet asserted that the ambassador of France had no cause of residence there, and that, as he did not return home, according to the custom of ambassadors, he ought to be considered as a spy. Two years afterwards, the deputies proposed very warmly to send home all ambassadors whatsoever, and to make a law regulating the time of their stay; and even the Dutch, who, one would imagine, had greater reason than the Polish nobles for encouraging an intercourse with foreigners, debated, in 1651, how far this sort of embassy was of any advantage to them. The greater part of nations, however, have now admitted their necessity; and though, at the commencement of the period before us, men had affixed no precise ideas to what was considered as a novelty, and even now the admission of these embassies cannot be demanded as a matter of law, yet the custom is so general, and they are considered as so much of course, that the friendship of States can hardly be maintained without them. Not to send them, therefore, has been sometimes regarded as an affront."

The right to send, and the power to accredit and receive resident ministers at any court, being matter of convention and agreement among nations, it will be found that all the causes which have conspired to produce that agreement, do unite in excluding the very idea of accrediting and receiving non-resident ministers. Nay, sir, so unwilling have nations been to enter into any agreement that one sovereignty shall have power to accredit and receive ministers to reside in the territory of any other, that they have not yet agreed to protect ambassadors, while passing through their territories, in going to, or returning from, the place of their mission. Ward, and the authorities quoted by him, notwithstanding Vattel is of a different opinion, do establish this doctrine.

"I cannot quit this interesting and remarkable subject, without observing that the privileges in question have been carried by some to an extent even greater than that which we have been examining. In the treatise of Vattel, we find the following positions: that, although the sovereign to whom an ambassador is addressed, is particularly called upon to protect him in his privileges, yet that the same duty extends to other sovereigns to whom he is not addressed, but through whose country he is obliged to pass for the purposes of his mission. To insult him, says Vattel, is to affront his master and his whole nation; to arrest him, or to offer violence to his person, is to wound the rights of embassies which belong to every sovereign.

"This doctrine arises out of some considerations upon the case of Rincon and Fregoze, ambassadors of Francis I of France, the one to the Porte, the other to Venice. These ministers, passing down the Po in their passage, and being suspected of bearing despatches prejudicial to the interests of the Emperor Charles V, were set upon and murdered, apparently by the orders of the Governor of Milan. But the Emperor, although at that time at peace with Francis, appears not to have been inclined to punish the authors of the murder. Upon this transaction Vattel observes, that it was an atrocious attempt against the law of nations; that Francis had not only a very just cause for war against the Emperor, but also to demand the assistance of all other nations in its support. For it was an affair, not of two individuals, who each of them supposed they had right on their side, but of all States whatsoever, who were interested in maintaining the rights of embassy.

"It, perhaps, does not fall exactly within the scope of this treatise, to examine whether this opinion is really law, as it is received at present. But we may venture to observe that, in this position, Vattel stands sole; at least, all the authors on the law of nations, who have preceded him, after discussing the point at length, have come to a conclusion directly the reverse of his; and that which they have concluded is supported by a great variety of cases, both of an ancient and a recent date. Thus Albericus Gentilis, upon this very case of Rincon and Fregoze, observes merely, 'Probrum id Carolo fuisse.' Sed alia questio est, adds Bynkershoek, de jure legationis, alia de jure hostatilis. Grotius, who followed Gentilis, after having given his opinions at length upon the inviolability of ambassadors, says expressly that it is only to be understood to be binding on those sovereigns to whom they are sent, 'Non pertinet ergo hæc lex ad eos per quorum finis, non accepta venia, transeunt legati.' It is true, the non accepta venia may be made by some to amount to an inviolability, provided they have passports. But it may be fairly questioned whether the possession of a passport itself can confer any thing more than the common protection to which common aliens have a right. Bynkershoek, at least, without taking notice of passports at all, understands Grotius to mean, generally, that the privilege in question shall not have place in countries to which ambassadors are not addressed. Of this opinion, also, were Zouch, Wicquefort, who has been deemed the very champion of the rights of ambassadors, and who decides that the case of Rincon and Fregozo, though an atrocious murder, was not a violation of the law of nations as to embassies; Huber; and, lastly, Bynkershoek, who had particular occasion to examine the point but a short time before Vattel. The subject came before the latter in considering the meaning of the passage which formed part of a declaration of the States General in favor of the inviolability of ambassadors; and the difficulty was to know whether the word 'passerende' was applicable to ambassadors to other Powers, passing through Holland, or confined simply to those addressed to the States, coming, residing, and passing away, or retiring. To solve this difficulty, he inquired into the opinions of the jurists concerning the point in discussion, and determined that it applied solely to ambassadors who were addressed to the States."

"Selim II, in the sixteenth century, being at peace with Venice, but meditating war, sent a minister to the King of France to know his sentiments of it. He endeavored to pass through Venice, but was arrested, and the French ambassador there, and the King himself, claimed his liberty as addressed to them. But they were forced to yield to the arguments of the republic, 'that a sovereign Power need not recognise a public minister as such, unless it is to him that his credentials are addressed.'"

"In 1572, Elizabeth, of England, having reason to be jealous of the machinations of the French in Scotland, arrested all Frenchmen passing through the Kingdom to that country without passport. Among these was Du Croc, the French ambassador to Scotland, and his court complained loudly of this as a violation of the law of nations. But Walsingham, the Secretary, pleaded, that it was Du Croc's own fault for not taking a passport, he might justly be detained, and with this plea the French were content, notwithstanding his quality of ambassador."

Sir, what is the mission invented in this case by Mr. Secretary Van Buren; and what the diplomatic character of the minister now under consideration? This gentleman was, by order of the Executive, carried out from Norfolk to Russia in a national ship, with every circumstance of high respect, and at a cost of not less than forty thousand dollars for his passage. He arrived at St. Petersburg; was presented to his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia; exhibited his credentials; was accredited as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at that court; retired and took his departure from the Russian territories, all in the short space of ten days. It is contended by gentlemen who support this appropriation, that he is our minister. If so, he must be our minister non-resident at the court of St. Petersburg: for it is too much to say that stopping ten days at that city would make him, in legal acceptance, resident there, but that six months' residence in England will not render him legally a non-resident at St. Petersburg. If, then, he can be our minister at all, he must be our non-resident minister. He has been sent to St. Petersburg to be accredited there by his Imperial Majesty; and, by force of being thus accredited, we are gravely told by the Secretary of State that he has acquired the rights and powers of a minister of the United States, wherever he may choose to reside. Sir, will nations admit this kind of non-resident, this migratory mission, this diplomatic gossiping? This doctrine of "non-locality," so essential, in the Secretary's constitutional creed, to the existence of a national road, he will find does not belong to the character of a resident public minister, and really has no place among nations, out of the cabinet, so adroitly conducted by himself.

If gentlemen still contend that Mr. Randolph is our envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary non-resident at the court of St. Petersburg, they must contend that, wheresoever he does reside, he is still vested with the high diplomatic qualities and attributes which, by the laws of nations, belong to such a public minister. What are these? They are comprehended in two very expressive words—personal inviolability. Not only are his person and effects exempted from all legal diligence, but whoever shall treat him with insult or disrespect is liable to be punished. A public minister cannot be sued for a contract or a trespass; he cannot be prosecuted for a felony. If he commit homicide, with every circumstance of malice, or conspire with traitors to overthrow the Government to which he is sent, he can neither be punished nor prosecuted, nor even questioned concerning these crimes. Vattel asserts:

"The necessity and right of embassies being established, (see chap. v. of this book,) the perfect security, the inviolability of ambassadors and other ministers, is a certain consequence of it: for, if their person be not defended from violence of every kind, the right of embassies becomes precarious, and success very uncertain. A right to the end is a right to the necessary means. Embassies, then, being of such great importance in the universal society of nations, and so necessary to their common well-being, the person of ministers charged with this embassy is to be sacred and inviolable among all nations, (see book II, § 218.) Whoever offers any violence to an ambassador, or any other public minister, not only injures the sovereign whom this minister represents, but he also hurts the common safety and wellbeing of nations; he becomes guilty of an atrocious crime towards the whole world."

This doctrine is further confirmed:

"In fine, if an ambassador could be indicted for common trespasses, be criminally prosecuted, taken into custody, punished; if he might be sued in civil cases, the consequence will often be that he will want the power, leisure, or freedom of mind, which his master's affairs require. How will the dignity of the representation be supported in such a subjection? From all these reasons, it is impossible to conceive that the prince, in sending an ambassador, or any other minister, intends to submit him to the authority of a foreign Power. This is a fresh reason, which fixes the independency of a public minister. If it cannot be reasonably presumed that his master means to submit him to the authority of a sovereign to whom he is sent, this sovereign, in receiving the minister, consents to admit him on the footing of independency. And thus there subsists between the two princes a passive convention, giving a new force to the natural obligation."

In 1567, Leslie, Bishop of Ross, came to the court of Elizabeth, as ambassador of Mary, Queen of Scots, who was then detained a prisoner by her royal cousin. This man, in taking care of the concerns of Mary, conspired with certain English noblemen to depose Elizabeth, and place Mary on the throne of England. The plot was discovered; the Duke of Norfolk and others were executed for treason; but though Elizabeth dared afterwards to steep her hands in the blood of her royal captive, and thereby to violate all other laws, human and divine, she dared not violate the laws of nations, by punishing the ambassador of the unfortunate Queen of Scotland. In 1584, Mendoza, the Spanish ambassador in England, conspired to dethrone the Queen, by introducing foreign troops into the country. This conspiracy being discovered, the court of Elizabeth took the opinions, as Ward tells us, of the celebrated Albericus Gentilis, then in England, and of Hottoman, in France, another great civilian, concerning the manner of proceeding against Mendoza. "They both asserted that an ambassador, though a conspirator, could not be put to death, but must be remanded to his principal for punishment. In consequence of this, Mendoza was simply ordered to depart the realm, and a commission sent to Spain to prefer a complaint against him."

Three years afterwards, L'Aubaspine, the French ambassador, in his devotion to Mary, conspired not only to dethrone, but to assassinate Elizabeth. He actually hired a ruffian from Newgate to perform this deed of atrocity. Some disagreement concerning the means to be used induced delay in the execution, and led to a discovery. When the ambassador was called upon for examination, he replied, "I will hear no accusation to the prejudice of the privileges of ambassadors;" and though Lord Burleigh reproached him for his turpitude, yet the English court never thought of trying him for treason.—Ward, 314–15.

Sir, such are the high and distinguishing attributes and characteristics of "ambassadors and other public ministers," under the laws of nations. These immunities and privileges belong to Mr. Randolph, if he be the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States resident at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, or in any part of his territory. We know, however, that he is non-resident there; and are we prepared to say that, if he acquired these immunities by his visit to that court, and his being accredited there, he now carries them with him wherever he may make it his pleasure to sojourn? If he be a public minister, he has these immunities; if he be without them, then is he no public minister. What lawyer in this House, or nation, or indeed in the civilized world, would pledge his character upon the allegation that John Randolph might, like the Bishop of Ross, Mendoza, and L'Aubaspine, join a conspiracy to dethrone and assassinate the sovereign of England; and, like them, when questioned for the treason, allege his immunities as public minister, and refuse to "hear any accusation to the prejudice of the privileges of ambassadors?" Sir, the absurdity is too enormous to be entertained by any man of sane mind and ordinary understanding. If, then, he have not these immunities, he is not a public minister of the United States; and it is a mockery of the nation to call on their Representatives to appropriate money for the payment of his salary.

We are not to suppose that a public minister, because he is exempted from legal process in the country to which he is sent, is therefore not amenable to any laws whatever for any part of his conduct. He is not within the legal jurisdiction of the country where he is accredited, although at the capital and court of the sovereign, and protected by his whole civil and military power: but he carries with him the jurisdiction of his own country; and it is because he is, by force of the laws of nations, within the jurisdiction of his own country, that he cannot be within that of the country where he is accredited and received as a public minister. Those who travel the ocean in your fleets of ships and vessels, either the mercantile or naval, though their "home seems to be on the deep," yet, by force of law, are they within the body of the country and district of our country from which they departed on the voyage, or to which they may return when that is finished. Their contracts, or trespasses, or crimes, though done on the deep sea, in the most distant ocean, yet are within the legal jurisdiction of their country. In like manner, your public ministers, to whatever court you send them, and wherever they are accredited, carry with them, and are there surrounded by, the jurisdiction of the United States. The highest officer of justice in the country where they are received, when he steps over the threshold of their house, becomes, as in the District of Columbia, an ordinary citizen; and the imperial State warrant in his pocket is whitened into blank paper, and can no more be executed by him there on a public minister, than, if he stood on this floor, with the same warrant in his hand, he could, by virtue of it, arrest me or you, Mr. Speaker.

I have not spoken without authorities on this subject. Ward tells us, page 297:

"An ambassador neither knows nor submits to the laws of the country to which he is sent; he goes not on his own account, on private business, or private pleasure, but as the representative of another; as the presentation of the dignity, privileges, power, and rights which others would enjoy had they continued within their own precincts. And thus, by consent, and a sense of mutual advantage, he is allowed to represent and personify, if I may so call it, all these high privileges, in the very bosom of another community, for the sake of transacting better the whole business of the world."

Vattel says, page 548:

"But it is not on account of the sacredness of their persons that ambassadors cannot be sued; it is because they do not depend on the jurisdiction of the country whither they are sent: and the solid reasons for this independency may be seen above. (92.) Let us here add that it is entirely proper, and even necessary, that an ambassador should not be liable to any juridical prosecution, even for a civil cause, that he may not be disturbed in the exercise of his functions."

He further tells us, page 554:

"The independency of the ambassador would be very imperfect, and his security weakly founded, did not the house in which he lives enjoy an entire exemption, so as to be inaccessible to the ordinary officers of justice. The ambassador might be disturbed under a thousand pretences; his secrets might be discovered, by searching his papers; and his person exposed to insults. Thus, all the reasons which establish his independency and inviolability concur likewise to secure the freedom of his house."

This independency and exemption from foreign jurisdiction belongs to the public functionary, not to the man; is given for the public, and not for his own benefit; and, therefore, cannot be laid aside, even so far as to become a party in a suit, while he continues to be a minister, without the consent of his master. To this effect, Vattel says, page 549:

"But if the ambassador will partly recede from his independency, and subject himself in civil affairs to the jurisdiction of the country, he unquestionably may, provided it be done with his master's consent; but, without such a consent, the ambassador has no right to waive privileges in which the dignity and service of his sovereign are concerned—which are founded on the master's rights, and made for his advantage, and not for that of the minister."

Has Mr. Randolph carried the jurisdiction of the United States with him into England? and does that jurisdiction now surround him, as it does each one of us, and exclude from his person, his effects, and his house, all English jurisdiction? The case of the Russian ambassador in England is in point: It happened in the time of Queen Anne, 1707. The Russian ambassador at her court was arrested in the street for debt, taken out of his coach, and carried by the tipstaff to a common spunging-house, and detained there until he was bailed by the Earl of Feversham. By the laws of England, these proceedings against the ambassador were void, but no adequate punishment had been by law provided for such offenders. Ward tells us on this subject, pages 299, 300, 301, that on this occasion the statute 7 Anne, c. 12, was enacted; that "The preamble, however, having merely observed that the Muscovite ambassador had been taken out of his coach by violence, in contempt of the protection granted by Her Majesty, without taking notice of the breach of the law of nations, 'which is superior and antecedent to all municipal laws,' the foreign ministers in London met again together, and procured the addition of these words: 'Contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges which ambassadors, and other public ministers authorized and received as such, have at all times been thereby possessed of, and which ought to be kept sacred and inviolable.' With this act of Parliament, elegantly engrossed, and an apology for not being able to punish the persons of those who had affronted his minister, the Czar, who had first insisted upon their deaths, was at length induced to be content; and thus ended this delicate affair."

Should Mr. Randolph, like the Russian minister at the court of Queen Anne, be arrested for debt, and carried to a spunging-house for lack of bail, could he claim protection as an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States? Sir, that statute was provided for those "ministers who were authorized and received as such," not in other countries, but in England. This gentleman can take no protection under it. He has abandoned the jurisdiction of the United States for that of England; the high immunities and labors of a public minister for the comforts and retirement of a private gentleman, in some farm-house or inconsiderable inn in the county of Suffolk. The American arms and ensign he has either never placed over the door, or he has ordered them to be pulled down and thrown into the garret. Who can point out the place to the American citizen where the American envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary non-resident at Russia may now be found? Will gentlemen further contend that, by some new fiction of diplomatic law, he is still our minister, and that we are bound, in behalf of the nation, to make this appropriation for his salary?

There is another view of this part of the question, which truth and justice do not permit me to pass by in silence. Let the admission be made, for the purpose of the argument, that such a minister may, by the laws of nations, be accredited and received by a foreign Power. If so, he must have been nominated and appointed as a minister of that character. Any sovereign State may send abroad, and have received, several different kinds of public ministers. The first in rank is the ambassador. He is not only a mandatory, as all others are, but he is also the representative of the sovereignty which sends him; and in the presence of the sovereign receiving, he stands, as one king does in the presence of another, without uncovering his head. The envoy is another grade of minister, and is charged with the doing of some particular act, which, when he has finished, he returns home. Resident ministers are in rank below envoys, and are charged with such relations of their Governments where they reside, as require the constant attention of some mandatory or agent for their care and supervision. The envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary is a high mandatory, empowered to do whatever may be done by any other minister, except the representation of the sovereignty which has sent him abroad. He is inferior in rank to none but the ambassador. Commissioners are sent out on special agencies, and are received and accredited as ministers of an inferior grade. The chargé d'affaires is accredited as such, and takes the duties, though not the rank, of resident minister.

If, sir, in addition to all these, foreign courts could accredit and receive non-resident ministers, or such as might reside either at such courts, or wherever else they might choose, and continue to be ministers wherever they might go or reside, then is it not manifest that they must have been designated as ministers of this character, both in their appointment and in their commission? The nomination made by the President to the Senate, is the foundation of the mission, and it must fully set forth the name of the man to be sent, the place to which he is to be sent, the purpose for which he is sent, and the ministerial character of him who is to be sent. Without all these, how can the Senate advise and consent to his appointment? Accordingly we find that the President made this nomination with all these distinguishing characteristics.

"Tuesday, May 25, 1830.—The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his Secretary:

"To the Senate of the United States: Gentlemen: I nominate John Randolph, of Roanoke, Virginia, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, in the place of Henry Middleton, of South Carolina, recalled."

Was this man nominated to be minister at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, and elsewhere? No, sir, it was at, in place of Mr. Middleton; and at that place only. If, therefore, a non-resident minister could, by the laws of nations, be sent abroad, or could have been advised and consented to by the Senate, Mr. Randolph could not have been so sent, for he was not so nominated. Did the Senate advise or consent to this gentleman's appointment to any other ministerial office than that to which he was nominated? Let the record answer:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the message nominating John Randolph to office; and,

"Resolved, That they do advise and consent to the appointment of John Randolph, agreeably to his nomination."

If the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint public ministers, then the appointment of this man could not differ from the nomination made by the President, and the advice and consent thereupon had and given by the Senate. If, then, he might have been accredited and received at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, as a non-resident minister, he could not have been so sent, for he was not so appointed.

After this gentleman had been nominated, confirmed, and appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at the court of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, could his commission differ from his appointment? Could the Secretary of State, from this record, make out and deliver to him a commission as ambassador, and thus send this peculiar gentleman to the most splendid court in Europe, to represent the entire sovereignty of these United States, an office of honor and high dignity, which has never hitherto been, by this Government, conferred on any of those talented and highly accomplished statesmen, who, as public ministers, have gone abroad from this country? If, by the laws of nations, a non-resident minister could be received by a foreign Power, could this gentleman, under this appointment, receive the commission, and enjoy the immunities of such a minister? Appointed minister at the Russian court, could he, honestly, and according to the record, have been commissioned at that court, and elsewhere? I beg leave to read the formula in like cases, (1 vol. Lym.) addressed by the Secretary of State to the appointed minister. "Sir, with this letter, (among other things,) you will receive, 1st, a commission as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. 2. A letter of credence to the King. 3. A passport for yourself and family." Has the Secretary given him such a commission? Beyond question, he has given it. This is not all. He tells us in the message, under the name of the President, that he has also given him a commission at the court of his Imperial Majesty, and elsewhere. If this be true, and Mr. Randolph is now traveling or sojourning under it, he has abandoned the appointment made by the President, under advisement of the Senate, and has ceased to be minister of the United States at that court; and, if he be a minister at all, he is a minister elsewhere; and, as such, is literally the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Secretary, not of the President and Senate, or of the nation.

The same difficulties must have attended this mission at the Russian court. The credentials given to Mr. Randolph must show his ministerial character; and in that character alone could he have been received by the Emperor. So we are told by Vattel, page 523—

"Among the several characters established by custom, it is in the sovereign's choice with which he will invest his minister; and the character of the minister is made known in the credentials which he delivers to the sovereign to whom he is sent. Letters of credence are the instruments which authorize and establish the minister

'in his character with the prince to whom they are addressed. If this prince receives the minister, he can receive him only in the quality attributed to him in his credentials. They are, as it were, his general letter of attorney, his mandate patent, mandatum manifestum."

Had this gentleman two sets of credentials, two commissions, and did he exhibit them both to the Emperor? Did he, in fact, tell his Majesty, "Your summer is too hot—your winter will be too cold. The fur which has warmed a bear, may warm a Russian monarch, but it can never warm me. My constitution is worn out in the public service. I shall be sick—I am sick. I must reside elsewhere, any where, in England, in France, in a more genial climate than that of your Majesty's capital." It is too much to be supposed, even of Mr. Randolph. He presented his at credentials and commission. His elsewhere credentials and commission were retained for use when he should arrive, I know not where, but certainly elsewhere.

Sir, our law has been evaded; the constitution has been evaded; the laws of nations have been evaded; the President, the Senate, and our imperial friend, have been deceived, and the minister himself, suffering himself to be made a party to this imposition, has fallen into the devices of the Secretary; has been by him got out of the country on a mission, illegal, void, and nugatory; and is now, the deplorable dupe of State artifice, cruising about Europe, like some contraband trader, under a double commission, and with two sets of papers.

Will it be contended by the supporters of this appropriation, that this gentleman will, after months of recess from the public service at the Russian court, return thither, and by years of efficient labor efface all memory of this interval of idleness and neglect? What cause, sir, have we to believe that he will ever return to St. Petersburg? Observe what the Secretary has told us in the message: "If, as it is to be hoped, the improvement of his health should be such as to justify him in doing so, he will repair to St. Petersburg, and resume the discharge of his official duties." This does not affirm that he will return; it affirms that "it is to be hoped he may be well enough to do so." According to the message, a want of health took him away from that court. Different reasons were given for those facts by the official papers. By the Richmond Official, the summer heat compelled his departure; by the Official in this city, the approaching cold of the then coming winter drove him to seek a more genial climate. In Russia, summer is said to burst from the frozen bosom of winter, like a sheet of flame from Mount Hecla, and to spread its warming, blazing, burning influence at once over the whole region. At times, so intense is the temperature, that the pine forests take fire from the heat of the atmosphere. I have read a Russian traveller, who says vegetation is so rapid, that, on a soil thawed not more than one foot deep, the ground is ploughed, the wheat sown, grown, ripened, and harvested in six weeks. Winter comes on the country as summer came, extinguishing, at once, the heat of the air and earth, by throwing down and spreading out one vast sheet of snow, from Cronstadt to Kamtschatka. The genial and joyous airs of spring, the sober and gladsome sunshines and shades of autumn, known under the Italian skies of Virginia, have never visited, and never can visit, a Russian climate. Unless, therefore, this gentleman can visit Russia in summer, when he has been compelled to leave it, or in winter, when he dares not approach it, he cannot return again to St. Petersburg. What reason had the Secretary for the hopes expressed in the message, that the renovated health of Mr. Randolph might induce him to return? Permit me to quote from one of his speeches, delivered on this floor little more than two years ago.

"Sir, what can the country do for me? As for power, what charm can it have for one like me? If power had 'been my object, I must have been less sagacious than my worst enemies have represented me to be, if I had not obtained it. * * *

'Was it office? What, sir, to drudge in your laboratories in the departments, or be at the tail of your corps diplomatique in Europe! (Exiled to Siberia.) Alas! sir, in my condition, a cup of cold water would be more acceptable. What can the country give me that I do not possess in the confidence of such constituents as no man ever had before? I can retire to my old patrimonial trees, where I may see the sun rise and set in peace. *

'I shall retire upon my resources—I will go back to the bosom of my constituents. * * *

'And shall I give up them and this? And for what? For the heartless amusements and rapid pleasures and tarnished honors of this abode of splendid misery, of shabby splendor? for a clerkship in the War Office, or a foreign mission, to dance attendance abroad instead of at home—or even for a department itself? Sir, thirty years make sad changes in man. * * *

'I feel that I hang to existence by a single hair—that the sword of Damocles is suspended over me."

Will this gentleman, think you, return to Russia, hanging to existence by a single hair? Will he travel from region to region of Europe, with this sword of Damocles dangling over his head by a tie, equally attenuated? Never, sir, never; and if he never do return, as he most certainly never will, when does his mission end, if it did not end when he left the Russian court? If this mission ever had a legal beginning, when, or by what acts may it be ended? Vattel has told us, page 559, that all missions end: first, when the minister is recalled; second, when he is dismissed; third, when he has finished the business on which he was sent; and fourth, in a word, whenever he is obliged to go away, on any account whatever, his functions cease. By the laws of nations, which we cannot control, his mission was at an end when "he went away" from the court and country to which he was appointed and sent; and neither the mandate of the Secretary, nor congressional enactment, can continue him a minister one moment after he has, by the laws of nations, ceased to be one. Can we then appropriate money for the salary of such a minister? Not unless we make ourselves parties to this imposition; and, in the name of the nation, guaranty this fraudulent diplomacy.

Gentlemen may place this salary on the ground of a quantum meruit, and tell us Mr. Randolph is entitled to receive it, and we are bound to make the appropriation, because he has performed services at Russia, for which he deserves to have this compensation. What services was it intended he should perform; what in fact did he perform; what, in so short a time, could he perform? We are told by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, [Mr. AUCHINCLOSS,] and no man ever doubts his candor and correctness, that Mr. Randolph did not perform what he was sent out to do. However meritorious that might be when done, he surely does not deserve any compensation for not doing it. How did this gentleman represent, when presented at that court, the form and body of our national character, by his appearance, his manners, conversation, and intercourse with the imperial family, the court, and foreign ministers then and there representing the various sovereignties of Europe and Asia? I could give the history of this ten days, this, which will, in our Russian diplomacy, be called the time of Randolph; I could give it from the most authentic testimonials; not from rumor, but from the voice of honorable, intelligent men, who, being there at the time, have since returned to this country, and from letters with which the Russian correspondence of our Atlantic cities has been crowded. All these speak but one language, express but one feeling—the irrepressible feeling of wounded and mortified patriotism. All these, instead of finding merit in this man's diplomatic achievements, look on them with unutterable anguish; and have no consolation under the gibes and jeerings of foreign nations, but the memory of the past, when the dignified character of our republic was represented in Europe by Franklin, Jay, Adams, Livingston, Jefferson, and Pinckney. Nothing, sir, but national pride has withholden this narrative from the ear of the world; for who would give a tongue to obloquy against his own country? I will, in silence, pass over the doings of this gentleman's ten days of diplomacy; nor would I have alluded to them, did not his friends draw on these very doings as a fund of merit, entitling him to this compensation. The doings of ten days! What, sir, could he do in that time? Why, in that time the discipline of the Russian tailor could scarcely have reduced the rigid outline of this man into the exterior of diplomacy. He performed services for his country in that brief period! Cæsar, with the eagle wing of pursuit, and the lion strength of conquest, overrun Bithynia, and subdued the son of the great Mithridates in a few weeks. This conqueror might, in the confidence of friendship, venture, with poetic license, to write to his associate at Rome, "veni, vidi, vici." Should our Russian envoy write the history of his ten days, he might, without poetry, place all, for which he can have any claim on his country, in as few, and almost the same words; veni, vidi, abivi, would fill up the whole quantum meruit of his mission.

If it be contended that this gentleman is entitled to a pro rata compensation for the time spent in going to Russia, and while there, as freight is apportioned and paid, when a cargo is, by casualty, transported a part only of the voyage, I am ready to agree that this alone is the ground on which any thing whatever can be claimed. This, however, will fail, if the mission be, in its inception, contra jus gentium; and therefore void. If there be any part of this mission sound and legal; if this gentleman has believed he was, in good faith, in the public service, in the name of justice let him be paid for all that time, although nothing was effected beneficial to the nation. On this ground I am ready to support, though I cannot move to make any modification of the motion under consideration.

Last of all, I come to inquire whether this salary can be due, because this mission, and the conduct of the minister under it, may be especially beneficial to the Secretary of State. Was this gentleman appointed with any view or expectation that he could render diplomatic services at the court of Russia? Surely not. For, in the first place, the performance of such services required his residence at the Russian court. This is evident from the nature of those services, as may be seen from reading the ordinary instructions to all resident ministers; Lyman's Diplomacy, vol. 1, pages 15, 16, 17:

"Among the most important general duties of a minister of the United States in foreign countries, is that of transmitting to his Government accurate information of the policy and views of the Government to which he is accredited, and of the character and vicissitudes of its important relations with other European Powers. To acquire this information, and particularly to discriminate between that which is authentic, and that which is spurious, requires steady and impartial observation, a free though cautious correspondence with the other ministers of the United States abroad, and friendly, social relations with the members of the diplomatic body at the same court.

"In your correspondence with this department, besides the current general and particular politics of the country where you are to reside, you will be mindful, so far as you may find it convenient, to collect and transmit information of every kind, relating to the Government, finances, commerce, arts, sciences, and condition of the nation, which is not already known, and may be made useful to our country. Books of travels, containing statistical or other information of political importance, historical works, not before in circulation, authentic maps, published by authority of the State, or distinguished by extraordinary reputation, and publications of new and useful discoveries—will always be acceptable acquisitions to this department."

"Among the ordinary functions of an American minister in Europe, is that of giving passports to citizens of the United States, who apply for them. They sometimes receive applications for such passports from the subjects of other countries; but as these are not regularly valid, they should be granted only under special circumstances, as may sometimes occur in the case of foreigners coming to the United States."

Do not these labors require residence at the court of his Imperial Majesty? Look into the published diplomatic correspondence of our former ministers. What treasures of information! What monuments of ability, labor, and diligence!

This gentleman could not reside at the Russian capital. Neither his health, his constitution, his age, nor the climate, would permit such residence. As well might the Secretary have plucked up one of his patrimonial oaks, and transplanted it on the banks of the Neva, with any expectation that it might take root there, and live, and flourish in the summer heats and winter storms of Russia. So utterly out of the question was all expectation of public service from the appointment of this gentleman, that although it must have been known such service could not be rendered without residence, yet he received full permission to leave the court and empire of Russia, and reside wherever he might choose to reside.

Mr. Randolph was, of all men, the last which a wise and judicious policy would have selected to represent the interests of our nation at the Russian court. He had publicly expressed opinions concerning that court and the imperial family, most derogatory and degrading. Suffer me to read these opinions, from one of his speeches, published under his own corrections and supervisal, in Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, volume 2, part 1, page 392-3.

"Now, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina is so extremely unreasonable as to wish—he will bear with my reproof, I hope—as to wish to break the lineal succession of our monarchs, and to reduce us to something like the barbarism of Russia, where they have not yet perfected themselves in the A B C of legitimacy; a regular indefeasible succession of tyrants; although they claim the head of the table of the holy alliance—where there is hardly one instance of the lineal heir succeeding to the throne without regicide and parricide, (which the case implies,) from the time when Muscovy first became a European Power—from the time of Peter Alexiovitch, (or Alexiovitch, as I was taught in my youth to call him,) who was the slayer of his son, and who transmitted his power to Catharine, the Livonian peasant girl, first his strumpet, then his chamberlain's, then an Empress; whom I have heard more than once confounded with her namesake Catharine, Princess of Anhalt, the second of that name, who, by the murder of her husband, Peter 3d, usurped the throne. With some variation of the mode, not of the measure, it is the case in this our day of Constantine Cæsar-ovitch—which means, I believe, Fitz-Cæsar—as it was with his father, Paul Petrovitch, and with his father, Peter, the son of somebody—nobody knows who—who went before Paul, not by the same instrument; no, sir, in the case of Peter, the red-hot poker—the actual cauterie—supplied the place of the new Pahlen-tie of the twisted cravat—a la Pichegru—and it was only the day after the news arrived of the deliverance of the world from the autocracy of Alexander the Deliverer—as well as I remember the date—I know that it was on the 9th of February—three days before the unavoidable departure of my colleague, that I endeavored, and, as I then thought not without some show of success, to impress the Senate with the important bearing of the recent event at Taganroek (recent as to us) upon the new, wild, dangerous, and, as I fear, fatal policy, now, for the first time, if not announced, attempted to be practised upon by this rash and feeble administration. Elizabeth and Burleigh were cautious and powerful. The Stuarts and the Buckinghams profligate, feeble, and rash. It was then that I forewarned the Senate that the red-hot poker of some Orloff the Balafre, or Orloff, the other favorite—(it was a regular household appointment of Catharine la Grande—somewhat irregularly filled occasionally—a la Cossaque.) It was on that day that I suggested to the Senate that the poker or the bowstring of a Zuboff, or the something else of somebody else—some other Russian in off—the instrument and the mute nearest at hand in the Capraan styes of tyranny and lust—was ready to despatch this new successor of the Tsars—of the Constantines—of the Byzantine Casars.

“But, sir, I, the common libeller of great and good men, did injustice to both these legitimates; to St. Nicholas and to Casarovitch. I thought too ill of one of them, and too well of the other. I thought that Commodus would ‘show fight.’ But, sir, let us not despair of the Russian. In spite of Montesquieu’s sneer, he ‘can feel’ for a brother, at least, even although he be not flayed alive; except now and then, under the autocracy of the knout. He has not, indeed, yet learned ‘to make revolutions with rose-water’—that is the political philosopher’s stone, which is yet in the womb of time, to be brought forth by some modern Accoucher-reformer. But he shows signs of capability that are quite encouraging. He cannot, indeed, redeem his paper, neither can the bank of Kentucky redeem its paper; but the red-hot poker is replaced by a box of sweetmeats—the bowstring by a medal hung around the neck—the badge, not of death, but of idiocy and cowardice. Commodus is brave nowhere but in the arena, with kittens, and puppy dogs, and women, for his antagonists; a veritable master Thomas Nero—see Hogarth’s progress of cruelty. A Ukase, backed by a hobby-horse, or a medal, and a box of sweetmeats; goody goodies, as the overgrown children say, is the full consideration paid, had, and received, for the surrender of the autocratical crown of the largest empire in the world, and some say the most powerful—of the proud eminence of the umpire of Europe. How vastly amiable and sentimental! A Ukase now does what was formerly done with a red-hot poker, or a bowstring; a Ukase, with a most affectionate fraternal letter, a box of sweetmeats, a hobby-horse, or a medal—as we, in our barbarous, slave-holding country, do sometimes hang a quarter of a dollar round a child’s neck to keep it in good humor—all cooled, however, with the blood of a few real adherents to legitimacy—in the persons of the guards of the Empire, faithful among the faithless—to make the charm firm and good. Would the gentleman from North Carolina reduce us to worse than this Russian barbarism?”

This vulgar ribaldry was spoken by this man in open Senate; the European ministers, the Russian minister, were or might have been present. The speech, such as I have read it, was published in the newspapers, and was doubtless, as a part of the political transactions of the United States, transmitted to the Emperor of Russia, by his minister then in this country. After this, who could have selected this man as an accomplished statesman, to represent this American Government at the Russian court, with any hope or intention that he should, by his diplomatic services, sustain the dignity, advance the character, or subserve the interests of this nation?

Permit me to offer one other reason why this man could not have been appointed for any national purpose. The peculiarities of his mind render him incapable of any public diplomatic service. The mind, like the fountain, is known by its effusions. Let me read from one of his speeches on Executive powers, as published by him.—[Gales and Seaton’s Register, vol. 2, p. 390.]

“Having thus, sir, disburdened myself of some of the feelings that have been excited by the gallant and fearless bearing of the gentleman from North Carolina, allow me to go on and question some of his positions.

“One of them is the durability of the constitution. With him and with father Paul (of the constitution of Venice) I say “esto perpetua.” but I do not believe it will be perpetual. I am speaking now of what Burke would call high matter. I am not speaking to the groundlings, to the tyros and junior apprentices; but to the grey-headed men of this nation, one of whom, I bless God for it, I see is now stepping forward, as he stepped forward in 1799, to save the republic. I speak of William B. Giles. I speak to grey heads; heads grown grey, not in the ‘receipt of custom’ at the treasury, of the people’s money; not to heads grown grey in iniquity and intrigue; not to heads grown grey in pacing Pennsylvania avenue; not grown grey in wearing out their shoes at levees; not to heads grown grey (to use the words of the immortal Miss Edgeworth, the glory and the champion of her lovely sex and wretched country) in ploughing the four acres. Am I understood? There is a little court, sir, of the “Castle” of Dublin, called the four acres; and there, backwards and forwards, do the miserable attendants and satellites of power walk, each waiting his turn to receive the light of the great man’s countenance; hoping the sunshine; dreading the cloudy brow. Spenser has well described the sweets of this life, and technically it is called ploughing the four acres. Now, when a certain character, in one of her incomparable novels, Sir Ulic—I have forgotten his name, but he was a McSycophant courtier, placeman, pensioner, and parasite—upbraided that kind, good-hearted, wrong-headed old man, King Corny, with his wretched system of ploughing, the King of the Black Islands (“every inch a king”) replied, that there was one system of ploughing worse even than his; and that was ploughing the four acres. This was a settler to the McSycophant.”

Was a mind like this, fitted, and provided, and regulated for the labors of the statesman and great diplomatic minister? Sir, when this gentleman was at the zenith of his intellect, and in his most lucid years, Mr. Jefferson had adjudged him unqualified for such services as this appointment, had it been made for public purposes, called on him to perform.

Sir, if not for the public service, then he must have been appointed to preserve the machinations of the Secretary of State, and the administration carried on by him under the Presidential name, from the hostility of this ancient adversary of all former administrations. To illustrate and confirm this important and deeply interesting fact, permit me to give a very brief sketch of the political life of this singular man.

At the commencement of Washington’s administration, he was a schoolboy. To prove this fact, and also to lay open the very source and fountain of his bitter hostility to the next President, I will read a part of one of his speeches from Gales and Seaton’s Register, vol. 2, p. 399—

“Now, sir, John Quincy Adams coming into power under these inauspicious circumstances, and with these suspicious allies and connexions, has determined to become the apostle of liberty, of universal liberty, as his father was, about the time of the formation of the constitution, known to be the apostle of monarchy. It is no secret—I was in New York when he first took his seat as Vice President. I recollect—for I was a schoolboy at the time, attending the lobby of Congress, when I ought to have been at school—I remember the manner in which my brother was spurned by the coachman of the then Vice President, for coming too near the arms blazoned on the scutcheon of the vice regal carriage. Perhaps I may have some of this old animosity rankling in my heart, coming from a race who are known never to forsake a friend or forgive a foe."

From this, the waters of bitterness have flown in a stream, so abundantly on the second and fifth Presidents of the United States. To overthrow the first of these, this man joined himself to his great political rival.

He grew into hostility with Jefferson in a very few years. For he has ever been a star without beams, except of a malign and blighting influence. Suffer me to illustrate this truth by reading from his speeches:

"FEBRUARY 28th, 1806.—Mr. Clarke, of Virginia, moved to postpone until the 3d of March, Mr. Randolph's resolution to amend the constitution of the United States, so that all the United States' judges should be removed by the President, on the joint resolution of both Houses of Congress. In reply to a remark made by Mr. Conrad, Mr. Randolph said, 'He (Mr. Conrad) belonged to a class of men which I highly respect, for the plain reason that I belong to it myself. He says the time is approaching when every man engaged in agricultural pursuits must be anxious to go home; and, therefore, he does not wish at present to act on the resolution I have laid on your table. True! but when men, be they agricultural, mechanical, or of any other profession, undertake any business, it is their duty to go through with it at every hazard. If the situation of affairs warranted it, I should be willing to adjourn for two or three months. But I never can agree to adjourn in the present perilous state of affairs, and leave the country to a blind and fortuitous destiny. I must first see something like land, some foothold, something like certainty, instead of a political chaos, without form or body. Before I consent to go home, I must see something like a safe and honorable issue to our differences with foreign Powers, and I must see, I hope, another thing—something like an attempt to bring the constitution of this people back to the principles on which this administration came into power.'"

On Spanish affairs—

"APRIL 5, 1806.—Mr. Randolph moved to amend the secret journal, by inserting in it the message of the President of the 6th of December. In the course of his speech he said, 'I found, from a conversation with what has been considered the head of the first Executive Department under the Government, that France was the great obstacle to the compromise of Spanish differences; that France would not permit Spain to come to any accommodation with us, because France wanted money, and that we must give her money. From the moment I heard that declaration, all the objections I originally had to the procedure were aggravated to the highest possible degree. I considered it a base prostration of the national character, to excite one nation by money to bully another nation out of its property; and from that moment, and to the last moment of my life, my confidence in the principles of the man entertaining those sentiments died, never to live again.'"

Whence this hostility? Had he become a federalist, and set himself to rebuilding the fabric which, as we are told, he had overthrown? Not so; for rebuilding he had no genius, no taste. The cause of his opposition was well known in those days; nor can any one doubt that a knowledge of it has come down to the present Secretary of State.

When Mr. Madison came into the Presidency, Mr. Randolph, if not with him, was not against him. His love of change, or of opposition, or some private political grief, did, in 1811-'12, bring out this statesman of Roanoke in bitter hostility to this third President. The last war was the great distinguishing characteristic of Mr. Madison's administration. On the 20th of November, 1811, the Committee of Foreign Relations reported on that subject, and recommended to the consideration of Congress six resolutions. The first was to fill up the ranks of the then existing army. The second recommended the raising of ten thousand additional troops. By the third, the President might receive fifty thousand volunteers. The fourth gave power to the President to call out the militia. Ships of war were to be put in service by the fifth; and the sixth authorized private vessels to arm in their own defence. When I say Mr. Randolph opposed these resolutions, I do it merely to show his hostility to the administration of Mr. Madison. I will read from Niles's Register, vol. 1, p. 318, a small part of one of his speeches on this occasion, to show not only this hostility, but also to illustrate the contempt which he has ever felt for military men and measures:

"No sooner was the report laid on the table, than the vultures were flocking round their prey, the carcass of a great military establishment—men of tainted reputation, of broken fortune (if they ever had any) and of battered constitutions, 'choice spirits, tired of the dull pursuits of civil life,' were seeking after agencies and commissions; willing to dose in gross stupidity over the public fire, to light the public candle at both ends. 'Honorable men undoubtedly there were, ready to serve their country; but what man of spirit or self-respect would accept a commission in the present army?'"

Sir, let me not be misunderstood. I am stating historic facts; Mr. Randolph's hostility to the then administration, not my own opinion of that war, or of his opposition to it. Had I been here at that time, I might have joined in that opposition; for the representatives from Rhode Island both opposed these resolutions; nor do I recollect that the people of that State ever censured them for that opposition. We might go through the whole congressional record, and we should find Mr. Randolph, at all subsequent times, equally hostile to the administration of Mr. Madison.

When Mr. Monroe came into the Presidency, Mr. Randolph was his advocate and supporter. In the last year (1824-'25) of his administration, he had changed fronts. For at that time it was one of his common sayings, "Mr. Monroe came into power by universal consent; and he would go out with equal unanimity." I will read from Gales and Seaton's Register, vol. 2, p. 405, what he said in the Senate (1826) concerning this venerated patriot statesman: "We (said he) altered the constitution to guard against that scoundrel—I will not read the name of the man; though he may have sinned, yet has he also immeasurably suffered—though not greater than him who, after the event, formed the union of honest men of all parties." Who, sir, was the man said to have united the honest men of all parties? James Monroe. Such a coalition might be sure of John Randolph for an adversary.

Was Mr. Van Buren ignorant of all these traits in the character of this man? He knew them well. He knew more; he was fully aware that no person on earth could be more hostile to military men than this same Mr. John Randolph. In confirmation of this, I will read an extract from one of his speeches:

"I own a natural jealousy of military men—it grows out of love of country—it is strengthened and kept alive by the multitude of examples in history, ancient and modern, of the fall of empires and the revolution of States; the misery and wretchedness brought upon the human race by the ambition and pride of military men." Vide speech against Gen. Wilkinson.

"I am willing to give to every man a just and reasonable reward for his public services, both in pay and gratitude; but the military character is so rarely satisfied with any thing less than direct worship, that I am of opinion—I always was of the opinion, we could not be too watchful of the aspiring ambition of a military commander." Same speech.

No man in the nation was more adverse to General

Jackson's election to the Presidency than Mr. Randolph was in 1822. In that year, he said, in his letter to the people of Charlotte—"The election of General Jackson to the Presidency is not to be dreaded, as it can in no event possibly occur: the people of the United States have not yet become so corrupted as to choose a man of military talents to govern the national councils, in opposition to the splendid talents of Mr. Crawford, or instead of any other good man in the country." See letter to the people of Charlotte, 1822.

The advancement of Mr. Adams to the last Presidency awakened all his animosity against that gentleman and his venerated father. He therefore attached himself to the party of General Jackson, and especially to that gentleman; not from esteem, respect, or friendship—not from his qualities as a man, a hero, or a statesman—but as the only instrument by which he could exclude Mr. Adams from a second Presidential term.

"Party, like calamity, brings men into company with strange bedfellows." Mr. Randolph soon found himself unpleasantly lodged; and before the middle of February, 1829, he said emphatically, "I do not attend the inauguration; mark that, sir!" He left the city before that event; but not until, as rumor, the untiring herald of distinguished personages, announced that he had delivered his ominous prediction. What was it? "Never, sir, never will the American purple again fall on the shoulders of a gentleman."

I do not pretend to say that the Secretary regarded this prediction as literally excluding him from the succession; but could he quietly manage his "State affairs" while such a man was at Roanoke, or in Virginia, or even in the United States? Sooner, sir, would the fox creep into the farm yard in the daytime, or curl himself down to sleep in his lair while he snuffed the huntsman, or heard the hounds in the southwest breeze of the morning. Did he not quiver at the mere name of this Warwick, this king-killer, and king-maker; this John Randolph, who had set up Presidents, as boys set up nine-pins, to knock them down again? Such a man, the Secretary knew, could not be, for he never had been, quiet under any administration. He had not been satisfied with the administration of Jefferson, of Madison, of Monroe; could he be satisfied with this—God only knows whose administration it is.

Sir, the Secretary has waylaid, entrapped, caught, exported, exiled, and sent this man to plough the four acres, at a distance of four thousand miles from his own patrimonial fields and trees. The great object of Mr. Van Buren has been to get him out of his way—to send him abroad. As a minister, he knew he could do nothing—he expected—he intended he should do nothing—deserve nothing—receive nothing, but the ridicule of all other nations, the pity of his own, and the contempt of the Secretary himself and his partisans.

This heartless politician has, to render this tremendous adversary powerless at home, lured him from his independence, the boast and glory of his manhood, to an old age of foreign surveillance; to come home soiled and spattered to the very eyes in treasury dirt; to shrink into retirement and insignificance; and be like Piso, returned from the inglorious administration of his Macedonian province. Shall we, sir, in aid of these schemes of the Secretary, and to put him in a condition of quiet machination against the laws, the constitution, and the great interests of this nation, appropriate this money, and thereby legalize and sustain this measure? I trust in God we shall not. Pay the man, if you please—for going out, for coming home—send out a ship of war for him; it will add, perhaps, less than thirty thousand dollars to the expenditure. Let him have his nine thousand dollars outfit—the President, it has been said, advanced it to him from his private purse—restore it to him; do not suffer ourselves to be in debt to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It is all a bauble, a mere child's whistle; and the people will and must pay dearly for this toy of their Secretary. But let us be rid of it, and of this "State mission," of its memory; if possible, of its deep and mortifying disgrace.

If this course be taken, our relations with Russia may be redeemed, restored, and placed upon a safe and honorable footing. If no one else will do it, I will move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the sole purpose of moving an appropriation of nine thousand dollars for an outfit, and nine thousand dollars for a first year's salary, to enable the President to send out to Russia an efficient mission, and one in all respects different from this of the Secretary. For never, sir, since the revolution, has there been a time when the interests of the United States more urgently required a fair, honorable, and dignified representation in the courts of Europe.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 4.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, asked and obtained leave to lay on the table an amendment to the bill yesterday reported by the Committee on Manufactures, to repeal a part of the act to reduce the duty on salt.

If adopted, the bill will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c. That all acts and clauses of acts imposing a duty on salt, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

DUTY ON SALT.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill yesterday reported by the Committee on Manufactures, to increase the present duty on salt imported; and the question being on the rejection of the bill—

Mr. MAXWELL, of Virginia, said, that having presented the memorial of the salt manufacturers of Virginia, out of which the bill had arisen, it would, therefore, not be considered unbecoming in him to detain the House a few moments with some remarks in relation to the subject now under consideration. It was not expected by me, said he, at the time that the memorial was presented, that any legislation would arise out of it, further than that many useful facts would be presented thereby to the Committee on Manufactures, which, united with their knowledge in relation to this subject, would enable them to present to this House, and this nation, many facts which it is important should be known, in relation to the rise, progress, and present situation of the salt manufacturer of the United States. Nor is it my wish now, said Mr. M., that the duty upon salt shall be either augmented or diminished during the present session, or that any disposition of the bill shall be made, other than that it be laid upon the table, and printed, together with the report of the committee. I have looked, said Mr. M., into that report, and am prepared to say that it contains useful information in relation to the manufacture of the indispensable article of salt—and which it appears to me that those who think that the duty should be entirely repealed, ought to be in possession. I can see no well founded objection to laying the bill on the table, and printing the report. I trust that the bill will not be rejected. It will certainly not be contended that it is best in future to legislate in the dark upon a matter of so much interest to the nation. We have had, said Mr. M., a bill laid upon our tables from a committee of the Senate, to repeal the duty on salt entirely; and one from the Committee on Manufactures of the House of Representatives, to place the duty at fifteen cents per bushel: this furnishes evidence that each member ought to examine the subject deliberately, before he acts upon a matter of so much importance. Some gentlemen seem not to be disposed to search for information upon this subject, or into the propriety or the impropriety of any duty, for the protection of the domestic manufacturer of salt, but denounce all duty, by crying aloud that it is a war tax. This only goes to prove that the course which I now advocate, should be adopted; that such gentlemen may obtain some information in relation to that matter, for they most certainly have not taken the trouble to examine into the history of the salt duty of the United States. The duty upon salt did not take its rise during the last war, but is coeval with the legislation of this Government. In 1789, a duty of six cents on each bushel was laid on foreign salt; this duty being considered insufficient to protect the domestic manufacturer, in 1790 the duty was augmented to twelve cents on each bushel; in 1797, the duty was augmented to twenty cents upon the bushel of foreign salt, and has continued uniformly from the year 1790 until the beginning of the last month, excepting the space of seven years, during which time no duty was collected upon foreign salt. I would suggest to those that are disposed to give no encouragement to the domestic manufacturer, for the benefit of the people, to look into the price which the people had to pay for salt during the period in which no duty was collected; I think that they will find, from the accounts of the sales actually made, that people paid a higher price for their salt during these seven years, than during any other seven years since the commencement of the Government until the present time. In the year 1813, an act passed fixing the duty upon foreign salt at twenty cents, which expired under a limitation contained within itself. The tax, laid by this act, may be called a war tax. But, in 1816, an act passed continuing the duty at twenty cents. Was the duty laid upon foreign salt in 1789, 1790, 1797, and 1816, war taxes? It may be said that the tax of 1816 was to enable the Government to discharge the public debt that accrued in consequence of the war; that, in addition to the encouragement of the domestic manufacturer of the article, I believe, was the cause of the act of 1816. Those who suppose that the duty upon salt is a war tax, will certainly agree to vote against the motion to reject the bill, with a view that it may be laid upon the table, and the report printed, in order that they may obtain more correct information in relation to the salt duty. All I wish, said Mr. M., is information upon this interesting and very exciting subject. The amount of capital vested in the manufacture of salt in the United States, is not less than seven millions of dollars, which, together with the difficulty experienced by the people of this country during the last war, in obtaining the article, ought to admonish every one of the importance of having full information upon the subject, and of the propriety of legislating cautiously, lest the manufacturer of American salt be injured, and, in case of war with a foreign nation, the same consequences result that have heretofore taken place.

Duty on Salt.

Some gentlemen think information upon this subject is unnecessary, because all encouragement to American industry and domestic manufactures is inexpedient and unconstitutional. The early history of the legislation of this country shows a different view of this matter. The opinion of General Washington in 1796—the opinion of Mr. Jefferson in 1808 and 1816—the opinion of Mr. Madison in 1809 and 1815—the opinion of Mr. Monroe in 1821 and 1823—and the opinion of the present Chief Magistrate, in his last message, show that to encourage the domestic manufacturer of such articles as are essential to the independence and prosperity of the country, and especially those which are indispensable in time of war, is both expedient and constitutional. Can any be more essential in peace or war than salt? Is it not as necessary that the soldier should have his salt and rations, as a coat and musket? I have no disposition to go into an argument upon the question whether the duty upon salt should be augmented or diminished. I have only to say, that I believe a reasonable degree of encouragement should be given the manufacturers of salt by the Government, to enable them to stand against foreign competition, to render this country independent of foreign nations, and to ascertain what measure of duty should be laid in subsequent legislation upon this subject. I consider it important to have the facts which I know, from a view of the report, it contains. I cannot subscribe to the doctrine, that because an article is indispensable, and enters into the daily consumption of every family, that for this reason the Government should give no encouragement to the American enterprise that attempts to increase the article at home. It appears to me, the more essentially necessary an article is to the people, the more care should be taken that a supply of such article should always be had without being dependent upon foreign nations. Let us, said Mr. M., have the report of the committee printed, that we may have information upon this matter, and that any future legislation upon it may be done advisedly.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, without renewing his opposition of yesterday to the bill, (which opposition produced the question of rejection,) and with a view to terminate a debate which must be useless, and with an understanding that the subject should not be called up again at the present session of Congress, moved to lay the bill and report upon the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. McCREERY, of Pennsylvania, who briefly stated the reasons why, though he had been uniformly opposed to the reduction of the duty upon salt, he should vote to get rid of the bill, either by rejection or by laying it upon the table. He believed that the discussion of the bill would be a useless consumption of time, because there was no probability of arriving at a decision in its favor at the present session. There remained now but about twenty-three business days of the session, and a vast number of bills (some of them important) yet remain to be acted upon.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, objected to any course, with regard to this bill, which should leave it open as a subject for consideration. The House had been assured by the gentleman from Virginia, as it had been yesterday assured by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, that he did not wish any legislation upon the subject at the present session. Why, then, Mr. T. asked, was the subject introduced here at all? For what purpose? It is certainly not to waste the small remnant of time yet hanging on our hands, said he, when all sides of the House seem disposed to husband it. It must be to give a moral effect to the proposition in the bill; to have the report printed and spread over the country—and for what purpose? Why, sir, to force upon us, if they can, an increase of this duty. He regretted to hear of the motion to lay the bill on the table; because an agreement to a proposition of that sort would give something of character to the general proposition of the Committee on Manufactures. In the sincerity of his heart, he said, he wished this proposition to pass off without being the cause of an increase of the present excitement in the Southern country. If gentlemen are disposed to force the measure upon us, however, said Mr. T., let them do it at once—bring up the question, and decide upon it. If the Committee on Manufactures do not think proper to withdraw the proposition, let the bill go on without delay to a final decision. I object to the second reading.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said, if he believed that the present discussion of this bill would lead to a further reduction of the duty on salt, he should not object to it; but, believing that the consideration of the bill now would lead to nothing but a further consumption of time in debate, he moved the previous question.

The motion for the previous question was not seconded by a majority, the yeas being 78, the nays 90.

Mr. STERIGER, of Pennsylvania, then moved to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was declared not to be now in order, the question of rejection having been renewed by Mr. THOMPSON's objection to the second reading of the bill.

Duty on Salt.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, said he hoped the bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures for repealing the act passed at the last session, reducing the duty on salt, would neither be laid on the table, nor favorably entertained by the House in any shape whatever. The great excitement of the South, and particularly of that State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, was well known to Congress and to the American people. The popular indignation in South Carolina against what he and the people of that State considered the iniquitous and unconstitutional legislation of Congress, (especially in relation to the tariff,) was almost universal; and it was with difficulty they had been restrained from adopting measures for their own relief, and for the redress of their own wrongs—much pains had to be taken to defeat the call of a convention. To what results such measures would have led, he would not now inquire, even if it were possible to ascertain them; they were at least alarming, and the contemplation of them disagreeable. And, after what had been done here at the close of the last session, he had thought the call of a convention, or any action whatever, on the part of South Carolina, unnecessary, premature, and hazardous. He had, therefore, discouraged every thing of this kind. He had opposed the call of a convention, and he believed his colleagues would bear him out in the assertion, that he had contributed very much to the defeat of that measure. He claimed no merit for this; and believed he would not subject himself to any imputation of vanity in making the declaration, because, if the present proposition succeeded, he should regret the advice he had given to his constituents during the last summer and fall. He had told the people at home that things here were rapidly changing for the better. Among many other evidences of this change, he had adverted, both verbally, and in the newspapers, to the reduction of the duty on salt. But if, instead of advancing still further to correct the evils of which the South complains—if, instead of going on with the reformation of the tariff system, we recede, and undo the little we have already done, he should be ashamed to meet his constituents. He should, with pain and contrition, have to acknowledge that, with the best intentions, he had given them, perhaps, wrong advice; that he had been deceived himself; and had, innocently, held out to them delusive hopes and fallacious expectations. He, however, was not disposed to argue the matter at this time. He took it for granted the House would reject this bill by an overwhelming majority. He, therefore, hoped argument against it was unnecessary. Besides, his feelings, in relation to this subject, were too strong to authorize him to run the hazard (at this moment) of saying what might be regarded as indecorous. Candor, however, required, and an imperative duty to his constituents, to himself, and to the House, enjoined it upon him to declare that, if this proposition should succeed, the time for argument will have passed away.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut, said that the only wish of the Committee on Manufactures, he believed, was that this subject should be placed in a situation to be examined with a view to future consideration. To do this, the committee had taken no extraordinary course, but had presented a report stating their views of it, accompanied by a bill. If, without examining either the memorial of the manufacturers, or the report of the committee, the House should decide to reject the bill, it would certainly be an unusual proceeding, to say the least of it. He hoped, therefore, that the motion for rejection would not prevail. With a view to enable the House to look into this memorial from a most respectable class of men largely engaged in the manufacture of salt, and to peruse the report, he moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to this day two weeks.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, made a few observations against the postponement. Whatever was the disposition of this House, he thought it better that it should do at once what it is disposed to do ultimately.

Mr. MALLARY rose to correct an impression on the mind of the gentleman from Georgia, altogether erroneous. There was no intention, on the part of the Committee on Manufactures, to repeal the law of last session. He entered into a statement of the views of that committee, to show the motives that had actuated them in reporting the present bill, and left it to the House to take such order on the subject as they might deem proper.

Mr. NUCKOLLS said: It will be recollected, by those members of the House with whom I have had the honor of serving on this floor for the last four years, that I have rarely trespassed on their patience, nor would I do so now, but for the strong feeling and deep interest which my constituents, in common with myself, have on this subject. And here, sir, permit me to remark, that I differ, widely differ, from my political friends of the South, in the course they pursue in relation to this bill. They seem inclined to avoid discussion, by rejecting this bill on its second reading—before it has undergone that consideration its importance demands, and even before the accompanying report has been printed for our examination. Sir, this is too nearly allied to the practice which has sprung up in this hall within the last three years, to meet my approbation. What is that practice? Why, sir, to refuse even the courtesy of a consideration to many of the most interesting topics introduced here by the representatives of the people. I had been taught (before my acquaintance with it) that this was a deliberative assembly, organized by the people, to hear, consider, discuss, and decide upon all questions affecting their interests, or involving their liberty. But, sir, is this true? Are we thus mindful of the rights of the people, and of the respect due to those whom they send here? It is a notorious fact, that there is an organized majority in this House, whose settled practice it is to scout from these walls every proposition looking to a modification of the restrictive system; thereby virtually refusing, to a large portion of the American people, the constitutional right of exposing to public view the grievances under which they labor.

Sir, I have uniformly opposed every thing of this sort as being proscriptive in principle, disrespectful to the American people, and unbecoming the dignity of this House. I am not afraid to submit any question to their candid and impartial judgment, when it shall have been fully and deliberately set before them by the debates in this assembly, and am therefore none the less opposed to refusing this bill a second reading, because I am against its principles and its objects. I am for giving every question a fair hearing, whether for or against me.

Mr. Speaker, the part I have borne among the people I represent, and those of the entire State from which I come, has been similar to that of my colleague, [Mr. BLAIR,] who last addressed us. Like him, I sought to allay the fervid excitement which prevailed on my return among them. They had seen and felt, with the sensibility of enlightened freemen, that their rights were invaded by unjust taxation, and themselves insulted by your refusal to hear their representatives. Sir, I felt in my own bosom that there was ample provocation for all this. But, like themselves, I was devoted to the Union, and its harmonious preservation. I exhorted to moderation, forbearance, and a reliance on the justice of their Northern and Western brethren. I alluded to the modifications of the tariff at the close of the last session, as affording evidence of that justice. But, sir, respect for their intelligence, and my own self-respect, would not permit me to disguise the fact, that all those modifications, except that of the salt duty, were but adding to the effective strength and fixed character of the system of which they complain.

James Monroe.—Susan Decatur.

ed. Well, sir, what was the result? Our people are even now looking, with anxious expectation, to this body for the realization of these predictions. When, therefore, the bill introduced yesterday by the honorable chairman [Mr. MALLARY] was presented, I dissented from the views of my honorable colleagues, [Mr. BLAIN and Mr. TUCKER,] and others, in this, that, whilst they desired to suppress the discussion of this question, with the view of avoiding the excitement growing out of it, I am decidedly in favor of playing out the game—of meeting the question fully and boldly—of discussing it calmly and deliberately, and ascertaining whether my assurances to my constituents are to be realized. I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. THOMPSON] will withdraw his opposition to the second reading of this bill. Let the report and bill be referred and printed, and, after time for examination, let them come up for discussion. Sir, I will vote at any time for taking up and deciding the fate of this matter. The people of South Carolina are in great doubt and perplexity on this subject; they have been assured that relief from their unconstitutional burdens would be progressive; but if, on the contrary, our course is to be retroactive, by increasing instead of diminishing their grievances, we desire to know it, in order that we may set about relieving ourselves from them, "peaceably, if we can; forcibly, if we must."

The excessive duty heretofore levied on foreign salt constitutes, in the domestic manufacturer, the most odious and unjustifiable monopoly we have ever been called on to endure. It is an article necessary to the consumption of every living creature—the poor as well as the rich are compelled to have it or perish; and yet a few wealthy manufacturers of it are protected in making it, by a duty of two or three hundred per cent., collected chiefly from the poor. The average cost of imported salt does not exceed nine cents the bushel, and I am informed by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, coming from a salt district, that it can be made there for eight cents. On what principle, then, is it, that we are to pay a tax so disproportioned to the original cost?

Sir, I have learned, from high authority, that the manufacturers of salt, where it does not cost more than eight to ten cents to make it, have been known to sell it, at their own doors, at from seventy-five to one hundred cents per bushel; and that, as they proceeded into the surrounding country, the price was increased to from one dollar and twenty-five cents to one dollar and fifty cents, until their article began to meet the competition of foreign salt; and then they would reduce the price in proportion to the competition, until they came down to sixty cents, and this, too, after carrying it more than one hundred miles. But it is not my intention now to go into the general question; this will be more appropriate when the subject shall come up, after the bill and report shall have been referred and printed, and until then I dismiss it.

Mr. Speaker, an honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DOBBS], in opposing the other day the second reading of a bill introduced by my friend and colleague, [Mr. DAVIS], to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act, said he regarded the bill as being equally important, as a proposition to repeal the Union, and therefore he could not consent to its second reading. Sir, I will not say that the bill presented yesterday by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MALLARY] is equivalent to a proposition to repeal the Union—but when we consider the strong excitement and deep sense of unconstitutional oppression which pervades the entire South, and take in connexion with it the effort, on the part of the gentleman, [Mr. MALLARY,] to extend that oppression, it is something very like it. But, differing from the gentleman from Virginia as to the proper course on such trying occasions, I desire to meet and to look it in the face. Sir, the people speak through representatives on this floor, and nothing is too sacred for their examination. I therefore entreat the House, and particularly the Southern portion, to withdraw all objection to the second reading, and to abstain from using this illiberal weapon of defence, by which they have so often been unkindly scourged. We shall then see whether, instead of the duty going down to ten cents, as provided by the law of 1830, it be fixed at fifteen, and thereby an earnest given that we are to expect still further imposition. Should such be the case, I can but fear that, in the future history of this country, and in its influence on the harmony and perpetuity of our Union, the sum of five cents on salt may be equally important with three cents on tea.

When Mr. NUCKOLLS concluded, the SPEAKER announced that the allotted hour had expired.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, moved to suspend the rule, that the consideration of the subject might go on; but the House refused to suspend the rule.

JAMES MONROE.

The bill for the relief of James Monroe was read the third time; and the question being, "Shall it pass?"

Mr. CHILTON called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered by the House. Being taken, they stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Arnold, Bailey, J. S. Barbour, Bartley, Bates, Beekman, Bell, Brown, Buchanan, Butman, Cambreleng, Campbell, Childs, Coleman, Condict, Conner, Coulter, Crockett, Creighton, Crocheron, Crowninshield, Davenport, John Davis, Deberry, Denny, De Witt, Dickinson, Doddridge, Duncan, Dwight, Eager, Earl, George Evans, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Finch, Forward, Gilmore, Gordon, Green, Grennell, Gurley, Hawkins, Hemphill, Hinds, Hodges, Holland, Howard, Hughes, Ingersoll, Thomas Irwin, William W. Irvin, Jarvis, Johns, Richard M. Johnson, Kenyon, Lent, Mallary, Martindale, Martin, McCreery, McDuffie, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Monell, Norton, Nuckolls, Overton, Pearce, Pettis, Ramsey, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Rose, Russel, Scott, William B. Shepard, Shields, Semmes, Sill, Ambrose Spencer, Richard Spencer, Sterigere, Stephens, Strong, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Test, Tracy, Varnum, Verplanck, Washington, Wayne, Campbell P. White, E. D. White, Wilde, Wilson, Young.—104.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Armstrong, Noyes Barber, Barnwell, Barringer, James Blair, John Blair, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Bouldin, Brodhead, Cahoon, Chandler, Chilton, Claiborne, Clay, Clark, Coke, Cooper, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Warren R. Davis, Desha, Draper, Drayton, Ellsworth, Findlay, Foster, Fry, Gaither, Hall, Halsey, Harvey, Haynes, Hoffman, Hubbard, Hunt, Huntington, Ihrie, Isacks, Cave Johnson, Kincaid, Perkins King, Adam King, Lamar, Lea, Leavitt, Lecompte, Letcher, Lewis, Loyall, Lumpkin, Lyon, Magee, Marr, Thomas Maxwell, Lewis Maxwell, McCoy, McIntire, Muhlenberg, Pierson, Polk, Potter, Roane, Sanford, Aug. H. Sheperd, William L. Storrs, Swann, Swift, Wiley Thompson, John Thomson, Trezvant, Tucker, Vance, Vinton, Weeks, Whittlesey, Williams, Yance.—88.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, the title of the bill was amended to read as follows: "A bill to provide for the final settlement and adjustment of the various claims preferred by James Monroe against the United States."

The bill from the Senate for the relief of William Smith, administrator of John Taylor, deceased, was read the third time, and passed.

SUSAN DECATUR.

Mr. McDUFFIE submitted a motion that the House do now take up the bill to compensate Susan Decatur, widow and legal representative of Captain Stephen Decatur, deceased, et al.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that this was as good a time as any other to try the question whether the House meant to consider the bill at the present session, and he therefore called for the yeas and nays on the question of consideration. They were ordered by the House, and, being taken, stood—yeas 85, nays 100.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

Mr. HUNT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was recommitted the bill to authorize the State of Missouri to sell the lands reserved for the use of schools, a seminary of learning, and salt springs, in that State, reported an amendatory bill; which was twice read; and the question being put on engrossing the bill for a third reading,

Mr. RICHARDSON observed, that, on hearing the bill read, he perceived that it contained a provision to which he could not consent; but the subject presenting itself suddenly, he was not prepared at this moment to suggest a remedy. The bill provided that if the proceeds of these lands should prove insufficient for the permanent maintenance and support of schools throughout the State, no part of it could ever be applied. Should this prove to be the case, said Mr. R., and the fund prove inadequate to the entire support, the whole object would be defeated, and, of course, generations would die in ignorance. This Mr. R. could not consent to; and to allow himself time to prepare an amendment to the section, he moved to postpone the bill till Monday—which was agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill explanatory of an act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line and navy and of the continental army, during the revolutionary war, approved the 30th May, 1830; which was twice read.

Mr. W. said it was of importance that the bill should be speedily passed. If, however, any gentleman had objections to its passage at this time, he was willing to consent to its postponement for a short time, to allow of an opportunity to examine its provisions. Mr. W. then explained the object of the bill, when the further consideration of it was postponed to Wednesday next.

JUDGE PECK'S TRIAL.

Mr. MAXWELL, of New York, from the Committee on Accounts, made a report on the memorial of the witnesses in the case of Judge Peck, attending here during the last session, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to pay to the witnesses who attended before the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Judge Peck, at the last session, the same compensation for their attendance and mileage, respectively, as has been allowed to the witnesses who have attended the trial of the impeachment at the present session, deducting therefrom the amount allowed to them at the last session.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE SALT DUTY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to restore the duty on imported salt—the question being on the rejection of the bill—

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose, and said that one or two of his colleagues had, in the course of the debate upon this bill, moved that the bill be laid upon the table; and having observed that the Speaker refused the motion, declaring it to be out of order, pending an objection to the second reading, he took leave to say that he respectfully apprehended that, from the recorded decisions of the House, the motion ought to be entertained by the Chair.

He, therefore, with a view of meeting this question of order, moved that the bill do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pronounced this motion not to be in order; whereupon,

Mr. SUTHERLAND appealed from this decision. In support of his course, Mr. S. observed, that he meant no disrespect to the Chair, but that he was desirous of knowing whether the decisions made upon motions last year, which were parallel with the present motion, were to be overruled by the Chair. If they were to be set aside, he was anxious that the House should have notice of the fact, and, at the opening of the next session of Congress, we might have the point stated at the back of the journals, where all matters of order are recorded. For if the subject was not disturbed in the way he suggested, and some opinion obtained from the Chair, the practice of the first session of this Congress would appear from the journals to contradict that of the second session. Mr. S. then proceeded to show that it had been decided by the Speaker, during the last year, that the motion to lie on the table took precedence of the question "Shall the bill be rejected?" and cited two or three parallel cases from the journals of the last session, which he read and commented on to show their similarity to the present case. When Mr. S. had concluded,

The SPEAKER rose, and, after admitting that the present decision of the Chair was at variance with the decisions of the last session, which had been cited, proceeded to explain to the House his reasons for the change. It was, he said, after mature reflection on the former practice, and after much consultation with those better qualified than himself to form a correct judgment on the question, that he had come to the conclusion that the former decisions were erroneous; and, being so convinced, his duty to the high and responsible trust reposed in him by the House, did not permit any fear of apparent inconsistency to prevent his following the dictates of his better judgment. The honorable SPEAKER then went into an examination and exposition of the rules of order and the nature of the questions before the House, to show why the former practice was erroneous, and the present decision compatible with the spirit of the rules, with their true application to the question, and with the reason of the case. When the SPEAKER took his seat,

Mr. SUTHERLAND again rose, and observed, a greater man than either of us on parliamentary practice [meaning, it is presumed, Mr. Hatsell,] has said, "it is much more material that there should be a rule to go by, than what that rule is;" and I think upon that ground alone the old practice might well be sustained. As to the reasons addressed to the House by the SPEAKER, with all due deference to the Chair, Mr. S. thought he could readily answer them; but as Mr. Speaker had thought proper to change his opinion on the subject, he felt no disposition to urge the appeal any further, and therefore withdrew it.

Mr. THOMPSON then said, that, in accordance with the wishes of several of his friends, he would withdraw his objection, and let the bill proceed to a second reading.

The bill was accordingly read the second time.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved that the bill do lie on the table, and the motion was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

[Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, had first voted in the negative; after all the names had been called, he observed that, as it seemed now to be the understanding that the bill should be laid on the table, not to be taken up again during the session, he would change his former vote on the question, and now vote for the motion.]

BOOKS FOR THE USE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to procure two hundred and sixteen copies of the debates of the State conventions on the adoption of the federal constitution in 1787, one copy of which to be delivered to each member; and that the Clerk be directed, also, to have preserved for each member an extra copy of the reports of Congress, at each session, and to have the same bound in a strong, cheap, ordinary binding, to embrace the present session, and to continue in future.

In support of the resolution, Mr. JOHNSON said that, when he had the honor of a seat in the other House, he had been provided with the reports of this House, and that they were of value to him. He had an opportunity to read them in the recess, and they therefore became of equal value to his constituents. They would be found of vast importance to members generally.

With regard to the other portion of his resolution, it provided for the purchase of a work of great importance to members, in the discharge of their public duties. The other House had passed a resolution, by which each member of it had been furnished with a copy of that valuable work, and he hoped that the members of this House would also be put in possession of it.

Mr. CHILTON would not consume the time of the House in debating the resolution; but would content himself with calling for the yeas and nays on its adoption.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked for a division of the question.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said the resolution was one of an obnoxious character. If the House was disposed to sanction the measure at all, it should be done by law. Resolutions of a similar character had, at the present session, been referred to the Committee on the Library, and he hoped this would take the same direction.

Mr. JOHNSON said a law was not necessary in this case—it had not been the custom or practice heretofore, and he saw no necessity for it now. The Senate had enjoyed the benefit of the work, and it was procured without the formality of a joint resolution.

After a few words from Mr. WICKLIFFE, in opposition to the resolution, it was referred to the Library Committee—yeas 75, nays 62.

SALT RESERVES IN ILLINOIS.

The bill for the sale of lands in the State of Illinois, reserved for the use of salt springs, on the Vermillion river, in that State, was read the third time, and the question put on its passage.

Mr. DRAYTON opposed the passage of the bill.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, supported it.

Mr. DUNCAN replied, at some length, to the arguments urged by Mr. DRAYTON against the right of the State to these lands; and advocated the passage of the bill, as a measure calculated to promote the interest of the United States, as much as that of the State. He said the reservation was all timbered land, and the land in the vicinity was prairie; that the sale of the timber was necessary for the improvement of the country, and would cause the sale of a much larger quantity of prairie, which was public land. He believed the land was not necessary to support the salt works; the sale of them had been asked for by the Legislature, and he knew it was a measure greatly desired by the citizens of that part of the State.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said the bill had undergone a thorough examination by the Committee on the Public Lands, and that committee was unanimous in the opinion that the bill should pass.

After some further conversation between Messrs. DRAYTON, IRVIN, of Ohio, WICKLIFFE, DUNCAN, and PETTIS, the question was put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative.

The bill for the relief of Joseph H. Webb, coming up on its passage, it was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, BATES, DRAYTON, and CRAIG; and was supported by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, WHITTLESEY, DUNCAN, and CONNER.

[The bill provided for an increase of the pension of the petitioner, on account of increasing disability from a wound he received from an Indian, while carrying the mail through the Indian country. It was opposed, on the ground that Congress had no right to pension other than those who were wounded in the military or naval service. Mr. CONNER, to show that Congress had passed a bill allowing a pension in a similar case, read the law, which granted a pension to the widow and representatives of John Heap, who was killed by mail robbers, while in the act of carrying the mail.]

The question being put on the passage of the bill, it was rejected by a vote of 50 to 72.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, presented a memorial of inhabitants of the town of Southampton, in the county of Hampshire, and State of Massachusetts, praying that the act of the last session of Congress, providing for an exchange of lands with certain Indian tribes, and for their removal and permanent settlement west of the Mississippi, may be repealed; that treaties made with the Indians, heretofore, may be inviolably observed; and that the said Indians may be protected in the enjoyment of their lands, and in all the rights secured to them by engagements entered into between the said Indians and the United States. Mr. E. observed, that he had long felt it to be the duty of the House to consider the all-important subject of this memorial. He should, himself, by way of resolution, have called the attention of the House to the subject, had no other member expressed an intention of doing so, if it had been possible, under the rules of the House, to move a resolution. But it was known to the Chair, that, for several weeks past, there had not been a moment when it was in order to move a resolution. A petition from a very respectable community in the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, had been placed in his hands. By the rules of the House, a petition cannot be debated on the day on which it is presented, but must lie on the table one day. As petitions are received only one day of the week, on Mondays, Mr. E. observed that the memorial which he presented must, under these rules, lie on the table till that day, and then come up as the unfinished business of petitions. He begged leave, therefore, in presenting this petition, to give notice that, when it should come up on Monday next, he should feel it his duty to ask the attention of the House to the very important question of protecting the Indian tribes in the possessions and rights secured to them by treaty and the laws of the United States.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY.

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, presented the petition of a number of his constituents, praying aid, from Congress for the Colonization Society, to which he intimated his own disagreement, but moved that it be printed; which was ordered.

THE SALT REPORT.

Mr. MALLARY moved that the report of the Committee on Manufactures, on the restoration of the duty on imported salt, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. CHILTON was opposed to the motion. The bill was done with for this session, by the consent of both its friends and enemies, and he was in favor of letting the report sleep with the bill. The report contained an ex parte argument on the subject, which Mr. C. did not wish to send among the people with even this indirect sanction of the House. The country was now in a state of excitement, and every member ought to be willing to allay that excitement, instead of sending forth what would tend to increase it. However untenable the argument of the report—an argument so fallacious that any schoolboy could answer it—the order to print an extra number would give to it some degree of importance. The report was presumed to be the production of an individual of the Committee on Manufactures; and if the practice were to prevail, it would become an easy matter for any member of the House to have his opinions sent forth with this sanction, however obnoxious they might be to the sense of the House. If gentlemen desired to distribute copies of the report, let them do it at their own expense, not at that of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the motion for printing on the table.

Mr. MALLARY requested that Mr. W. would withdraw the motion, to give him an opportunity of replying to Mr. CHILTON's remarks, but Mr. W. declined yielding to the request.

The question was then put on laying this motion on the table, and was decided, by yeas and nays, in the negative—yeas 82, nays 100.

The report was then ordered to be printed.

SURPLUS REVENUE.

The motion submitted some days since by Mr. JARVIS, to print six thousand additional copies of the report of the select committee appointed on so much of the President's message as relates to the surplus revenue of the Government, was again taken up for consideration.

Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays on the question of adopting the resolution, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. VANCE moved to lay the motion on the table.

And, on this motion, Mr. HAMMONS demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. VANCE, then, to save time and trouble, withdrew his motion to lay the resolution on the table; and the question being put on agreeing to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 78.

THE JUDICIARY REPORTS.

The House having taken up the resolution submitted some days ago by Mr. WHITE, of New York, to print three thousand additional copies of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in favor of repealing the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, together with the counter report of the minority of the committee—

Mr. BUCHANAN said it might be supposed that he felt some interest in the success of this motion, but really he felt none. The question on the repeal of the 25th section had been settled by the House—settled to Mr. B.'s entire satisfaction. This decision had gone forth to the people, and he saw no good purpose it could answer to send the two arguments of the committee lagging after it through the country. He was therefore opposed to printing any additional copies.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, was in favor of printing the extra copies. The report of the committee contained a fair exposition of the unconstitutionality of the 25th section; and as there had been no opportunity for a discussion of the subject in the House, he wished the argument of the committee to be extensively disseminated. No man, Mr. H. said, was more attached to the Union of the States than himself; but he did not consider the proposition to repeal the section as any attack on the Union; on the contrary, being satisfied that the section was itself unconstitutional, he was in favor of its repeal, and wished the argument of the committee printed for the information of the people.

Mr. CHILTON moved that the motion be laid on the table; but withdrew his motion at the request of several gentlemen.

Mr. DODDRIDGE, of Virginia, remarked, that much had been said, and many allusions had been made to an expression of his on a former occasion, that he considered the proposition to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act as equivalent to a motion to dissolve the Union. Such, said Mr. D., is my opinion. It is my opinion, and I hope no angry feelings will be produced by my avowing it. Although I entertain this opinion, I was willing to discuss the bill, and it was no fault of mine that it was not discussed. I did not make the motion to lay the bill on the table, which precluded debate. Mr. D. said he had been spoken to by several gentlemen to support the printing of an additional number of the report, &c.; and although the report and counter report had been very generally published in the newspapers, he was willing to order the extra number; indeed, a larger number than that proposed. The reports were important; and, in the pamphlet form, gentlemen to whom they were sent, would be more likely to preserve them for their own, and the perusal of others. He, therefore, moved to amend the motion, so as print six thousand instead of three thousand additional copies.

Mr. GORDON, of Virginia, said, the remark of his colleague, as to the character of the bill, he must consider as a direct reflection on the committee which reported it. And, as one of those who concurred in the report, he must protest against that reflection. When a committee of the House had given to a subject the calmest and maturest investigation, and a motion is made to print their report, a gentleman gets up, and, in a tone of alarm, denounces the proposition as tantamount to a motion to repeal the Union; and this, too, from a gentleman whose legal character, and whose standing in the House, gave his opinions some control over the opinions of others. To an opinion so erroneous, and a course so extraordinary,

Minister to Russia.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. G. could not submit in silence. In regard to the Union of these States, Mr. G. said he viewed it as the palladium of our hopes, and of the liberties of mankind; and he felt as strong an attachment to it as his colleague could possibly feel, although he might say less than him about it. As to the constitutionality of the 25th section of the judiciary act, has it not, Mr. G. asked, been mooted frequently? It was neither a new question, nor an alarming one. Could it be new, especially to a Virginia lawyer? Does the gentleman not know that the Virginia judiciary, with Roane at its head, had solemnly denied the constitutionality of that section? Did he not also know that many of the leading men of the State, including John Taylor, of Caroline, had contended that the section was unconstitutional? Did not Georgia, the other day, by her Legislature, deny the constitutionality of the act, and order her Executive, with all her powers, to repel its enforcement on her? Had not Pennsylvania, too, declared it unconstitutional, and resisted its execution? Why, then, this tone of alarm and terror? Why the call for the previous question, to suppress debate on the bill? Why shun its discussion? Mr. G. did not himself desire to debate it. He might not even have deemed this a proper time for disturbing the question; but he saw nothing in the proposition to be alarmed at. On the contrary, I declare to God, exclaimed Mr. G., I believe nothing would tend so much to compose the present agitation of the country, and allay the prevailing excitement, as the repeal of that portion of the judiciary act. Mr. G. alluded to the case of Cohens, by which the State of Virginia was made a party before the Supreme Court, and had employed distinguished counsel to argue the unconstitutionality of the authority claimed by the court; and was proceeding to make some further remarks, but checked himself, as he did not wish, he said, to go into the merits of the question.

Mr. DODDRIDGE observed that his colleague's remarks about the previous question, and about the suppression of debate on the bill, did not apply to him. He had not moved the previous question, or made any other motion which would preclude debate; and, as for what his colleague thought of his opinions, he did not care a tittle—not a tittle. Mr. D. said he had not been averse to debating the bill; but, as it was not debated, he was in favor of giving the greatest possible publicity to the arguments, pro and con, of the committee, and had, therefore, moved to increase the number of additional copies to six thousand.

Here the expiration of the hour put an end to the subject for this day.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The House then took up the general appropriation bill; the question being on the motion of Mr. STANBERRY, to strike from the bill the appropriation for a salary to the minister to Russia.

Mr. BURGESS continued his remarks, commenced on Thursday last, and occupied an hour and a half in their conclusion. [They are inserted in connexion with the first part of his remarks.] When he concluded,

Mr. ALEXANDER obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. CAMBRELENG, who said, I thank my friend from Virginia for his courtesy in yielding me the floor, for there is nothing so disagreeable, Mr. Speaker, as lumbering on these little animosities. I desire no lamp to barb my arrows, or polish my weapons—no nightly errands of the imagination to the commonplace reservoir of antiquity—no pleader's brief to prompt me in replying to the gentleman from Rhode Island. I congratulate him, sir, that, after three weeks' hard study—two days' severe and laborious rhetoric, and with the fatiguing aid of copious notes, he has, at last, discharged his fire. I congratulate the House that its alarming anticipations are over. More than three weeks since, sir, the belligerent heralds abroad triumphantly announced to the world that the holy cause of calumny would be vindicated here, and that a dreadful vengeance awaited all who had dared to rebuke it. We were threatened, sir, with volcanic thunders—with red lightnings and streams of liquid fire. We have witnessed this long anticipated eruption, sir—the danger is past—the planets still roll on calmly in their eternal circles; even the erratic stranger on our horizon pursues unmoved his fiery course—heaven be praised, sir, we are still alive, and breathe.

As the storm is over, sir, allow me, in replying to the gentleman from Rhode Island, to notice briefly two points of a graver character. It is the unquestionable right and duty of every member of this House to scrutinize most severely every appropriation, and to examine most thoroughly every principle and measure of this administration. But, sir, gentlemen must pardon me for widely discriminating between a dignified contest for principle, and a mere personal war against individuals occupying distinguished public stations. I cannot persuade myself to believe that there is any party in this House, or in this country, who would seriously desire to establish the extraordinary policy and principles involved in the motion under consideration. I cannot believe that there is any gentleman in this House, or out of it, who has a just regard for his country's honor, who would deny to any American minister abroad the privilege of temporary absence from his diplomatic station, when his health or any other sufficient cause should render it necessary. But surely, sir, no gentleman can seriously dispute the right of a minister to leave the court to which he may have been assigned, when he acts, as in the case of Mr. Randolph, under the express authority of the Executive. I may, perhaps, carry my notions of national dignity a little too far, sir; but I should contend that, with or without such authority, such a discretion was absolutely necessary. I should lament, indeed, sir, if, by adopting narrow views of public policy, we should deny to our ministers abroad a courtesy which is demanded from us by considerations of honor and humanity. I trust that, however violent may be the character of our internal wars, the wildest frenzy of party excitement will never drive us into measures so humiliating to our ministers, degrading to our diplomatic character, and so effectually calculated to lessen the dignity of our country in the eyes of the world. But, sir, I shall not waste the time of the House by gravely arguing any such questions. This is not a contest for principles of any kind. The sanguinary current of this debate manifests too clearly its aim and character. Gentlemen may shift and evade the question as they may; it is a mere personal war against the distinguished individual who happens to occupy the station in question. The war is out of place, and altogether too late. Where was all this affectation of a pious regard for the public interest—where the sleepless vigilance of the opposition, when the President nominated the gentleman from Virginia as our minister to Russia? Where was all the infuriate zeal of party in the Senate? Why was the unrelenting spirit of revenge so calm, when not a voice was heard for rejecting this nomination? Was it because the gentleman from Virginia was then here to defend himself? And is this war now commenced because the Atlantic rolls between him and his adversaries? An opposition to his nomination at that time in the Senate would have been at least more appropriate and respectable than a contemptible attack upon a minister's salary, as a mere apology for calumniating the individual, and to gratify the most pusillanimous of our passions. But the war, sir, is in perfect keeping with its origin—it is a war of revenge—all weapons are deemed honorable, and a relentless animosity subdues every impulse of generosity or magnanimity.

I regret, sir, that the gentleman from Rhode Island

H. of R.]

Minister to Russia.

should have made any allusion, in a debate of this character, to the memory of the late representative from Illinois. It was roughly obtruded upon us, sir, and I must be pardoned for noticing the subject in any manner. I little thought there was any friend of the late administration bold enough to revive our recollections of that gentleman's melancholy fate. I concur entirely with the gentleman from Rhode Island in his just tribute to his memory. He was among the most promising members of this House—a gentleman of talents and ambition—beloved by his friends, and admired by his constituents. In an evil hour he was tempted to violate his obligations to the State he represented, and in this House gave the vote of that State to the late President of the United States. He appealed to the tribunal he had offended, but a judgment was rendered against him. From that hour his hopes withered, his spirits drooped—his ambition was destroyed—he fell a much regretted victim to the late Presidential election. It became our duty, in the progress of our investigations in the Committee on Retrenchment, to probe the mysteries of the various departments of Government, and to disclose many glaring abuses of the public confidence. We discovered, sir, that a practice had grown up of disbursing moneys without appropriations—of liquidating accounts without law—in short, that each department had its little legislation of its own, without the authority, co-operation, or knowledge of Congress. Among the disclosures, there was one of an extraordinary character. It was discovered that, while the late administration had not the courage to confer on the representative of Illinois an office corresponding to his talents, and to the station he had occupied in our public councils—while they dared not, for a manifest cause, send his name, coupled with an office, to the Senate of the United States, they had resorted to the miserable subterfuge of giving that gentleman a secret and poor employment, under a vain hope that this singular transaction would remain forever wrapt in diplomatic mystery. The committee ascertained, to their surprise, and to the astonishment of the whole nation, that a fictitious mission to Cuba had been created, and that the late representative from Illinois had received his outfit from the secret service fund. I had not supposed, sir, that there was one friend of the late administration so indiscreet or daring as to remind the nation of this dark and mysterious affair. We have much reason, sir, to congratulate our country on the able and successful services of the present administration; but it most especially deserves the approbation of all for the frankness of its proceedings, its faithful adherence to our laws, and its courage and firmness in encountering and arresting every violation of the constitution. We have none of these abuses now, sir—no disbursement of the public money without the express sanction of law—no Executive legislation—no diplomatic mystery.

The course of this debate, Mr. Speaker, has made it my duty to notice some lighter matters. I have no desire, sir, to appear in this House in the character of a satirist, with my bow and quiver. Mine is the humble ambition to be classed with its useful members. In my view, the monuments constructed here by reason and judgment, are far more solid and durable than all the splendid but more perishable draperies of the imagination. But, whatever may be our taste or ambition, sir, whoever appears here, must be armed at all points, and must expect to encounter antagonists of every character. We are sometimes called upon to engage in a gentlemanly tournament with men of principle, honor, and talent; but, sir, in such a generous war, however keen our weapons, we leave no stain upon the blade. If, in a sudden impulse, or by an ungraceful thrust, we should wound our generous adversary, it is not only a duty, but a pleasure, to make the "wound honorable." But if, Mr. Speaker, we are sometimes driven to the hard necessity of encountering adversaries of another character—if, in defending our friends, we are obliged to turn indignantly upon some paltry trader in low calumnies with a "lash of scorpions," or crush the vampire with a storm of invective—the apology is then, sir, not due to the offender, but to ourselves.

In our skirmishes and excursive wars here, sir, we cannot choose our adversary, nor in our sports select our game. The gentleman from Rhode Island appears to have been particularly fortunate as a sportsman. He has winged "imperial eagles, towering falcons, cock sparrows, and mousing owls"—ay, and old mousers, too, sir. But, Mr. Speaker, we may sometimes start other game—we may, in our skirmishes here, encounter some magnanimous adversary—brave and generous as the valiant hound—the leader of the pack—one who yelps and pursues most loudly and fiercely when the game is—at a distance. Were it near, sir—were the noble stag once to turn his meteor eye upon his hunters—with his magnificent antlers erect and threatening—"Tray, Blanch, and Sweetheart," would whine and skulk—and even the leader of the pack, ay, sir, even old Jowler would growl and sneak away.

We may be obliged also to contend with some of a more respectable family; though, perhaps, not more distinguished for courage or magnanimity. We may meet with some gentlemen of peculiar patriotism and refined political morality. He may have been, as a partisan, notorious for his vituperations against Jefferson and Madison—he may be distinguished as the calumniator of every prominent member of a party uniformly devoted to republican principles of Government, and of every man in any manner distinguished for his civil or military services. Our antagonist may be some partisan patriot, notorious for his hostility to our constitution in 1798—to our laws in 1807—to our country in the war of 1812. Perhaps, sir, he may be an outcast of some ancient and forlorn hope, of some party publicly accused, upon high and distinguished authority, of plotting treason against the Union in our late war. And, sir, it may be the peculiar misfortune of such an adversary—while his honorable associates repel the charge with proud indignation—it may be his sad destiny to be lashed to the ear of his accuser. All the dignity of the man may be sunk in the sycophancy of the parasite. He may not only crouch beneath the lash, but, like a poor slave, bend his head upon the footstool of his distinguished accuser, hug his chains, and breathe out vows of eternal allegiance and fidelity.

The gentleman from Rhode Island has witnessed an interesting age, and has chronicled many revolutions in the political world. He may yet live to see some such poor wreck of humanity appearing again in public life—regenerated, recoined, and restamped—fresh from the great national republican mint. But, sir, whenever and wherever he may appear, he will be, as he has always has been, the unrelenting foe of every man at all respected for moral dignity, or distinguished for patriotism. To such an antagonist, the past can afford no consolation—the future no hope—he who looks back on the wreck of his political fortunes and his withered hopes, with the bitter glance of despair, can look forward only with a malignant eye—flushed with revenge. The history of his country affords him no consolation, save in the recollection of that memorable hour of our national calamities—the hour of his triumph and the patriot's despair—when with a treasonable joy he saw the flashes of our burning villages in the North—the fires of Hampton and H. v. e. de Grace—the blaze of our capitol—when with treacherous exultation he welcomed the arrival of an invading and veteran army on our Southern frontier.

The hopeless politician turns back with unnatural delight to that awful crisis in our national affairs, when every American forgot the little animosities of party, and yielded to the sublimer impulses of patriotism; when our bark was amidst the breakers, and the sea run mountains high; when some of the crew mutinied, and all hope seemed to be lost! The treacherous mutineer, sir, the unhappy victim of despair and revenge, finds sweet consolation in traducing that patriotic and gallant crew, who stood by the helm, and breasted and weathered the storm. But, sir, the sullen and despairing alien to his country's honor enjoys his sublimer revenge in bitterly calumniating the venerable and gallant chief who ruled in the storm of battle, and redeemed our lost hopes—who extinguished these unhallowed fires upon our land, and washed out the dishonorable stains upon our soil, with the blood of its invaders. The gloomy and desponding victim of despair, brooding over his withered hopes, can never pardon our Chief Magistrate for destroying all his unholy and ambitious plans, by closing the calamitous scenes of war in a blaze of victory.

If it were not, Mr. Speaker, too great an indignity to the honorable members of this House, I might concur with the gentleman from Rhode Island, in supposing it possible that we may encounter on this floor some member, whose only title to respect would be the certificate we all enjoy of the confidence of our constituents. We might, perhaps, be obliged to engage with some gentleman remarkable for his modesty, self-respect, and gentlemanly refinement. Perchance, some disciplined orator, who may rise in this House, with all the pomp and magnificence of a Demosthenes—with his little library scattered around him—threatening us with a speech of admirable dimensions. But, with all this parade, he may yet, sir, disappoint himself, and relieve the apprehensions of his audience, by sinking, exhausted, and broken down, under the excessive weight of an enormous exordium. To young modesty and talent this would be a calamity; but, sir, it is nothing to your veteran rhetorician. Like the amphibious and skilful navigators of the pearl fishery, though they may sink in one latitude, they rise in another, full freighted with all the treasures of the deep. So, sir, with your veteran speech-maker—this ill-fated exordium may, after some four, five, or six weeks' severe labor, appear in all the amplitude of a pamphlet, corrected and revised by the author. And, sir, it might happen that this same pamphlet may contain a deliberate, calumnious, and malicious libel upon some prominent member of this House—perhaps, my honorable and distinguished friend from South Carolina. And, sir, we might find a gentleman of such refined delicacy, and of so nice a sense of manly honor, as to convey to my honorable friend a copy of this same pamphlet, with its malicious libel, through the medium of the post office, with the most respectful compliments of the author! Now, sir, I should regret to imagine it possible that this dignified assembly should ever be disgraced by the presence of any such refined calumniator. Should it, however, ever happen, I am sure the gentleman from Rhode Island would lament with me to see my honorable friend from South Carolina driven to the hard necessity of grappling with the miserable author of such an exordium, pamphlet, and calumny.

But, Mr. Speaker, our most painful duty in these our parliamentary wars is to encounter age. Not, sir, the venerable sage who appears among us to instruct us with his counsels and his experience; to improve our manners, by setting us a gentle and bland example of parliamentary courtesy; to win our esteem and to command our respect and admiration, by a deportment majestic and dignified. No, sir; age, in that venerated form, can never be encountered but with feelings of profound reverence and respect—the heart leaps to do it homage. But, sir, it may be our humiliating duty to encounter it in another and a less dignified form. It may appear among us, sir, with its certificate stamped upon its forehead, of forty years' hard service in the Old Bailey—it may triumphantly unravel its diploma from the renowned college of St. Giles—it may rush upon us, reckless of every rule of propriety, every principle of honor, and all the graces of gentlemanly decorum—it may run wild in this House, flourishing its scalping knife, hurling its tomahawk, and scattering its poisoned arrows with malignant and savage ferocity—it may shock our modesty, by comparing itself to the noble bird of Jove—it may insult the patriotism of the House, by associating itself with the venerated form of the immortal Washington—nay, sir, it may violate all decency and morality, and blaspheme our religion, by impiously assuming the holy and sublime mantle of the prophet Elijah! I trust, sir, that age, in this degenerate form, has never appeared among us—I hope no such original will ever disgrace this House—I trust it is “but fancy's sketch.” Should, however, such a calamity ever befall us, I am sure the gentleman from Rhode Island will concur with me that it would be sacrilege—it would be an insult to venerable age, to reverence or to spare “the chartered libertine.”

Mr. Speaker, my task is finished. I engaged in this debate from a hard necessity; but, sir, it is a duty I shall never shrink from, when called upon to discharge the obligations of friendship. I have only to regret the absence of the gentlemen calumniated, who would have defended themselves with infinitely greater ability. I now resign, sir, most cheerfully resign, all the honors of the ring, all the vulgar triumphs of the fancy, to those who habitually indulge that exalted ambition. When humble ambition, sir, is driven by a hard but imperious necessity to “quit the even tenor of its way,” to grapple with a Cribb or a Molineux, the severity of the punishment should correspond to the enormity of the sacrifice. In rebuking calumny, sir, to the best of my poor ability, I have not ruffled a feather of the imperial eagle, “towering in his pride of place.” No, sir; withered be the arm that would harm the bold bird that sports and revels in the purple cloud of war, and lights, with a triumphant wing, on the standard of victory. No, sir; the arrow was aimed at an ill-omened follower of the camp—at the sable bird that hovers over and lights upon the field, when the battle is lost and won, and claws in the graves of the brave for its dreadful food. The vulture winged, the true sportsman pursues such game no further; he leaves his victim to rot upon the plain, to the kind care of its dusky mourners, with none to chaunt its requiem but myriads of cawing crows and croaking ravens.

Mr. ALEXANDER then rose to address the House, but gave way for a motion to adjourn; and then
The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

Mr. BOULDIN presented the petition of inhabitants of the county of Buckingham, in the State of Virginia, praying that the aid of the General Government may be extended to the American Colonization Society, either by a grant of money, or by employing a part of the naval force in transmitting emigrants to the colony in Africa. Referred.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The House having resumed the consideration of Mr. STANBERRY's motion to strike from the general appropriation bill the appropriation for the salary of the minister to Russia,

Mr. ALEXANDER rose, and said he had but a few remarks to submit upon the subject now before the House. He could wish that he had none; but to be silent at this time, would be criminal indeed. Much which has been brought into this discussion, he should pass over as unworthy of notice.

He regretted that the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNES,] after having commenced and continued a most virulent attack upon the administration, and the gentleman who had been appointed minister to Russia, should have absented himself this day from the House, without waiting to see whether any thing could be said in their defence. If, as stated by him, there has been a departure from the original question under consideration, Mr. A. knew of no one more chargeable for that departure than the honorable gentleman himself.

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

It was not without some degree of mortification, Mr. A. confessed, that he had witnessed the course which this debate had taken, and been prosecuted on the part of certain gentlemen. He did not mean to follow them in that tirade of coarse abuse, vilification, and ridicule, which they had thought proper to indulge in, leaving them to enjoy the full benefit of such pantomimes as have been exhibited upon the boards; but he should treat the subject in general as it deserved, seriously, and place it upon that ground where it ought properly to rest. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. B.] has furnished me with admonitory counsel upon this subject, of which I shall claim advantage, when he said, in allusion to another gentleman in this debate, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that it was the place, and not the man, which gave character to the sentiments uttered upon this floor, and which required them to be noticed. But for this consideration, the gentleman should have passed by me "as the idle wind which I respect not."

Mr. A. could but lament that the gentleman should have availed himself of this opportunity to give vent to that "testy humor" for which he is so remarkable, at an age when he may be said to be looking to another world, "where the wicked cease from trouble, and the weary are at rest;" and I concur with my colleague, [Mr. COKE,] that it would have been far more becoming, had he observed that christian virtue, in rather forgiving than reviling the frailties and infirmities of a fellow-mortal. It is true, sir, the gentleman has disclaimed saying any thing injurious to the reputation of the minister abroad, who has been made the subject of his sarcasm; for he well knew that was beyond the reach of calumny, or the venom of a vindictive and malignant spirit; while, at the same time, he has portrayed him in such colors, that none can mistake—applied to him the most opprobrious terms which a distempered imagination could suggest, calculated to affect his standing at home and abroad, and to impair the confidence of the people in the power that appointed him. What, sir, is a picture, a painting, a caricature, less a libel or slander, in the eye of the law, because it happens not to be printed or spoken? And does the gentleman mean to purge himself of the contempt, in his legislative capacity, by saying there was no evil intent expressed? I shall not admit the plea, but hold him responsible to the law, as it is written; for, sir, permit me here to say, that there is nothing which tends so much to injure the character of our country with foreign nations, as the scurrilous publications and vile aspersions with which the public presses teem, unless it be persons high in official stations at home and abroad, who malign and disparage the Chief Magistrate of the Union. The design and effect of the philippic which we have heard, cannot be misunderstood. It is intended to destroy, if possible, the usefulness of the minister, in accomplishing the objects of his mission. Else why these extracts, taken from the speeches said to have been delivered by him some years since, and read by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. B.] unless with the view to prejudice him and the administration at the court to which he has been sent? Even admitting all that he is represented as saying respecting the Russian dynasty, it is a matter of history known to the public, and about which he had a right to speak.

The gentleman has been pleased to allude to the reception and conduct of the minister at the court of St. Petersburg, in such a way as to have associated himself with the miserable slangs and vile slanders fabricated and circulated by certain presses for party and political purposes, which I take upon myself here to say, from authority not to be questioned, are without any foundation in truth to sustain them. His reception was such as became the character of a gentleman, and the dignity of the Government which he represented, and, upon taking leave, the best feeling and understanding subsisted between him and the official minister.

Ridicule, sir, in the hands of an ingenious and dexterous debater, when argument fails, is, we all know, one of the most powerful weapons that can be used for popular effect; and the gentleman understands perfectly well the part that he is playing, if he be content to suffer in that estimation which this House and the nation must entertain for his representative character. I can congratulate the gentleman upon the aid which he has received in other quarters of the House, from those who may well deserve to rank as his noble compeers in this unholy crusade against fair fame and character.

Gentlemen have said much of constructive journeys and constructive residences, and so did Tristram Shandy say much of noses of "radical heat and radical moisture," which may be as well understood by some one in this debate; and there is just about the same difference between the case in point, and what they would have one believe is a constructive journey, as there was in point of size between the nose of Tristram and the famous Slawkenbergier. Gentlemen seem rather sensitive upon this subject—all is not well with them, I fear. It may be, should the bill which has passed this House regulating the mileage of members of Congress fail to become a law, they will have an account to render nearer home of a constructive journey—a journey performed upon the periphery of a circle, instead of the diagonal of a parallelogram; and, like the bird when alarmed for the safety of its own brood, seek to decoy the enemy in pursuit of other game. Corporal Trim, sir, after taking his position on the floor, with his body squared well to the front, according to the line of science, at an angle of eighty-five and a half degrees, always began reading, "with the most persuasive angle of incidence," his sermon to my uncle Toby, by first saying, "for we trust we have a good conscience."

There is no meeting gentlemen upon a theatre of this sort, unless one descends to an arena, and do there contend with men—

"Born to vex a State,

With wrangling talents, formed for foul debate."

Mr. A. said he had no asperity of feeling; no antipathies to indulge in against any one, either in this House or out of it. He did not wish to war against the living, much less the dead, the aged, or the infirm! But he hoped he should be pardoned for attempting to rescue the reputation of an absent gentleman from the fangs as it were of vipers, who were as "hungry as death, and unrelenting as the grave."

After the explanation that was given by my colleague, [Mr. ARBURN,] who entered early upon this debate, I had hoped that the question raised by the mover would have been decided at once by the House. If he supposed in this way to assail the reputation of the minister, or through him, under color of friendship, the administration, which must share in some degree the responsibility of the mission, he has wholly failed of his purpose. And after the manifestation which the gentleman gave on a former occasion of the kind of friendship he bore to it, none will envy him a distinction which he may claim exclusively his own. What, sir, are we to be told, and the nation, too, and that upon the authority of the President of the United States, that we have no minister to the court of St. Petersburg, when it is well known, that a gentleman was regularly nominated at the last session of Congress, and confirmed, if not unanimously, without even a division by the Senate? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WAYNE] has well distinguished between the moral and political effect which such a declaration going forth to the public should have, when accompanied with the peculiar circumstances of the case in question.

But, says the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. B.] it is the illegality of the measure to which we object. And when was he ever known to raise his voice against the illegality or unconstitutionality of any measure before? I hold it not proper in this House now to disapprove the mission as an act of original creation, by withholding the appropriation necessary to carry it into execution. The objection, if valid at all, should have been urged at the time of the appointment, and not when a moral obligation has arisen on the part of this House to carry into effect the Executive will. In this way, you may control and counteract the most important function of the Executive branch, which was intended to be separate and distinct from the Legislative Department. I shall not pretend to say that it would not be the duty of this House to interpose its authority, and prevent an improper or mischievous mission, such as the Panama; but then the exertion of power should go directly to the mission itself, and not to any personal objection which we may have to the minister; that is a matter belonging exclusively to the Executive will. The gentleman has also failed in his analogy, by comparing this with the case of Mr. Cook, who was appointed by the late administration, at a time when he was physically and mentally unable to undertake any business, to go to Cuba—for what, nobody knew—merely touched there—pocketed a sum of the secret-service money of the Government—to what amount, I believe, was never ascertained—went home, and died.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. Burges] has, however, wisely discovered that this mission is contrary to the laws of nations, and, therefore, void; and how does he prove it? By attempting to show, with a kind of specious reasoning, that the minister has divested himself of his rights and privileges, in taking up his residence for a time in a country beyond the control of the Government to which he has been sent, when there is not a single authority in the whole code, respecting the character of ministers, going to sustain the position. The argument which has been presented to the House, might with much more propriety have been addressed to the Emperor of Russia, to prevent his accrediting the minister, if there be any force in it. But, unfortunately for the gentleman, the Emperor disagrees with him in his view of the law of nations, and has not only received and accredited the minister, but permitted him to retire to another kingdom and carry on his negotiation. The same rights, immunities, and independence, which belong to the character of ministers travelling to and from one court to another, through the dominions of different sovereigns, still follow him; and it will be time enough, when these are violated, to consider the question which has been raised in this debate. If, however, the law of nations should prove inadequate for this purpose, the minister, with the aid of the municipal authorities, wherever he may be, will be able to take care of himself; and, if not, I can assure the gentleman, he will never ask protection at his hands; for that would be, as the law has it, committere agnum lupis.

The gentleman is equally unfortunate in the authorities adduced to prove that the commission of the minister is at an end. The object for which he was sent abroad has not been accomplished; neither has he been recalled, nor sent home, or any where else, except with the permission of his own Government, the court of Russia, and his own free will. The term elsewhere, as used, and upon which the gentleman mainly relies his argument, can only mean when sent to some other court, by order of his Government, for a different purpose. The events then not happening, which terminate his mission by the law of nations, he may be said still to be invested with all the rights and immunities which originally belonged to him.

Mr. A. desired to know how came the diplomatic term in use, which says, that such a person is appointed minister near the court of Russia, of England, or the United States, if it does not imply an occasional absence, or residence in a foreign territory, or not immediately at the seat of Government. Would the British minister be less so, if he were accredited by this Government, and resided in Canada or Texas, than he is now at the city of Washington? I apprehend not. The mere circumstances of residence, I therefore consider as a matter of arrangement between the respective sovereigns and their ministers as to the most convenient and best mode of conducting the negotiation. There is so little in this point, that I shall not bestow upon it any further consideration.

The President has fairly and properly stated the subject to this House and the nation; he has informed us that our relations with Russia are upon the most friendly and stable foundation, and not likely to be disturbed; that our minister, shortly after his arrival there, was compelled, in consequence of the bad state of his health, to seek a more genial climate, with a view to its re-establishment, intimating, at the same time, that there was no danger of our interests suffering in that quarter, as the necessary communication could be kept up through the secretary of legation, who was left there. Even this young man has not been permitted to escape the vituperation of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. Burges.] He has been represented as having nothing but youth and his surname to recommend him to public notice. I shall not pretend to speak of his merits, as they are better known to the representatives from Philadelphia, the place of his residence, who are more able to vindicate them than I am. I have, however, always understood that he is a young gentleman in good standing and most exemplary deportment. It is true, he has not had much knowledge or experience in the world; yet, with a few exceptions, it is generally the case of those most usually appointed. Since the gentleman has taken upon himself to draw a comparison between youth and old age, I hope to be pardoned, since he has espoused the last, for advocating the first, in the language of an illustrious individual on another occasion:

“Whether youth can be imputed to any man as a reproach, I will not assume the province of determining; but surely age may become justly contemptible, if the opportunities which it brings have passed away without improvement, and vice appears to prevail when the passions should have subsided. He who, after having seen the consequences of a thousand errors, continues still to vilify, and whose age has only added obstinacy to malignity, is surely the object of either abhorrence or contempt, and deserves not that his grey head should secure him from insults.

“Much more is he to be abhorred, who, as he has advanced in age, has receded from virtue, and becomes more wicked with less temptation; who prostitutes himself for a reward which he never can hope to enjoy, and spends the remains of his life in the ruin of his country.”

But after all, said Mr. A., is this an affair of such moment as to justify the vindictive feeling which the gentleman has thought proper to bring into this debate? Is it not usual, during the absence of the minister, to entrust the business to a chargé, or even a secretary of legation, as I think was the case of our late minister, Mr. King, who, at the time of his appointment, it was well known, could not conduct a laborious and complicated negotiation, through the delicacy of his health, and was permitted to sojourn through England, with the hope of its recovery? Yet, sir, did any one ever think of denying to him a salary necessary for his support, and created by every moral consideration? Was not Mr. Barlow allowed to leave France and go into a foreign country for the benefit of his health, where he died? The same privilege has been enjoyed by our late minister, (Mr.

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

Brown,) as stated by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG;] and where then was this newborn zeal which has so suddenly sprung up on the part of certain gentlemen, in behalf of the people?—this resistance to the encroachments of power, which, for the first time, has ever shown itself in the gentleman from Rhode Island? [Mr. BURGESS.] It was as silent as the grave! But because it happens to be the distinguished gentleman, whom envy, malice, and detraction have sought in vain to destroy, and hailing as he does from Virginia, are these denunciations and "vials of wrath" poured out upon his devoted and unoffending head! They have been met by my colleagues, and the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WAYNE,] in such a style and manner, that I shall not attempt to emulate them; and the assailants, scoffers, and deriders, have been thrown back, covered with shame and confusion.

As to what the gentleman has been pleased to allege as fraudulent diplomacy in the Secretary of State—machinations on the part of the administration, in attempting to bribe the State of Virginia, and the gentleman upon whom the mission was conferred, I shall say nothing further than to state that this House and the nation, knowing the person who makes the charge, and that it exists in his own imagination, unsupported by any evidence whatever, will put it down to its proper account.

Sir, said Mr. A., it is not the first time that I have witnessed an attempt in this House to injure the well-earned reputation of the gentleman abroad, when the distance of three thousand miles separated him from his assailant, and then, as now, with perhaps scarce a hope of being again able to return to his own native shores! Providence, however, was pleased to spare his life, and he met the attack, and has placed that matter where his honor and integrity rest perfectly secure. How it is on the other side, let the seal of Hermes disclose.

Now, sir, neither the distinguished gentleman, nor the State which claims him as a citizen, ever sought the honor which this appointment confers. Neither has ever been found bowing to the subserviency of Executive power, or truckling at the footstool of a foreign throne; and the insinuation which has been thrown out, is worthy only the character of the servile sycophant, who knows how to minister to the will of Executive patronage, and worship at the shrine of idolatry. Virginia owes allegiance to no administration, further than it may choose to respect the rights of the citizens, and the principles of the constitution. She stands towards this as she has done to all others, approving where she can, and condemning where she must. So long as it acts faithfully to the people and the constitution, she will give it a just and honest support. Often has she discarded her political favorites when they have departed from the faith, and received them back only when they have turned from the error of their ways.

How was this appointment made? It was given in consideration of the distinguished public services of the honorable gentleman who had retired to repose from the turmoils and strife of the political world, with no wish or expectation of being again called upon to mingle in them. At a time when he had performed, as he supposed, the last duty he owed to his fellow-citizens, those constituents whom the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] has so sneeringly alluded to, when he remarked that he had once heard him (Mr. Randolph) say in this House, "they were such as no man ever had before," and he [Mr. BURGESS] believed it. Yes, sir; I shall tell the gentleman they are such as he will never have the honor to serve. As I was about to say, when he had discharged the last act of his political life to his constituents, in the convention which recently revised their State constitution, where the powers of his mind, and his sagacity as a statesman, claimed for him a pre-eminent distinction among those with whom he was associated, was he required by his country to enter upon this new and untried scene. And yet, sir, we are gravely asked where are the monuments of his genius, the fabrics of his workmanship, which entitle him to this distinction? As well might gentlemen ask Virginia for her jewels, and they would receive the same answer in reference to him that was given by the mother of the Gracchi. From the honorable manner in which the offer was made, his patriotism, yes, sir, his patriotism, did not permit him to decline a service so hazardous to himself personally, if he could be at all useful to his country; and with promptness, although Congress failed to provide him with the necessary outfit, did he repair upon his own resources to fulfil the expectations of his Government.

It was, sir, no Russian winter, so much to be apprehended to his constitution, which he had to meet, but a tropical sun, as fatal to his health at the period of his arrival, as if he had been landed at New Orleans on the banks of the Mississippi; and for this visitation of Providence, is he to be denied a compensation which never could have been a consideration with him for accepting the appointment? No one who knows him will ever believe that he would "sell the mighty space of his large honors, for so much trash as may be grasped thus."

But, sir, it is not necessary for me to stand here as his eulogist. His fame is written upon every page of his country's history, and is as lasting as his own native hills. Those gentlemen who preceded me in this debate, have done full justice to his merits, and I could only follow in their wake, without the hope of adding one wreath to the chaplet that decorates his brow. I shall, however, say, amidst all the billingsgate abuse, vile contumely, and "back wounding calumny, which strikes the whitest virtue," he stands like the aged oak of the forest, unscathed, glorying in his height, conscious of a well-spent life in his country's cause, and knowing that he still lives in the hearts and affections of his fellow-citizens, whom he has served faithfully, honestly, and independently, for the last thirty years, and none, the vilest recreant, dare enter there to rob him of his good name.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, next rose. In the few remarks which I intend to submit to the House, said Mr. P., it will not be my object to consider the question as one confined to Mr. Randolph, or any other individual, but to all persons whose cases may come within certain rules which the Government of the United States ought to establish and enforce. This debate would have been curtailed if the gentlemen who had preceded me had confined their remarks to the real subject of dispute. Mr. Van Buren is not now on trial, nor is the President of the United States, but the question is one which will admit of discussion under any administration; if not now settled, may be hereafter presented, and may again be the fruitful source of contention and discord. Of all species of legislation, that to my mind is the most odious which relates to individuals, or the particular cases of individuals. Being unwilling also to travel out of the road, and anxious to bring this debate to a close, I will also confine myself to the only information which we have received, and on which we can well rely, so far as the question presented for our consideration is involved. What is that information, and from what source does it come? From the President of the United States in his first communication made to Congress this session. This comes to us in an official form, under the impress of our Executive; it is all that we have received officially, and all that we can with propriety refer to. Let us refer to this information. The President of the United States, after informing us that our relations with Russia are of the most stable character, and respect for that empire, and confidence in its friendship towards the United States, have been so long entertained on our part, and so carefully cherished by the present Emperor and his illustrious predecessor, as to have become incorporated with the public sentiment of the United States—no means (says he) will be left unemployed, on my part, to promote these salutary feelings, and those improvements of which the commercial intercourse between the two countries is susceptible. “I sincerely regret to inform you, that our minister lately commissioned to that court, on whose distinguished talents and great experience in public affairs I place great reliance, has been compelled, by extreme indisposition, to exercise a privilege, which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion, of leaving temporarily his post, for the advantage of a more genial climate.”

“If, as it is to be hoped, the improvement of his health should be such as to justify him in doing so, he will repair to St. Petersburg, and resume the discharge of his official duties. I have received the most satisfactory assurance, that, in the mean time, the public interests, in that quarter, will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which he will continue, through the secretary of legation, with the Russian cabinet.”

I have found it necessary to quote the language of the President, because, as already stated, it is all the information communicated officially to us, relative to the mission to Russia, and all upon which I shall rely in justification of the remarks to be made.

The House will indulge me, Mr. Speaker, while I attempt to make an analysis of this information. So important is it to this country to promote the salutary feelings which have heretofore subsisted between the Russian empire and the United States, no means will be left unemployed to accomplish that object. To effect this object, so important in the estimation of the President, not only the greatest talents, but the greatest experience which the country can afford, are to be employed. So necessary was it to employ such talents and experience, that to command them, a privilege was committed to the discretion of Mr. Randolph, of leaving the court of Russia, whenever, in his opinion, his health required him to exercise this privilege. We have no minister now at the court of Russia, nor have, but for a short period, had one, since this mission was instituted; there is no one now discharging the duties of a minister, because Mr. Randolph, in the event of the restoration of his health, is to resume his duties, in the event of a contingency, which may never happen, more especially as he is made the judge to decide whether it will, and when it does. The secretary of legation is the only representative we now have, by the President's own showing, at the court of the greatest empire in the world, when the President, last May, thought it expedient to employ the best talents and the greatest experience in the country to represent us there; if this was necessary then, subsequent events in Europe, referred to by many gentlemen in this debate, have rendered it obviously necessary at this time.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, presented fairly and candidly to the House my view of the only information, in regard to this mission, we can act on, communicated to us by the President of the United States. It presents to us, I may be permitted to say, an extraordinary and unusual state of things; and, before I take my seat, I shall show there is no precedent for it in the history of our Government. In the first place, have we a minister at the court of Russia? In the second place, have we such a minister, or one under such circumstances as to require us to make this appropriation? And, further, have we, as the representatives of the people, and holding the purse-strings of the nation, a right to express our opinions of the President's conduct, in regard to this mission, and the conduct of the minister he has sent to Russia? If we have a minister at the court of Russia, he must have been appointed and commissioned pursuant to the constitution and laws of the United States. Any man sent abroad, contrary to the constitution or laws of the United States, although he may be denominated a minister, and accredited as such at a foreign court, is not and cannot by us be recognised as such. Does the appointing power rest exclusively with the President of the United States? Let the constitution of the United States settle this question: “The President of the United States shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, and other public ministers.” The power to nominate is vested exclusively in the President, but no appointment can be made without the advice and consent of the Senate; and it is the province of the Senate to act upon every thing appertaining to the nomination before the appointment is complete. The minister must be commissioned by the President, according to the ratification of his nomination. Suppose Mr. Randolph, nominated by the President, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed minister to the court of St. Petersburg, had been, in conformity to a previous arrangement between him and the President, commissioned minister plenipotentiary to the court of Stockholm. Is there a man in this House who would say that we ought to make an appropriation for his salary? I presume not. He would be illegally commissioned, would not be our minister at Sweden, and could not be the minister of the United States at the court of Russia. What is the present case? Mr. Randolph is nominated by the President minister to the court of Russia, with the previous understanding between him and the President that he should have the privilege committed to his discretion, of residing in England, or any other part of Europe, whenever he should think proper to exercise that privilege, and for an unlimited period of time. This agreement, and this discretionary exercise of privilege, is unknown to the Senate, with whose advice and consent the appointment was made, and without which it could not have been made. To me, Mr. Speaker, the whole proceedings appear to have been irregular, illegal, unprecedented, and the whole transaction void from the beginning; that we consequently have no minister, and, until one is appointed, it is unnecessary to make any appropriation for his salary; and if he has received an outfit, he has received what, by law, he was not entitled to. Suppose this nomination had been sent to the Senate with all the facts disclosed, that the President has since communicated to us in relation to it—this discretionary power to exercise the privilege committed to him of residing in England—is there a political friend or foe in that body that would or could have voted for it? No, sir, not one; and I contend that as to such appointments the Senate is a co-ordinate branch.

The next consideration, said Mr. P., is our right to withhold the appropriation required, if we are dissatisfied with the course adopted by the President and his minister. If we cannot express our dissatisfaction in this way, I know of none in which it can be done. If we willingly make the appropriation, with all the information which has been given us, we sanction the whole proceedings; and what has been done will continue to be done, by this and all our future Presidents, so often as circumstances shall require them to adopt the precedent which will be established. Sir, we have some knowledge of our relative concerns with Russia, and can judge whether, at this time, we can be as well represented at that court by a secretary of legation as by a minister plenipotentiary, and on this subject ought to express our opinions. We have a right to say that our concerns with Russia are, at this time, such as to require a resident minister; and if the President thinks they can be as well attended to by a minister residing in England, we may so far differ as to warrant us in withholding the appropriation.

But, Mr. Speaker, so far as Mr. Randolph's salary is connected with this question, and the argument used is founded on the necessity of an appropriation to pay his salary, we can derive some light from an examination of the laws of the United States, which do not contemplate a yearly salary when a year's service has not been rendered.

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

By the law on this subject, we find that the minister shall be paid at the rate of nine thousand dollars per year for his services; the chargé d'affaires shall be paid at the rate of four thousand five hundred dollars per year; the secretary of legation shall be paid at the rate of two thousand dollars a year. Sir, the words "at the rate of" are repeated six or eight times in the first section of the act regulating the pay of ministers abroad, necessarily excluding the idea of the payment of a yearly salary, when a year's service has not been rendered. By adopting the amendment as it now stands, we are relieved from any responsibility on this subject; we leave the administration free to act, (giving them an appropriation of nine thousand dollars,) either in giving Mr. Randolph a constructive residence at the court of St. Petersburg, the whole time, in fact, in England, or in filling his place by the appointment of another minister. Suppose, sir, the President should think Mr. Randolph's residence in England is, constructively, a residence in Russia, he will have at his command the money to pay him; but, as to the correctness of such a proceeding, others must judge. If, on the other hand, he should be of the opinion that he has not been a resident there the whole time since he left this country, under his supervision, he can be pro rata paid. The discussion which has already taken place will show the opinions of some of us on this subject. If Mr. Randolph's opinions in another case could be used in this question, perhaps he and the President would think that he was, and for some time past has been, a resident of England, and not of Russia: for, said Mr. Randolph, in a contested election from Massachusetts, not many years ago—contested on the ground of the residence of the gentleman in this District at the time of his election—"can a man be here and there?" To apply to his case his own language, can a man in England be in Russia? Sir, another view of this question: we are assured by the President of the United States the public interests with Russia will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which Mr. Randolph will continue, through the secretary of legation, with the Russian cabinet. If they can be preserved from prejudice by Mr. Randolph's residence in England, cannot they be as well preserved if Mr. Randolph should reside in the District of Columbia? Is not this a subject we can judge of? And if we should presume to differ with the President, we have undoubtedly a right to express that difference in the only way left us—our vote on this appropriation. What do we get from the President but his opinion? And he does not say that we shall be as well represented—Mr. Randolph in England, and his secretary in Russia—but that our rights will be preserved from prejudice; and that they will be, is a matter of opinion, and nothing more—a matter of opinion at war with other declarations made by the President—among others, that, to represent us at this court, the best talents and greatest experience were called in requisition, not because they were not necessary, but because they were necessary. Sir, at this period of the world, when Europe is in commotion, when the spirit of freedom, and the spirit of revolution also, has pervaded every kingdom, it is not sufficient that our rights and relations with Russia are preserved from prejudice. We want an active, efficient, intelligent man at that court, who will, in season and out of season, so watch all the events of the day, as to be able, not only to communicate what has taken place, but who, from his knowledge of mankind and the world, from what has taken place, will be able to inform us what will follow. Can this be done by Mr. Randolph in England, with the aid of his secretary in Russia? No, sir, admitting this secretary has all the qualifications and merits the gentlemen from Virginia have ascribed to him; as yet, sir, I have heard nothing in his favor from any other State, nothing from Pennsylvania, nothing from the gentlemen who represent the city of Philadelphia, who, if Mr. John Randolph Clay be this youthful prodigy, must have heard of him. I would address a few words to those gentlemen, the burden of whose song, ever since I became acquainted with them, has been economy, retrenchment, and reform. Professions are good, but actions are better; the former are never better received than when followed by the latter. Useless and extravagant expenditures and disbursements of public moneys, it has been said, drove the late administration from their places: for the argument, be it so, as I will not now stop to question what has been said. Because gentlemen are now in power, are they disposed to change their minds, and adopt the very course they censured the late administration for pursuing, and split upon the rock upon which they split? If consistent, they will go with us in withholding this appropriation, or granting it under such restrictions as to leave the President to judge whether Mr. Randolph is entitled to a year's salary. Further, sir, the power to appoint a chargé d'affaires by a public minister, on his leaving a court, is an incidental power, and belongs to the minister, under the law and usage of nations; and the moment Mr. Randolph left the court of St. Petersburg, Mr. Clay, the secretary of legation, in charge of our affairs, that moment became chargé d'affaires, and, as such, under the law of the United States, became entitled to his four thousand five hundred dollars; and young as he has been represented to be, he is not too young to neglect his rights, or not to claim what belongs to him. It is no kind of consequence that this claim is not now made; when preferred, we cannot resist it. He does not relinquish his right to it: and, when the claim is made, he will give you the evidence of the service rendered, and show you the law fixing his compensation. If, Mr. Speaker, there was not something very extraordinary in this mission, with its attendant circumstances—something unprecedented, and which astounded both friends and foes, why did the gentleman from Virginia, at the head of our foreign affairs, [Mr. Archer,] before this debate commenced, and before, from any thing that had transpired, he had a right to suppose there would be any debate, go to the office of the Secretary of State, and request of him the privilege of inspecting documents touching this mission? And why was this privilege extended to the honorable gentleman from Virginia? I am not disposed to arraign the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia, or the Secretary of State, for this: I will find fault with no one; but, sir, whatever is presented to the House for their action, ought to be so presented that all may have the benefit of the same testimony. Perhaps the honorable gentleman from Virginia is satisfied with the information which has been confidentially imparted to him; but how it would affect us, we could best judge when we had it. I have adverted to the disclosure made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to show that he has thought, in reference to this mission, there might be some few things "out of joint." Now, sir, what are the cases referred to, to show that the case of Mr. Randolph is not without a precedent? The cases of Mr. King, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Barlow: when Mr. King was, from sickness, rendered unable to discharge his duties as minister to England, he made that known to his Government, and asked to be recalled, not to go from kingdom to kingdom in pursuit of health, and at the same time draw his pay as our minister residing at the court of St. James. He was not sent to England clothed with the privilege of leaving the kingdom when he pleased, and residing where he pleased, and as long as he thought proper. He never did leave the kingdom, or the island of England, until he embarked for his native country: when he visited the watering places, it was at the time all the members of the English court were in the habit of doing it, and when, if he had remained at his post, no business could have been transacted touching the concerns of the two countries. This, sir, is the case of Rufus King, referred to, to justify the Government in its conduct towards Mr. Randolph. How close the resemblance—how striking the analogy! Sir, if Mr. Randolph had taken up his residence at Moscow, who could, and who would have complained? He might then have rendered his country all the service that could be rendered at St. Petersburg; but he has left the dominion of Russia—he has crossed kingdoms and seas to reach the place he has selected for his residence as our minister to the court of St. Petersburg. Mr. King's case can be compared to that of Mr. Vaughan's, the minister resident here, who passes his summers, or a part of them, at Long Branch, or Newport, Rhode Island. Mr. Brown never left the kingdom of France at any one time, nor Paris but once, and then, after he had made application to his Government to be recalled. Mr. Barlow, it is true, did leave Paris, but how did he leave it? in pursuit of health or pleasure? No, sir, in pursuit of the Emperor of the French nation, and in the discharge of the duties he was by his country deputed to discharge, and to accomplish objects at that time of primary importance to his country. He lost his life not in running from his duties, but in endeavoring to perform them. The case of John H. Pleasants has been referred to within the last six years, perhaps one hundred times: the sum of money received by him was small, compared with that which we are now required to vote to Mr. Randolph. The service required of Mr. Pleasants, it will be remembered, was performed, and the nature of it was such that it could be as well performed by one man as another. Not so in regard to the services expected of Mr. Randolph: Mr. Pleasants's pay ceased when his services were at an end; Mr. Randolph's services long since ceased, as the President of the United States has informed us; but, nevertheless, a year's salary is required. But Mr. Pleasants was a distinguished newspaper editor, and he was employed, as is said, to satisfy him for his political services: Mr. Randolph was the principal man, it has been said, who pulled down the last administration, and erected the present on its ruins; then he has been employed, and is to be paid for these services. I will not run the parallel further. But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the cases of Mr. King and Mr. Pleasants were in point: what did gentlemen think of them three years ago? and for what purpose were they then referred to? To show the extravagance of the then existing administration; and now, these same gentlemen, to justify the President and Mr. Randolph, refer to those very acts of the late administration by them condemned as illegal, unaccountable, and unjust! Let them reconcile these inconsistencies if they can; it appears to me that it is only a desperate case which requires such arguments or such references to support it. Compare a part of Mr. Monroe's claim with Mr. Randolph's requisition—that part which grew out of his detention in Europe after he was recalled, and before he could embark. Yet, but a few gentlemen from Virginia have voted to allow this venerable patriot any part of his claim, while all who have addressed the House seem to think that, because there is an objection to this appropriation, it is because Mr. Randolph is a citizen of Virginia. I do not believe that any man who is opposed to this appropriation has for a moment thought of the State to which Randolph belongs as a cause of, or inducement to, the opposition. Mr. Speaker, to show that the course taken would not be novel in England, I would refer the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to what took place, not many years ago, in the British Parliament. Mr. Canning had been on a mission to Lisbon; he was charged with receiving pay when his services had ceased. Did he set up the cry of persecution, in which his friends joined? No, sir; he boldly and fearlessly met the charge; he courted investigation, and his vindication was triumphant. No one was denounced for making the charge, nor will any one ever be, by men who are conscious of the rectitude of their conduct, and know they are shielded by justice.

I would now, Mr. Speaker, take leave of this question, and retire from this debate, having detained the House much longer than I could have wished, if I did not think myself under some obligation to pay my respects to, and notice a few of the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER,] who immediately preceded me. The hue and cry in the course of this debate has been, spare Mr. Randolph, for he is an absent man, and not here to vindicate himself; and, notwithstanding this appeal, the moment my colleague's seat is empty, the gentleman avails himself of that to say of him what I should not suppose he would volunteer to say if he were present. I can assure the gentleman from Virginia, that he is not absent for the reason he suggested; it is true, he knew, when the House adjourned yesterday, the gentleman from Virginia would be entitled to the floor to-day; but I assure the gentleman that no fears or apprehensions in consequence of that has kept him from the House. If he had been in his seat, I do not think that any thing the gentleman has said, or can say, would "discompose the gravity of his muscles, or disturb the tranquillity of his mind." Nothing but an anxiety on the part of my colleague to finish what he had to say in this debate, induced him to come to the House yesterday; he was then too much indisposed to leave, with common prudence, his room, and he is more so to-day. I am the person, if any one, who ought to regret my colleague's absence on this occasion. It has been said heretofore, sneeringly, that he had been a professor of rhetoric; I do not know but he is now one. With his aid, I might have been able to have understood the gentleman's figures of speech: single-handed, I have abandoned any attempt to do this in despair. Uncle Toby, Corporal Trim, Tristram Shandy, long noses, constructive journeys, mileage bill, ribaldry, and vipers gnawing files, "have danced through his periods in all the mazes of metaphysical confusion." Sir, I have been unable to follow the gentleman in this rhetorication, and the only reason is, I have not been able to understand him. The gentleman has given this House a parody of the reply of Pitt to Walpole, (certainly he did not intend it as original,) in order to describe the unequal struggle between an old man and a young man. I looked at the gentleman for a moment, not knowing but in him I might discover some traits of character similar to those which belonged to the illustrious statesman he seemed willing to personate; I discovered but few, but about as many as he will be able to find in the character or life of my colleague, resembling those which distinguished Sir Robert Walpole.

The gentleman from Virginia has not been able, with all his researches, to find the speech of Mr. Randolph, a part of which was read by my colleague, and in which the whole of the present dynasty of Russia are characterized by Mr. Randolph for four generations, in his happiest and best style. I will refer the gentleman to the second volume of Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, and inform him, that, if he will call on either of those gentlemen, he will learn that the manuscript came to them in Mr. Randolph's autograph, with all his touches and retouches upon it. This was not a speech which Mr. Randolph never made; not one published by his enemies, to hold him up to scorn. Mr. Randolph will not deny its authenticity, or thank the gentleman for calling it in question. With this speech published to the world, and a copy of it in the hands of the Emperor Nicholas in less than four months after it was pronounced, was Mr. Randolph the man who ought to have been selected for this mission? Grant that it belonged to some able or distinguished son of Virginia, could no one be found but Mr. Randolph? Sir, within the angle of my eye methinks I see one, more than one, at this moment, who would have discharged the duties of minister abroad, and to this court, with more credit to himself, and more to the satisfaction of the country, than Mr. Randolph. In every point of view it was an unfortunate appointment, both to the country and the individual. The gentleman from Virginia, who last addressed the House, informs us, that, when Mr. Randolph asked of the Emperor leave of absence, it was readily granted. I believe every word of this, for I have no doubt he had rather Mr. Randolph should reside in England than any part of Russia. But is such a residence compatible with our views, or the most conducive to our interests? Mr. Randolph is the minister of the United States, and not the Emperor of Russia's.

But, says the gentleman, this is not the time to express our disapprobation of this appointment; it ought to have been done when Mr. Randolph's name was sent to the Senate; his nomination was ratified without a division of that body. Neither the Senate nor the House then knew the nature of the appointment. Mr. Randolph was nominated minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. Petersburg, and, as such, his nomination was confirmed; but who then knew, or before the commencement of this session, of his discretionary privilege to remain in England? and who, before this bill was called up, could express any opinion in regard to the appointment? Sir, this appropriation is not opposed because Mr. Randolph is a Virginian: you know that, not many days ago, I did justice to Virginia, and said what I believed to be true of her illustrious and distinguished men. It is my attachment to these men that would induce me, if any thing could, to speak unfavorably of Mr. Randolph; for, what one of your Presidents has he not denounced, with the exception of Washington? I would refer gentlemen to his letter to James Lloyd, written during the late war, for a confirmation of what I assert. I could refer them to another fact, not yet alluded to, but well known to you. Mr. Jefferson's son-in-law, Mr. Eppes, during the administration of Mr. Madison, went into the gentleman's own district, and by his constituents was returned a member of Congress, for the express purpose of depriving Mr. Randolph of a seat here. Yet his fame is written every where, and the world is filled with his glory! This is news indeed. I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to his toast, sent two years ago to the dinner given in honor of Mr. Jefferson's birthday. "The principles of Mr. Jefferson before he was in office, and the principles which brought him into office." Are these the sentiments of one who approved of, and supported the administration of Thomas Jefferson? I think not.

Sir, pass this appropriation, and unless Mr. Randolph has become divested of that purity of conduct, and incorruptibility, for which some of his friends have said he has been rendered more conspicuous than any other man, our labor will be in vain—not a cent of it can he touch.

Mr. P. concluded by moving an amendment, (which Mr. STANBURY accepted in lieu of his motion to strike out,) viz. to add to the appropriation the following proviso:

"Provided, That the time which any minister shall absent himself from the country to which he is appointed, after having been received by the Government thereof, shall be deducted in computing his salary, or yearly compensation."

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, said, as no man, in or out of the House, had any the least doubt about the issue of this debate, further argument upon it would be both idle and ridiculous. But I have feelings, sir, said Mr. B., which, in my situation here, it were almost criminal wholly to suppress. I should be sorry, however, if any one should deem me capable of entertaining a thought, for one moment, that the well-earned fame of our minister to Russia could in aught be affected by any thing that has come, or can come, from the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNES,] or needs any thing I could say in defence. Sir, that fame and character stands on a proud eminence, far above the reach of such a dagger as malice wears; it needs no shield that I could interpose. But, sir, the grounds on which the exhibition of the gentleman was made, deserve to be adverted to.

In the course of this discussion, he asked more than once, as did his colleague, [Mr. PEARCE,] what Mr. Randolph had done. What were the great services referred to by the message? The question has been before and better answered; but I too will give the answer; because it at the same time lays bare the reason why (now that Mr. Randolph is beyond the sea) we have been compelled to bear the vituperation we have heard. Mr. Randolph's services, sir, among others, are these: from his youth up to this time, he has lent the whole force of his mighty mind to the defence, the protection of the rights and liberty of the citizen, and the principles of the constitution, against the encroachments of power and the more dangerous combinations of interest; whether their movements were made under cover of protection, or in any other manner. In this, the noblest aim of the greatest mind, he was again and again successful. In that success, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Rhode Island, and others of his faith, met their defeat. Thus, by the exertion of his splendid talents in the same course of action, Mr. Randolph at the same time won the highest esteem, the warmest love and gratitude of those whom he so long and so ably represented here, placed himself on the ground of eminence and esteem which he now occupies in the minds and hearts of all good men and true, who are liberty's friends, and earned the everlasting hate of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. B.] and others his associates in principle and policy, and therefore we hear such now.

I would now, sir, proceed to remark upon some parts of the gentleman's speech; but, in the rules by which freedom of debate is secured, and decorum required, there are some things which I do not so precisely comprehend. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMERLENGE] alluded the other day (hypothetically) to a perjured Senator—he was declared out of order. But, if on this floor a member reads a speech made in the Senate, and proclaims that such speech could be made by no gentleman, he is in order. [Here the SPEAKER interposed, and said "that if the Senator who made the speech was still a member of that body, the matter stated would not be in order."] Mr. BOULDIN said that the distinction, though nice, exists, and proceeded.

Yet, sir, were I, or any member of this House, to say that between the supposed critic and the habits, feelings, and manners of a gentleman, there existed a non-conductor, through which he could in no wise pass—it would not be in order. [The SPEAKER again interposed, and said, "the gentleman from Virginia has been in no manner alluded to during this debate; that, between the gentleman from Rhode Island and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. C.] some irregularity had crept in unobserved, and was afterwards of necessity allowed, in some measure, to be extended; but it shall go no further. The last remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, if applied to a member of this House, would not be in order, and he will not be allowed to proceed in that manner."] Mr. B. continued:—I did not make the assertion contained in the hypothetical case stated; nor intend otherwise to make it, than to contrast the effects of the rule on cases too much alike for me to see readily the difference. I did intend to remark on a few other particulars in the gentleman's speech; but, sir, as I confessed at first, that, for the decision of the matter in debate, argument is worse than useless, and any defence of Mr. Randolph being a work of supererogation, and as I could not remark freely and truly upon the particulars I have in mind, within the rules of the House, I will proceed no further, but conclude by remarking only, that it would not gratify my feelings to show simply that between the pictures drawn and the original there is no likeness to be seen, even by the painter himself, when I should be precluded from animadversion on the painter by the rules of the House.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, then expressed his regret that this debate had proceeded thus far, and demanded the previous question—Seconded—yeas 85, nays 77.

Mr. STANBURY demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question, and they were ordered.

Mr. C. P. WHITE moved a call of the House, which was not sustained.

The question was then put, "Shall the main question be now put?" and decided in the negative—yeas 73, nays 100.

This vote having the effect to remove the question of the engrossment of the bill from before the House for to-day,

Mr. DWIGHT moved to reconsider this vote, in order that the bill might be disposed of to-day.

The House agreed to reconsider the vote.

Mr. BLAIR then, with the consent of the House, withdrew his demand for the previous question.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, inquired of Mr. ARCHER as to the authority on which he had made certain statements, at the commencement of this debate, as to the condition and character of our negotiations with Russia, and the effect of Mr. Randolph's absence.

Mr. ARCHER declined making any disclosure on the subject of his authority. He stated that it would be improper to do so, as this negotiation is in its inception. He expressed his conviction that he should have the concurrence of the gentleman from New York, if that gentleman was in possession of the same knowledge.

Mr. STORRS said very likely it might be so, but he was without that necessary knowledge.

Mr. CARSON then rose, and said, the part which I shall act in this political drama, (or farce, if gentlemen choose so to call it,) will be but an humble one. My part shall be, sir, to defend, with my feeble abilities, a very humble individual in his own estimation, but one highly exalted in the hearts of his countrymen; an individual, sir, whose highest ambition is, to be permitted to walk in the peaceful shades of retirement, and pursue domestic ease; an individual who has never sought office, but who, like old Cincinnatus, when the exigencies of his country have demanded his services, has never refused the call, whether it be to the field or to the cabinet. That individual, sir, is Andrew Jackson, whose name has been introduced into this debate, but to be reviled and slandered. The other illustrious personages, whose names have been introduced, (Mr. Randolph and Mr. Van Buren,) have already been amply defended by their respective friends; they need nothing at my hands; it would be superfluous to offer it. To observe something like method in the course of my remarks, I must commence at the beginning, however much may be left out on the way.

It appears, sir, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANBURY] was the pioneer sent ahead to clear away the rubbish, and prepare the field for action. The first valorous knight which entered the list on their side, was the renowned champion of domestic manufactures, [Mr. MALLARY.] His onset, sir, was a bold one, and he lashed away with such fury, that it reminded me of Hudibras's bear, who

"Fighting fell, and falling fought,
And being down he laid about."

The gentleman, sir, marched up into the very teeth of the great Autocrat of all the Russias, boldly demanding his country's rights with threatening countenance and menacing gesticulation, and then told us, "that was the way our ministers should do." Now, sir, if this is the very way that ministers should do, why, they must be selected hereafter, not for their diplomatic, but for their physical abilities. The order of things must be changed; and, instead of selecting ministers for their intellectual and moral worth, athletic powers must be the standard by which we are to judge of men suited for foreign missions.

Sir, when the party to which that gentleman belongs comes into power, (which I trust never will be,) it may probably suit their notions of propriety to practise upon this theory; but I hope, sir, for the credit of my country, that powers of mind, instead of body, will be looked to in the selection of men to fill high and important stations. In dismissing the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MALLARY,] I will only add, that, while his friends may praise his courage, few will be found to compliment his discretion. The next gentleman to whom notice is due, is the learned member from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS.] In the course of his remarks the other day, he invoked us younger members to recollect that respect due to "bald heads and grey hairs." I trust, sir, in what I may deem it my duty to say upon this occasion, or any other, I shall never be found wanting in that reverence always due to locks upon which age and experience have set their venerable signets. But, sir, if aged men see fit to enter the list, "and run a muck" against all the younger ones in the House, while chivalry might forbid the return of the arrows, self-defence may demand that we ward them off, whether pointed fair, or tipped with poison.

The gentleman set out by saying "that the present is, I believe, no unusual discussion. In the short term of my service in this hall, I have witnessed sitting after sitting of a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where the quantum of salary, compared with the service of foreign ministers, was the subject of most stirring debate. When has the competency of this House to move such a debate been questioned? Never, until the present sitting of the committee. If I am mistaken, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to tell me when that question was made by the friends of the last administration." Now, sir, I will answer the gentleman's interrogatories, and tell him when, and by whom, "the competency of this House" was questioned, and also show him it was "by the friends of the last administration."

Sir, during the discussion upon the far-famed but abortive Panama mission, a similar question arose upon the bill making the appropriations for that mission, or upon the report made by the Committee on Commerce, &c. Mr. Webster, the great leader of the then administration party in the House, made the question, and the gentleman from Rhode Island implicitly followed his lead. I beg leave to read from Mr. W.'s speech, delivered 14th April, 1826. (Gales and Seaton's Debates, pages 22, 55, &c. vol. 2d, part 2d.)

"Such appointments, says Mr. Webster, (foreign ministers,) is therefore a clear and unquestionable exercise of Executive power. It is, indeed, less connected with the appropriate duties of the House than almost any other Executive act; because the office of a public minister is not created by any statute or law of our own Government: it exists under the law of nations, and is recognised as existing by our constitution. The acts of Congress, indeed, limit the salaries of public ministers, but they do no more. Every thing else in regard to the appointment of public ministers, their numbers, the time of their appointment, and the negotiations contemplated in such appointments, is matter for 'Executive discretion.'" Again, he says, "he (the President) cannot shift the responsibility from himself, and we cannot assume it. Such a course, sir, would confound all that is distinct in the constitutional assignment of our respective functions. It would break down all known divisions of power, and put an end to all just responsibility." In short, sir, without tiring your patience with reading all the passages I have marked, Mr.

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

Webster's speech throughout is an effort to prove that we were constitutionally bound to appropriate the salaries of public ministers; that we had nothing to do with the establishment of missions, nor with the appointment of ministers, nor with their instructions. Thus, sir, I have shown the gentleman from Rhode Island "where the competency of this House to move such a debate was questioned;" and that "it was by the friends of the last administration." That is not all, sir; for he, too, sustained the doctrine throughout then, (however obnoxious it may appear now,) by his vote, and by his aid to that mission, in every stage, and through all its ramifications.

Sir, how much more appropriate would the arguments of the learned gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) have been to the question at present before us? Their force and reasoning, if it applied to the establishment of the mission to Panama, how much more eminently does it apply in this case? The present is a mission of long standing. Those acquainted with the diplomatic history of the country will recollect that it originated with Mr. Jefferson. He nominated Mr. Short, who was rejected by the Senate. Mr. J. Q. Adams was subsequently nominated by Mr. Madison, and was our first minister at the court of St. Petersburg, and a diplomatic intercourse has been kept up ever since between the two Governments. But it has been this ordinary kind of intercourse recognised by the laws of nations, and practised on by the civilized world.

Not so, sir, with the Panama mission. Although the friends of that measure labored hard to confound it with the usual diplomatic relations between friendly Powers; and although the persons nominated were denominated "ministers," yet they were the representatives of this nation sent to a "Congress of nations," which was by previous conventional arrangement, by treaties signed and ratified, to convene at the isthmus of Panama; and the topics for consideration and adjustment were all arranged and specifically set forth by the South American republics, in the treaties before alluded to. Our ministers then (more properly representatives, and deputies they were called in South America) would have necessarily been compelled to take part in those subjects; and, by taking part, it was feared by many of us that we might be committed, as a nation, to enter into any arrangement which a majority of those nations might have decided on. Therefore, the representatives of the people here had a right—nay, it was their bounden duty—to stay, if they could, a project so novel, so dangerous, and fraught with unknown consequences.

Yet the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS,] with a knowledge of all those facts, swallowed down that mission, appropriations and all, which cost the Government near a hundred thousand dollars, but now has become so fastidious with regard to the "people's rights," &c., that the regular salary allowed by law to our foreign ministers completely chokes him. Sir, I cannot say that this is "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel;" but I do think it is swallowing a camel and then straining at a gnat. Sir, why is all this? Is it because Mr. Adams recommended the one, and General Jackson the other? If so, let me read another paragraph or two from the speech of Mr. Webster, which, no doubt, that gentleman considers high authority:

"The confidence which is due from us to the Executive, and from the Executive to us, is not personal, but official and constitutional, says Mr. W. It has nothing to do with individual likings or dislikings, but results from that division of power among departments, and those limitations on the authority of each, which belong to the nature and frame of our Government."

Sir, has the course of the gentleman from Rhode Island been influenced by "individual likings or dislikings?" But a little further, sir:

"It would be unfortunate, indeed, continues Mr. W., if our line of constitutional action were to vibrate backward and forward, according to our opinions of persons, swerving this way to-day, from undue attachment, and the other way to-morrow, from distrust or dislike. This may sometimes happen from the weakness of our virtues, or the excitement of our passions, but I trust it will not be coolly recommended to us as the rightful course of public conduct."

"The weakness of our virtues, or the excitement of our passions." Sir, upon which horn of the dilemma does the gentleman hang? Is it the result of weak virtue? or would it not be more charitable to suppose that "excited passion" had caused this extraordinary change? However, sir, with his virtues or his passions I have nothing to do—but yet I have not done with the gentleman.

Sir, let us run out the gentleman's doctrine, and see where it would necessarily carry him. "We," said he, "are the keepers of the people's money; we should keep a watchful eye over their interests, and should only pay for services actually rendered." "How long," asked the gentleman, "was Mr. Randolph at St. Petersburg? Pay him for that time—in justice he can demand no more."

Now, sir, if we adopt this as the rule of our action to graduate the pay according to services actually rendered, the rule must operate upon every officer of the Government. We cannot pay the judges of the Supreme Court until we inquire whether they have discharged all the duties assigned to them. If our venerable Chief Justice should be sick, or prevented arriving here to sit upon the Supreme Court Bench, by such a snow storm as we have just witnessed, why, the gentleman's doctrine is, to withhold his salary. The President, the heads of departments, nay, sir, our Senators and Representatives in Congress, we ourselves, must apply the rule to ourselves, and make it operate here too. What has been the situation of the gentleman himself during the present session? He was unable to attend to his duties here, by sickness, for some time. The people of Rhode Island elected him, not to be sick, but to attend to their interests on this floor. The gentleman has not done it; and why? Because his health would not permit him. And can any man here be so devoid of self-respect, so lost to every feeling and principle of a gentleman, as to move, in his place, "that, in the settlement of the accounts of Mr. BURGESS, he should not be allowed pay for those days he failed to attend the House on account of sickness?" Would not such a motion, sir, disgrace any man?

But, says the gentleman, Mr. Randolph was not fit—was by no means a suitable person to fill the mission, and the President ought not to have selected him, &c.; and, therefore, he should not be paid. The answer to this is, sir, that that is a mere matter of opinion; and the opinion which the American people, which Europe and posterity will entertain of Mr. Randolph as a gentleman, a statesman, and an orator, will be perfectly uninfluenced by any thing said, or to be said, in this House, by all that family of orators who select their moment for attack when he is three thousand miles off. It is matter of opinion, and it may be of jaundiced opinion. As well might I say the gentleman from Rhode Island was not fit for a representative in Congress, and that the good people of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations did themselves wrong to elect him, and, therefore, he should not be paid. But what would the answer be? "You, sir, have no right to think any thing about it; the constitution has given us the right to judge of that matter, and we will elect whom we please. The responsibility rests on us, not on you." This would be the response of the people of Rhode Island; and it would be the true response. It is also equally true, that the constitution has placed the appointing power in the hands of the President and the Senate, and from them we cannot take it if we would. It is no argument to say that they have not done their duty, or have acted improperly in the discharge of their duty, because they are not accountable to us; for, like ourselves, they are the agents of the people, and responsible alone to them; and should they violate the high trust committed to them, (as in the case of the last administration,) the people will remedy the evil. Sir, the propositions of the gentleman are so absurd, and so palpably untenable, as to almost require an apology for any argument designed to refute them; for they stand refuted on their very face. The object of the discussion, sir, cannot be mistaken. It is vainly hoped that, by this course of abuse and vituperation, they will get up a popular excitement against General Jackson; and they have pounced upon the appointment of Mr. Randolph, because he is unfortunately sick in a distant land, and they wish to hold the President responsible for the misfortunes of Mr. Randolph, because, say they, his health had been bad for a series of years, &c.

Minister to Russia.

Now, sir, if the notions of the friend and partisan of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. MALLARY] are to be adopted, and men selected for their proximity in strength to the horse or the ox, then I grant you that the President was wrong. It would have been better, sir, to have taken some Green Mountain Vermonter, a sheriff of Vermont, or a Rhode Island whaler, who could have harpooned a king, or the "great Autocrat of all the Russias himself," and bring him to. But, sir, if political virtue, political information, political integrity, sagacious mind, towering and unequalled intellect, with rich stores of learning, such as no other man is heir to, of great moral worth, and high chivalry of feeling; in short, if the possession of every attribute which dignifies and ennobles men, should be the distinguishing characteristics by which we are to judge of men's fitness for such elevated stations, then I ask, sir, where was that individual to be found more eminently qualified than John Randolph, of Roanoke? Not on this continent, sir, and Andrew Jackson knew it, and the unanimous voice of the Senate approved the selection.

But let us pursue the gentleman's speech a little further: To show the great impropriety of Mr. Randolph's leaving the "royal city of St. Petersburg," the gentleman has found it necessary to state to this House, that "our relations with Russia have hitherto been cherished and sustained by a minister plenipotentiary residing near that court. At that court, in the royal city of St. Petersburg, and within the political and social circle of the Emperor himself, the high dignitaries of his Government, and the diplomatic envoys of all the nations of Europe, and many of those of Asia." The gentleman was not satisfied with the diplomatic term "near," but emphatically says, "at" the court, within the royal city of St. Petersburg, &c.

The frailties, Mr. Speaker, incident to poor humanity, (of which I feel that I have my full share,) are frequently pled in bar of errors committed when no better excuse can be offered. This may be pled, sir, by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS,] for that part of his speech which I have just read, when I have shown him from authority which he cannot doubt, which he dare not doubt, that that statement had no foundation in fact, and that the gentleman knew it.

Now, sir, for the authority. I beg leave to read you from a speech delivered in the House of Representatives by a member from Rhode Island, on the 15th February, 1827, Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates, vol. 3, page 1197, in favor of allowing Mr. Poinsett, our then minister at Mexico, an outfit of $9,000 for travelling a distance of nine miles, from the city of Mexico to Tacubaya. This was the immediate subject under discussion, but the diplomatic expenditures of the Government had been investigated, and Mr. Adams had been placed in bold relief, as having received different outfits in the same year, while he was receiving an annual salary of $9,000, and also charged for constructive journeys which he had never travelled. It was in defence of those outfits, salaries, and constructive journeys, which the member alluded to was speaking; and that member was no other than the honorable gentleman himself, [Mr. BURGESS,] who appears so horror struck at the idea of our minister at the court of St. Petersburg living for one day out of that "royal city." What does he say in defence of Mr. Adams, or rather as an excuse for the large amount of money which Mr. A. received in one year? "Let it be remembered, said Mr. BURGESS, (I will not read all, sir,) that Mr. Adams continued to be minister to Russia, and to discharge the duties of that station the whole time of his mission to Ghent, to form a treaty of peace with Great Britain. His mission to Russia continued after the conclusion of the treaty of Ghent," &c.

I ask you now, sir, to look at his speech in defence of Mr. Adams, and his exorbitant charges for his services, and his speech charging Mr. Randolph with the high crime of sickness, which he says should prevent Mr. Randolph from charging the Government with his salary, already fixed and regulated by law. To bring the charge home upon Mr. R., he found it necessary to state, in his place upon this floor, and upon his responsibility as a member, "that, hitherto, our relations with Russia had been cherished and sustained by a minister residing at the court, within the royal city," &c. &c. Yet, to acquit Mr. Adams, his statements are precisely the reverse. Mr. Adams, he says, while upon the peace mission at Ghent, continued to discharge the duties of minister to Russia. Sir, look at the two cases. While the whole continent of Europe was convulsed with war, while the mighty genius of Napoleon was holding the crowned heads of that hemisphere at bay, while the dearest interests of our country were at stake, and rested, in a great degree, upon the energy of our ministers at Ghent, and upon a faithful discharge of their duties, and when all the faculties of their minds must have been devoted to the treaty of peace, then under consideration; yet, under all these circumstances, Mr. Adams "was able, and did, says the gentleman, continue to discharge the duties of minister to Russia." Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if, under all those circumstances, Mr. Adams could discharge the duties of that station; whether it is not much more fair to presume that Mr. Randolph (although unwell, and at London) can "continue to discharge the duties of minister to Russia?" The conclusion is irresistible; and I might here pause to ask, sir, how the gentleman could possibly shield himself from this gross, this palpable inconsistency. Perhaps, sir, behind the ramparts of a "bald head and grey locks." Be it so. Is any one here ignorant that Mr. R., with that elevation of character which has always distinguished him, left the United States without an outfit, refusing to receive any thing which was not regularly and specifically appropriated to his compensation, and that he is actually in Europe on his own resources? This single fact, so characteristic of that gentleman, stands as a set-off to this whole debate, the only reference to which, in time to come, will be for the sake of this great fact, which his friends could not otherwise have placed in that full view before the American people, which its disinterestedness, and sacred regard to specific appropriations, so richly deserves.

The gentleman from Rhode Island has also taken it upon himself to state that the last annual message of the President "was the production of cabinet ministers, and that no member of this House could, without hazard of his reputation, say that he believed the President composed one sentence of it." Will he say, also, that he did not fight his own battles? that his victories were gained, not by him, but by others for him? The gentleman, no doubt, Mr. Speaker, considers himself very high authority in cases of this kind; but, sir, hazardous as it may appear to the gentleman, I here take the liberty of saying that I believe not only one, but every sentence of the message was composed by Andrew Jackson. I mean by that, sir, that all the great and leading principles contained in that document were the suggestions of the President's own mind. There is no doubt that his cabinet ministers were consulted; and in any thing which it became necessary to say, which had immediate connexion with either of their departments, the head of that department would, of course, be consulted, and their views and wishes attended to, and treated with the deference and respect due to them. This he might do, and be as much the author of his message as of his victories. But what has this to do with the question before us? Nothing, sir. And it only proves the design of getting up this debate. It was not, sir, to prevent the appropriation of the money, but to get an opportunity of letting off some of their yellow bile upon the administration; hoping, perhaps, to get up a popular excitement which would injure the President in his next election. And the modus operandi of the gentleman is, to plunder from General Jackson his hard-earned fame; to steal from him the civic honors he is winning for himself, and with those honors to deck the brow of Mr. Van Buren. And, to do this, he turns tail on himself, and contradicts all the doctrines of the Panama and Tacubaya school. Yes, sir, while he denounces the Secretary of State as a Machiavel, he makes him the author of all the President's messages, and particularly his last, which has been pronounced by the American people to be one of the most able State papers delivered to Congress since the commencement of the Government. But that may be the reason of the attack on the message. The people like it; therefore some hate it.

But, sir, the purity and integrity of Gen. Jackson's character is so well known and established with the American people, that the gentleman is aware he is invulnerable in that part; and the greatest effort of the gentleman has been to make him a fool, an automaton in the hands of a "Machiavelian" politician, who moves him at will. Sir, I do not hesitate to pronounce that more injustice has been done to General Jackson, with regard to the dictation of his various communications to Congress, than to any great man that our country has produced; and it is the result of two causes, operating with equal force, to blast the fame of that noble, generous, good, and great man. One of those causes results from the course pursued by the Adams and Clay party during the last Presidential election. The abuse and slanders poured forth against him by his enemies, will be recollected by all. Nothing that villany could suggest, or baseness execute, but what was said and done to ruin the standing and character of General Jackson. He could neither read, write, nor spell, said the party; and although so many proofs have been given of his superior intellect and learning, yet it would not do for the gentleman from Rhode Island to recognise it as the production of General Jackson; for that would be giving the lie direct to his party, and to what he has, no doubt, said himself. Therefore, it is, that they will allow nothing to General Jackson which is his.

The other cause I alluded to is, that certain of the friends, or pretended friends, of General Jackson, are looking forward to their own elevation, and will willingly take all the credit of General Jackson's acts, and of his administration, if it will aid their future prospects. His fame or himself are nothing to them, unless they can be advanced by him or his fame. And thus, sir, is this great man, honest himself, confiding in his nature, about to be destroyed by those causes operating in conjunction. His character, sir, is the property of this nation, sacred to the American people, and "must be preserved."

The gentleman from Rhode Island amused me by a discovery which he has made, and which has only been excelled by an "invention" which he charges Mr. Van Buren with having made. The part of the message relating to the mission to Russia, the gentleman says, is a "fabric wrought in the State Department, and that Mr. Van Buren had invented that mission to suit the talents, &c. of John Randolph."

Sir, since the inventive genius of man first developed itself—since the days in which the mighty genius of the great Grecian poet invented the machinery of poets, and brought gods in alliance with mortals—never has such an invention as this of Mr. Van Buren's been heard of.

What, sir! invented a mission that had been invented more than twenty years ago, and, in accordance with the original invention, diplomatic intercourse regularly kept up between the Governments ever since! Well may this be called the age of mechanics, when such inventions as these are brought forth. If Archimedes had had whereon to set his fulcrum, he could not have surpassed this invention of the Secretary of State: and if Mr. Van Buren could only get a model of his own invention, and deposite it, according to our patent laws, in the Patent Office, he would certainly be entitled to a patent right for the most novel and extraordinary invention ever heard of by man. Sir, I shall push on now to a duty, which is a painful one, but one made necessary by the course and object of this debate. I remarked before, sir, that it was impossible to disguise the aim and object of the opposition, who have provoked this unnecessary and unexpected discussion. It is, sir, to induce the people to believe that General Jackson and his friends are regardless of their rights, and recklessly squandering their money; and they have taken occasion to remark upon expenditures of the last administration, which were denounced as highly improper by the republican party then in Congress, whose objections have been subsequently sustained by the American people. Sir, as the people, in their high elective capacity, had pronounced judgment upon the last administration, and consigned the men then in power to the shades of retirement, I think it would have been better for their friends to have suffered them and their acts to have remained undisturbed. But, sir, as they have challenged a parallel case to this of Mr. Randolph, I will show it them.

I commence, sir, by naming the much-talked-of and far-famed, but abortive, Panama mission, which cost the Government something like one hundred thousand dollars. The particulars and merits of that mission it is not now necessary to mention or discuss. But there were some circumstances connected with the movements of one of the ministers and the secretary of legation, which I deem it proper to bring to the recollection of gentlemen who supported that mission, but who deem the appointment and movements of Mr. Randolph so reprehensible.

The nominations of Mr. Anderson, Mr. Sergeant, and Mr. Rochester, were confirmed by the Senate on the 15th March, 1826. Mr. Anderson, who was our then minister at Bogota, left that place, under his new orders, for Panama, and had to wait till he died in the pestilential swamp of Carthagena, while his colleagues were electioneering in the United States. He was, nevertheless, paid, or his representatives were paid, an outfit of $9,000: (I have the authority of the gentleman from Rhode Island for saying so;) and he stated it in his speech made in favor of Mr. Poinsett's receiving another outfit, who was appointed the successor to Mr. Anderson. It will be recollected, sir, that the Congress of nations adjourned from Panama to meet at Tacubaya, a place about nine miles distant from the city of Mexico, where Mr. Poinsett then was, as our minister, and the gentleman [Mr. Burges] advocated his receiving an outfit of $9,000 for travelling that distance, while he was receiving his salary of $9,000 per annum, and which he never travelled; for the vagrant Congress was never found, nor ever sat in any town, village, or parish, whatever.

It was not thought expedient by Mr. Adams and Mr.

FEB. 8, 1831.]

Minister to Russia.

[H. OF R.]

Clay, to order Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Rochester to repair to Panama, as originally designed, but kept them at home for other purposes. The distinguished gentleman who occupies this chair (pointing to the seat of Judge Hemphill, of Philadelphia) resigned his seat on this floor after the close of the first session of the nineteenth Congress. A successor, of course, had to be elected. The administration, as was their custom, started a candidate, and Mr. Sergeant was the man. The gubernatorial election came on in the same year in the great State of New York, and Mr. Rochester was started there.

Thus, we see, sir, that those two gentlemen, who had been nominated and ratified by the Senate as minister and secretary of legation to Panama, were kept at home, and were the administration candidates before the people, while Mr. Anderson was exposed to yellow fever and black vomit, in Carthagena, where he had been recklessly ordered, and cruelly left to die!

But what is the most extraordinary of all this novel proceeding is, that Mr. Rochester should have been paid his salary as secretary of legation to Panama, while he remained at home, canvassing for the office of Governor, against that truly great and lamented man, De Witt Clinton. I say truly great, sir, for if we were now asked to point out his equal, whither should we turn our eyes to find him?

But there is another fact connected with this transaction, not very reputable to Mr. Clay, to be sure, but one which I shall here notice. When it was discovered that Mr. Clay had paid Mr. Rochester his salary, not for attending the legation at Panama, but for running against Mr. Clinton in New York, a certain committee of this House thought it their duty to inquire of Mr. Clay the reasons why he paid Mr. Rochester. And if reasons had been as plenty as blackberries, Mr. Clay would have done much better not to have given one; but a reason was called for, and a reason was given. What was it, sir? Why, it was, said Mr. C., that Mr. Rochester resigned a high judicial office, (judge of the circuit,) for the purpose of accepting the appointment conferred on him by the Government, and that he waited the orders of the Government to sail, &c.; but as the Government did not think proper to order him to Panama, it was no fault of Mr. R.'s; and as he had been deprived of his salary as judge, Mr. Clay thought it but fair that he should be paid his salary as secretary. Sir, I quote from memory, and therefore do not pretend to give the precise words of Mr. Clay, but I give the substance. His letter, however, is on record, and, if he is misrepresented, his friends can correct me.

But, sir, the fact turned out to be, that Mr. Rochester had resigned his judgeship some months before the appointment had been conferred on him, and in his letter of resignation says expressly, that his bad health compelled him to resign, and that he was unable to discharge the duties of his office. Yet, Mr. Clay said, he resigned his judicial station to accept the office conferred by the Government, when the fact was, that he had resigned months before, because he was unable to discharge the duties of judge. Sir, those are facts which cannot be denied: I leave the comment to others.

To conclude, with regard to those gentlemen, sir, they were both beaten; and shortly after their defeat they set sail in the United States' ship Hornet, to find this celebrated Congress of nations, which they never did find, and which I predicted would be the case, in a speech made upon this floor during the last session of the nineteenth Congress; and that emboldens me, sir, to make another prediction for the satisfaction of those who vainly hope, by such efforts as these, to break down the present administration, and that is, sir, if it should please God to permit Andrew Jackson to live, the people of the United States will re-elect him to the Presidency, and gentlemen may make their calculations accordingly.

The secret mission of the late Mr. Cook to the island of Cuba was remarked upon by the gentleman from Rhode Island, but for what purpose, I am unable to see. It certainly could not be to benefit Mr. Clay; for that was an act of the last administration, which could not be defended, unless it was upon the ground that something was due and probably promised to Mr. Cook for having given the vote of Illinois to Mr. Adams; and that that secret and furtive mission was given in discharge of the obligation. And though this may be a very satisfactory reason to the gentleman from Rhode Island, I doubt whether it would be so to the American people. Certain it is, Mr. Cook got the money; certain it is, he went home, via the Havana, scarcely touching there, and was in Illinois in May, having left New York in April.

The other member from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] brought up the subject of J. H. Pleasants, and places Mr. Randolph's return to London as a complete set-off to that transaction. In the first place, sir, I have never been satisfied that the special agency of Mr. P. was necessary as bearer of despatches to Buenos Ayres. But, if the importance of the despatches demanded such agency, Mr. P. is said not to have performed his duty, and, therefore, ought not to be paid. Mr. Randolph certainly did arrive at St. Petersburg, and we know not how much business he may have performed, or how important that business was to the interests of this country; time will no doubt develop all. But Mr. Pleasants never did arrive at Buenos Ayres, but gave the despatches with which he was charged, to a sea captain, who, I have understood, delivered them; and he, Mr. Pleasants, went to England, and was paid for it. That is briefly, I believe, sir, the amount of that matter.

When Mr. King left London, he left his son, who was his secretary, in charge of the business of this Government, for which Mr. Adams paid him an outfit of four thousand five hundred dollars, in direct violation of the law regulating the salaries and outfits of our foreign ministers, and also paid him the salary of a chargé des affaires for the time he remained after the departure of his father. But the worst is, that some of the rascally democrats have had the impudence to say that this outfit to Mr. King, and the nineteen hundred dollars to Mr. Pleasants, were given to secure the influence of two presses, &c. But those subjects, Mr. Speaker, have been sufficiently discussed heretofore, and I pass them by.

I have, said, sir, that I have believed that General Jackson was the author of his messages, and that his cabinet ministers were only consulted with regard to matters immediately connected with their respective departments. Sir, I will venture to say further, that, when the time arrives, which I have no doubt will arrive, that all the important political writings of Andrew Jackson will be published, his messages, originally written by himself, and in his own handwriting, will be pronounced by the American people better than those which have undergone a cabinet scrutiny, where any suggestions of his cabinet ministers have been substituted in place of the original.

I say this, sir, because we have abundant evidences of the energy and superiority of his writings, in those productions which are indisputable. He has written in the wilderness, without the aid of books or counsellors; he has written from the field of battle, where the paper bore the impress of a hand darkened by the smoke from his cannon and small arms. In some instances, however, he may have omitted to cross a "t or dot an i," which would, no doubt, shock the grammatical correctness of the gentleman from Rhode Island, but the honest yeomanry of the country know him, know his services and his worth, and will sustain him.

In conclusion, sir, I will ask leave to refer to one or two cases where ministers have heretofore left courts to which they were sent. Mr. Jefferson left Paris during his residence there as our minister, and made a tour of France, or a considerable part of it; his travel was induced by an injury received in one of his visits; his absence was from February till June.

H. of R.]

Minister to Russia.

The late Governor Eustis, of Massachusetts, spent the last winter of his mission to Holland in a small island in the South of France, (the island of Hieres, in the Mediterranean.) This he did on account of his ill health, and was no doubt permitted to do so by the Government.—Mr. Adams was our then Secretary of State, and must have given the permission; but no reduction of his pay was asked for. There are many other instances, sir, but I believe they have been generally referred to by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. Sir, I have, perhaps, trespassed longer than I should have done, and, with these remarks, will submit the question.

Mr. STANBERRY next rose. Before the vote shall be taken on the question now pending, said Mr. S., I wish to say a few words in answer to the charges made against me for bringing this business to the notice of the House. I made the motion for striking out the salary for the Russian minister, without previous concert or consultation with any of the political parties into which this House is divided. I acted on my own responsibility as a member of this House—as an unconnected individual, who has nothing to hope or fear, either from the present administration, or from any administration which may succeed it.

The facts which I stated as the foundation of the motion, have not been contradicted or denied. Mr. Randolph was appointed our minister to Russia, and, before he accepted the appointment, the Secretary of State stipulated with him that he should not be compelled to discharge the duties of the appointment. Mr. Randolph, after spending a few days at St. Petersburg, left the Russian empire, and is now either in England, France, or Italy, attending to his own business, or following his own amusements, and in a situation where it is impossible for him to attend to the duties of his office. His absence is not temporary; but the probability is, nay, it is almost certain, that it will be permanent. And we, the Congress of the United States, with a full knowledge of all these things, are called upon by the Secretary of State—[Mr. CARSON here intimated that it was by the President]—No, sir, by the Secretary of State, for it is all his work, and he shall not avoid his proper responsibility by skulking behind the popular name of the Chief Magistrate. We are called upon by the Secretary of State to appropriate nine thousand dollars to pay the annual salary of this imaginary, this constructive Russian minister. Sir, if we make the appropriation without some restriction, we will sanction a greater abuse than a British minister, with a subservient and hired Parliament at his heels, would dare openly to practise. I am aware that, in England, individuals receive large sums of the people's money, without rendering any public service. Even there, these abuses are hid from the common eye by some kind of decent covering. Let a British minister avow openly in the House of Commons that he had appointed an ambassador to Russia, and, at the same time, stipulated and agreed with the ambassador that he might reside at London; let me further suppose that the ambassador had resided in London, in pursuance of the bargain; and that, under such circumstances, the British minister should find it necessary to apply to the House of Commons to make an appropriation to pay the ambassador, as though he had resided at St. Petersburg, and fulfilled all the duties of the appointment—to make the case more like the one before us, let me further suppose that the relations between the two Powers were such as to render the constant residence of the ambassador at St. Petersburg necessary for the interest of Great Britain—I say, sir, let a British minister, in the case which I have supposed, apply to Parliament to approve of his conduct, and I will venture to assert that not one member, even from a rotten borough, could be found, who would not think his independency violated and insulted by the demand. No British minister would dare to hold such language towards a member of Parliament, who had made a motion similar to that which I submitted, as has been applied to me in the course of this debate. A gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] called it a disgraceful motion. I allude not to any thing contained in the written speech of that gentleman, the production of three weeks' hard labor, and which was delivered yesterday with such graceful gesticulation, and so much theatrical emotion. The expressions to which I allude, were used by the gentleman in his first speech, when this business was fresh before the House. The gentleman nods assent. I did not misunderstand him. This language, too, was used by a gentleman who represents himself to be the intimate personal and political friend and confidential adviser of the Secretary of State. As the Secretary of State is not entitled to a seat on this floor, and is deprived of an opportunity of an immediate vindication, when his conduct is called in question, perhaps it may be right and fair to hear him by his deputy. A charge from so high a source, of so grave a character, as that of submitting a "disgraceful" motion to this House, calls upon me for a defence. I am desirous of humbly showing, by precedents, that a member of this House has a right to submit any motion calculated to prevent an extravagant expenditure of the public money; and that such a motion has not heretofore been deemed disgraceful. In my search for precedents, I have found many instances where members of this House have had the hardihood to question the propriety of the acts of the Executive. The industry of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON,] who has just taken his seat, has furnished the House with some cases which occurred during the administration of Mr. Adams. Although that gentleman had not that object in view in citing those precedents, I conceive that they furnish me with an excuse for submitting this motion; they prove that the party with whom I then acted, and whom I will still follow, in all measures not inconsistent with our professions, when out of power, pursued the same course which is now condemned in me. I lament that any measure of the present administration has been so bad as to compel its friends to justify it by the very worst acts of its predecessors. This task must have been peculiarly humiliating to the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, who took so conspicuous a part in prostrating the late administration, for the very measures which he now relies upon as precedents to justify an abuse committed by the present administration. The precedent on which I shall principally rely, and which furnishes me with the most ample vindication, occurred in the British House of Commons, in 1817. It is the motion made in the House of Commons, by Mr. Lambton, relative to the late Mr. Canning's embassy to Lisbon. The case has been mentioned by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE,] who addressed the House this day. I will give a more accurate statement of it, from the book which is now before me, and which contains an authentic account of the proceedings which took place, in the House of Commons, on that occasion. [Mr. S. here read from Mr. Therry's Memoir of the Life of Canning, as follows:]

"Mr. Lambton this day brought forward the motion of which he had given notice, respecting Mr. Canning's embassy to Lisbon. In bringing forward this motion, he disclaimed any intention of attack upon the right honorable gentleman, (Mr. Canning,) whose name was prominently connected with the transaction to which it referred. It was not the conduct of an individual that he arraigned; but the charge which he had to prefer, was against his Majesty's ministers, of delinquency, by which, in his opinion, they had subjected themselves to an impeachment, (if that was not obsolete proceeding,) on a charge of a criminal misapplication of the public money, for the most corrupt private purposes. This was not the first time when this transaction had been made the subject of discussion. Both within and without those walls, it had been regarded as a measure resorted to purely for the purpose of supplying the weakness of the members of Government, by calling to their assistance the talents of the right honorable gentleman, (Mr. C.) talents too useful indeed to languish in obscurity. It had every where been asserted that there were no public grounds for sending an ambassador to Lisbon after the conclusion of the Peninsular war; that it was a disgraceful waste of the public money, and solely to be attributed to the lowest species of political barter and intrigue. The papers which had been laid upon the table of the House, fully proved that the mission to Lisbon was undertaken with no prospect of advantage to the interest of this country in its political or commercial relations, but with a view solely to the political, and he might almost say commercial advantages of the ministers themselves—and, for these sinister objects, they consented to add to the burdens of the people, already groaning under the weight of an insupportable taxation."

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that if the facts stated by Mr. Lambton, as the foundation of his motion, had been true, his Majesty's ministers would not have been guilty of a greater delinquency than is our Secretary of State for the appointment of Mr. Randolph as our minister to Russia. In one important circumstance, the abuse on the part of the American Secretary is greater than that of the British ministers. One ground of complaint against the British ministers was, that there were no public grounds for sending an ambassador to Lisbon. It was therefore only the unnecessary expenditure of the public money, in paying the outfit, salary, &c. to Mr. Canning, that could be complained of. But, in our case, it is admitted that the constant residence of an American ambassador at St. Petersburg is highly necessary for the interest of this country. So that, sir, while we are put to the expense of paying the outfit and salary of an ambassador, we remain unrepresented. We have not only to complain of the profligate waste of the public money, but, in addition, the Secretary of State has to answer to the American people for the neglect of their important interests at St. Petersburg, at a very critical period.

At all events, the case which I have referred to, establishes the fact, that motions, similar to that which I submitted, are not unusual even in the British Parliament. I will now proceed to inquire whether the motion was considered unparliamentary or disgraceful. Lord Castle-reagh was minister at the time, and present in the House of Commons when the motion was brought forward. Did he, sir, like the representative of our prime minister, acknowledge the truth of the fact alleged as the foundation of the motion, treat it with insolence, call it disgraceful, and rely upon a subservient majority to sanction the abuse? No such thing appears from the proceedings. So important did Mr. Canning himself view the charges preferred against him, and the ministers from whom he received the appointment, that he made in his defence the most able, dignified, and eloquent speech which I have ever read. He nowhere pretends that the motion was unparliamentary or unusual—much less, sir, did he call it disgraceful. He admitted, that if the charges preferred against him were true—that if it were true that he had consented to take an office for the mere purpose of receiving the salary, without a prospect of rendering any public service, he would be forever disgraced, and that it would disqualify him from serving the public, with credit to himself, or with advantage to the State. Sir, Mr. Canning did make a most triumphant defence; but no part of his defence consisted in vulgar abuse of the mover of the resolutions against him. He thought it necessary to show, and he did prove, that the facts alleged as the foundation of the motion were not true. Would to God it were in the power of Mr. Randolph to make a defence equally satisfactory—although some gentlemen may have taken the opportunity afforded by this motion, to manifest long cherished prejudices against Mr. Randolph, I desire it to be understood that I have never entertained any hostile feelings towards him. It so happens, sir, that there is not a member of this House, who has so uniformly approved of the political course of that distinguished gentleman as myself. I have admired the man, not because he owned land and negroes, (which is the only merit one gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Coke,] who spoke early in this debate, could discover in him,) but my admiration was founded on higher considerations. I admired him for daring, in the worst of times, to speak the truth on this floor, regardless of the abuse which his independence and honesty never failed to receive from the court sycophants of the day. I admired him because he would not blindly follow his party, when his party abandoned the principles which brought them into power. Another reason, sir, for my admiration of him, was that his course on one occasion bore some faint resemblance to my own. He abandoned Mr. Jefferson, when Barnabas Bidwell joined him. I departed at some little distance from Andrew Jackson, when Martin Van Buren got the full management and direction of him.

I did most sincerely lament the appointment of that man to the high office of Secretary of State. I lamented it, because I feared that he would labor to introduce into the Government of the whole Union the same corrupt system which has so long disgraced the politics of his native State. The pride of Virginia seemed to be offended, when it was insinuated that the appointment of one of her popular citizens was designed to make Virginia regard favorably the aspiring views of the Secretary of State. Whatever effect the corrupt dispensations of the patronage of the Government might produce on other States, Virginia is too pure to be influenced by such means.

It must have humbled the lofty pride of your great State, Mr. Speaker, when she beheld the very Cato of the commonwealth fall before the first and the only temptation ever presented to him. I have, said Napoleon, only to touch the sturdy democrat with gold, and he becomes my slave forever. It is upon this bad opinion of mankind, that your Secretary of State always acts, and it is indeed the great secret of his success.

Unless there shall be found firmness, patriotism, and independence in this House, to resist this first open attempt to bestow the public money for the private advantage of the Secretary of State, we will teach him still more to despise mankind, and to believe that they are only fit to be slaves.

The principal objection which has been urged against striking out the appropriation, is, that it will put an end to our friendly relations with Russia. My own opinion is, that it will have no such tendency. So far as our friendly relations with Russia depend upon the residence of an ambassador at St. Petersburg, our Secretary of State has already put an end to them. And the success of the original motion would have the effect of restoring our customary intercourse, by compelling the recall of Mr. Randolph, and the appointment of a more efficient man. But as the fear of interrupting our friendly relations with Russia would influence some gentlemen to vote against my motion, but who nevertheless are decidedly opposed to this disgraceful job, I came to the determination of modifying the motion in such a way as to meet with the approbation of every one who agrees with me in believing that this transaction ought not to escape the censure of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said: he did not rise to pronounce a eulogium either on the Secretary of State, or the minister to Russia. This task had already been sufficiently performed by their friends. Neither did he rise to assail the motives, or to attack the character, of any gentleman upon that floor. Such a course had never been, and he trusted would never be, pursued by him. He rose, very briefly to state his own reasons for voting against the amendment under consideration.

Judging from the discussion of the question on all sides of the House, one might be led to suppose that some of the best settled principles of constitutional law had been abandoned, and that, after an experience of more than forty years, we are still left in doubt and uncertainty as to the powers which the constitution confers on the Executive branch of this Government. On this subject, that instrument is so plain, that he who runs may read. It confers upon the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the exclusive power of making treaties with foreign nations, and appointing public ministers to negotiate these treaties. Both the minister and the treaty are called into existence, without the agency, either directly or indirectly, of this House. The people of the United States have entrusted, and, in my opinion, wisely entrusted, our foreign relations to the President and Senate. To the people, and not to this House, are they directly responsible for the proper execution of this high trust.

It is true that, in many cases, the House of Representatives are called upon to make appropriations for carrying treaties into effect; and, in all cases, we vote the out-fits and salaries of our foreign ministers; yet, it is equally certain that we are under a high, moral, and constitutional obligation to make the grants of money necessary for these purposes. I do not say that extreme cases may not exist, in which it would be our duty to refuse such appropriations. The safety of the people is the supreme law; and if their rights and liberties were endangered by any treaty, or any mission, it might then become the duty of this House even to disregard their constitutional obligations, for the purpose of preserving the republic from danger. Should such a case ever occur, it will make a precedent for itself. I think no gentleman will contend that it exists on the present occasion.

It is not my purpose either to applaud or to censure the appointment of Mr. Randolph as minister to Russia. He was regularly appointed to this station by the President and the Senate. To them, and to them alone, it belonged to judge of his character and qualifications. And here, after what has been said in this debate, it is but justice to state that the nomination of Mr. Randolph was the spontaneous act of the President himself, and sprung solely from the suggestion of his own mind. This nomination, thus made, received the approbation of the Senate. It appears from their secret journal, which has since been published, that, in that body, there was not even a division upon the question. I have a right to infer that the President's selection was unanimously approved by the Senate, because it does not appear that there was one dissenting voice. Whether this be the fact or not, I cannot tell, because I have never had any communication with any Senator upon the subject.

Under these circumstances, shall we withhold the money necessary to pay the salary of the minister thus appointed? Shall we arrest this mission to Russia, which has been long established with great advantage to the country, because we do not approve the conduct of the present minister? He is responsible for his conduct to the President, and the President himself is responsible to the American people. From that responsibility it is not in his nature to shrink. The constitution has not conferred upon the House of Representatives any power to arrest a mission, merely because they may be dissatisfied with the appointment or conduct of the minister.

I admit that, in the present agitated state of Europe, it would be highly proper that we should have a minister actually residing at St. Petersburg, and I regret exceedingly that Mr. Randolph's health did not enable him to remain in that city. But who could have predicted, at the time he left this country, that such a necessity would have existed? Europe was then tranquil: she was reposeing in peace. There was no precursor of the approaching storm, unless it was the stillness which portends the earthquake. The madness and folly of a single despot have aroused the people of that continent to vindicate their rights; and I trust in God they may never lay down their arms until the liberties of each of its nations shall be secured by constitutional charters.

When Mr. Randolph sailed, the President could not have foreseen any of these events. Our relations with Russia had always been of the most stable character. The absence of our minister from that court, during the inclemency of the winter months, could not have operated to our prejudice, in the then existing state of things. Under such impressions, was it improper for the President to give to Mr. Randolph a contingent permission to leave "temporarily his post, for the advantage of a more genial climate," in case he should discover that his health was not sufficiently vigorous to endure the severity of a Russian winter? And yet this circumstance has been seized upon for the purpose of making a most bitter and violent attack upon the present administration.

But, said Mr. B., the original motion has been changed with the approbation of the mover: and now, instead of merely depriving Mr. Randolph of his salary, it contains a general provision depriving all the foreign ministers of the United States of their salaries for any portion of time they shall be absent from the country to which they may be sent, no matter for what cause. The provision is general in its terms; it makes no exceptions; what, then, is its nature? The salaries of our public ministers to England, France, and Russia, are notoriously inadequate for their support. Indeed, it has now come to this, that no man having a family, unless he is wealthy, can afford to accept any one of these three missions, without danger of being ruined in his circumstances. In opposition to every principle of our Government, no poor man who is prudent would accept either of these stations.

A minister thus sent abroad, is equally liable to sickness with all other men. We know not what a day or an hour may bring forth. He may leave this country in the most vigorous health, and, after his arrival at the place of his destination, he may be prostrated in a moment by sickness, or his health may be impaired in the public service by severe and close attention to the duties of his mission. Under such circumstances, it may become absolutely necessary, for the restoration of his health, that he should for a short time leave the country. Should this amendment prevail, it will deprive a minister of his salary during the time that he absents himself, merely for the purpose of recruiting his health, even although his constitution may have been shattered by his laborious and anxious endeavors to serve his country. The means of subsistence will thus be withdrawn from him, at the very time when necessity will compel him to incur the greatest expense. Is it possible that this House will ever sanction so unjust a principle? Such a principle has never even been suggested in the past history of our country. Shall we now adopt so unjust a provision, and apply it to all ministers, under all circumstances, merely because at the present time we may be dissatisfied with Mr. Randolph's absence from the Russian court? I cannot believe that this proposition will receive the sanction of any considerable portion of this House.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, said, as I perceive it is the intention of the House to take the question, I will not trespass upon its patience, and will only state the grounds upon which I place my objections to the provision of the bill which is now under consideration, and, of course, upon which I shall vote for the amendment. And, in the first place, I wish it to be understood that I have nothing to do with the minister. I leave him to the commentaries and the eulogies of others. My objections rest upon another basis altogether.

Nor am I opposed to a mission to Russia. Quite the contrary. And if the Committee of Ways and Means will so change the phraseology of the bill, as to make the appropriation general, for the support of a minister, or mission to Russia, it will stand well enough. The responsibility, in relation to this mission, will be left where it belongs, and where it ought to remain, upon the Executive, unaffected by the doings of this House. But the bill in terms makes an appropriation to pay "the salary of the minister to Russia." Who is the minister to Russia? Mr. Randolph. It is, therefore, a distinct, specific provision to pay his salary, and the salary of his successor, I admit, should one be appointed within the year. But, in my view, it recognises, and confirms, and justifies all the proceedings of the Executive in relation to this mission. Sir, can this be doubted? Should a question arise as to the legality of this mission, or the expenditures of the Government in support of it; and such question may arise—would not this House be stopped by its own act from questioning either? With the knowledge of all the facts as to the origin and progress of this mission, or the means of knowledge within its power, we order the outfit and salary to be paid. This is an authority to the Executive, and it confirms and justifies his acts. Whatever doubt there might have been about it, had no objection been taken, yet, if Congress now refuse to interpose a clause to prevent the objectionable implication, it seems to me that it is inevitable. Now, sir, I will not confirm by my vote the proceedings of the Executive in regard to this mission. I cannot reconcile it to my sense of duty to sanction, even indirectly, what, in my conscience, I believe to be a dangerous innovation in the practice of this Government. Wherein, I will state presently.

But we are here met with the objection that this question ought not to be raised upon an appropriation bill; that it is irregular, unparliamentary. The gentlemen who make the objection do not tell us how it can be raised in any other way in time to meet the exigency. They only tell us this is not the way. If there be another, let it be shown. Sir, there is none. If this is not the way, then this House is reduced to the slavish condition of the Commons of Henry VIII, and our only business here is to vote the supplies. It is not so, sir. When an appropriation is demanded, this House has a right to look at the object; if it approves, to grant; if not, to withhold. This is the old Whig principle, which this House will be slow to give up. When the Executive acts within his constitutional sphere, and according to the established usages of the Government, it does not become this House in any way to interfere.

In such a case, I admit our obligation to vote the supplies. But when the Executive does not, it is going quite too far to say that this House is bound to vote the supply notwithstanding. This brings us to the question whether on the part of the Executive this mission can be sustained and justified upon the constitutional and established usages of this Government. I say it cannot. And, in the first place, the object of the appointment, it seems to me, was not solely for the benefit of the people, nor in any way for the public good. Nor can I approve of the manner of the appointment. Who can doubt what the understanding was between the minister and the Executive before his nomination to the Senate, the extent and boundaries of which, events have since indicated? He was authorized to do precisely what he has done, as much so as if he had had in his pocket a license under the seal of the Executive for his every act. This is fairly inferrible from the facts that the minister would not be likely to violate his instructions; that no intimation has been given that he has done it; that the President who introduces the subject into his message, admits that he had liberty to act at discretion, without a suggestion that he had abused it; and, more than all, he is not recalled. This puts the seal of the administration upon his acts, and appropriates and stamps them as its own. Such was the understanding, then, between the Executive and the minister. Was this communicated to the Senate? Had it been, it is impossible the nomination could have been confirmed. If, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] the Senate was unanimous, it must have been through ignorance of this fact. It was then an appointment according to the forms of the constitution, defeating the purpose of it. Nor can I sanction by my vote the conduct of the Executive in relation to this mission. I deny the power of the President to dispense with the services of a public minister, and to release him from his obligations to the United States, continuing his mission and his salary. The occasional recess, even of our ministers abroad, is matter of indulgence, not right. Or, if the Executive has the power, I affirm that here was an abuse of it. Hitherto, only ten or fifteen days in Russia! In the present condition of the world, and our relations to it! Not an accidental, an unanticipated absence, as intimated, but as certain when the minister left the country as it is now—too probable at least to be justified.

I say, therefore, in conclusion, that the conduct of the Executive in these particulars was unconstitutional, and a dangerous innovation which I am not prepared to sanction. It is upon these grounds I place my vote, and not upon any objection to the minister or mission; and at this hour I content myself with simply stating them.

Mr. ARCHER then rose to address the House; but, to give him a better opportunity than the lateness of the hour now permitted,

Mr. BARRINGER moved an adjournment; and
The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

REPORTS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

The resolution to print six thousand copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Judiciary committee, on the subject of the repeal of the 25th section of the Judiciary act of 1789, being again taken up for consideration,

Mr. CRAWFORD said: To address this House upon the subject-matter, of two reports, on a proposition to print them, and to sustain the one, or impugn the other, would be alike irregular and unprofitable. I can have no disposition to speak to a settled question, and particularly to one that has been decisively settled, but have risen for a special purpose, which shall be accomplished in brief space. When this resolution was under consideration two days ago, the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GORNOX] complained of the demand made for the previous question, on the rejection of the bill for the repeal of the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, reported by a committee of which that gentleman is a member. I beg leave to say to him and to the House why I made it. I hope, although I have been here but a short time, it is unnecessary for me to state that nothing was further from my thoughts than to show the slightest disrespect to any member of this honorable body. I was, in due parliamentary course, exercising a right which belonged to me, and which I then thought, and now think, duty required me to use, against a bill that involved considerations of the first impression, and presented a question, upon the decision of which the best interests of the country were staked.

H. of R.]

Reports of the Judiciary Committee.

The constitution is as broad as the law, and the stroke that shall cut off the 25th section of the judiciary act from our code, will inflict a fatal wound upon the charter of our common rights. I was, therefore, unwilling, if I could prevent it, to allow these States to be agitated and distracted, even for a day, by the supposition that any doubt existed on this vitally important subject. If it was debated, it appeared to me that anxieties and tormenting apprehensions, during the discussion at least, would enter into the minds of many, and that the very fact of its being argued would imply that the issue was doubtful. Had it been so—still more, had it been adverse to my wishes, I should have deplored it as the greatest political evil but one. I did not believe it was so, or that it would so result, and desired that an immediate decision might be had—that the sense of its representatives should be made known to the nation without delay.

In addition, and perhaps it operated more than any other consideration that impelled me to the course I pursued, I hold some parts of our political fabric to be of so sacred a character, that they are injured by familiarity. They ought not to be touched with an intention to destroy them. You cannot but lessen their sanctity by handling them. Of this description are the constitution, and the particular law now in our view, which is but an amplification of it, sanctioned as they have been, and are, by forty years' action, and the approbation of the country. Besides, if this subject is to be discussed, I do not believe "now is the accepted time;" and, if it were in other respects, the residue of the session will not afford sufficient space for the considerateness and gravity of reflection which all should and would bring to such a debate. These, sir, are briefly the reasons which actuated me. I wish they were satisfactory to all; to myself they are perfectly so.

In regard to the proposed printing of three thousand, now enlarged to six thousand copies, I confess I do not perceive the necessity for it, seeing that copies of both reports have been multiplied, and are multiplying, by all the newspapers of the day; but as many honorable gentlemen think differently, and especially as the minority desire that the resolution should pass, I will cheerfully yield my own opinion, and vote for it.

Mr. DANIEL, of Kentucky, then rose, and said, the motion now under consideration was of ordinary occurrence, and assumed importance only from the fact that the measure recommended by the report did not receive from this House that consideration to which it was entitled by its merits, by the principles it involved, and by the deep and pervading interest which it had excited in the community. It may not be strictly in order, said Mr. D., to debate the merits of a report on a motion to print, but the reasons necessary to sustain the motion may, however, be urged with propriety. In order to correct any abuse that may have found its way into the statute book, or into the administration of the Government, let facts and arguments be submitted to the people; they are the rightful judges; and let them determine, with the evidence before them, whether a particular law, a section of a law, or any act of the administration, should be repealed, modified, or corrected. Their decisions on all these subjects are, and ought to be, binding on their representatives on this floor. Many gentlemen in this House feel the full weight of this responsibility; and although all are honorable men, yet it would seem (and in this light alone can the people view it) the rejection of the bill recommended by the report, before the period had arrived at which it could be discussed, and its merits laid before the public, was an attempt to stifle the investigation of a subject of great national importance—a subject about which the whole country felt a deep interest, and demanded information.

Mr. D. said he had not supposed that a subject of such magnitude would have been so lightly passed over by a body of politicians who profess to regard, and be governed by the will and opinions of their constituents. The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAWFORD] supposes that it would be highly improper to investigate or agitate a subject of this character, as it would be the means of awakening inquiry among the people; and hence, in all probability, produce all over the country an excitement against the court. This was a laudable opposition to a measure of so much importance, and well deserves the admiration of an intelligent, free, independent, and sovereign people. The motives which influenced the course of the honorable gentleman, strange as it may appear, led other gentlemen to vote against the discussion of the bill. To submit a proposition for the due deliberation of the people of this Union, appears, in the eyes of the aristocracy of the country, and even by some who call themselves republicans, a subject of censure rather than commendation. Those who consider themselves superior to the people, are always jealous of any measure that would tend to reduce them to a level with the source of all legitimate authority in this country. Mr. D. said he had every confidence in the virtue and intelligence of the community. He had been taught from his infancy to look up to them as the pure fountain of power. The great error into which many distinguished individuals have fallen, is not placing a proper estimate on their intelligence and sagacity. This error attaches itself with great force to those gentlemen who have opposed the repeal of the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act to which I have alluded. They have no confidence in the people, and are afraid to submit to them any proposition to which they are opposed. Why this apprehension? Is it because they believe, if submitted to the judgment of the people, that the decision will be against them? Or is it to be ascribed to an overweening vanity that the agents know more than the principals? To such public servants let it be said, that, in their hands, the republic is not secure. The motives of members of this House are not to be impeached, nor will it be attempted on this occasion; yet it may be said, and said truly, too, that in this House there are three parties, and, by a union between any two, a measure proposed by the other can easily be defeated. It was clearly perceivable, when the bill was rejected on its second reading, that a union of this character took place; and it was manifest to every observer, that the object of its rejection was to operate against a distinguished individual of the South. Disunion and nullification were instantly made the watchword, and every yelper of a particular cast immediately joined in the cry. But this movement shall be noticed more fully hereafter.

Mr. D. said he would now take a cursory view of the twenty-fifth section of this judiciary act, and compare its provisions with those laid down in the constitution of the United States. The section is as follows:

"A final judgment, or decree, in any suit, in the higher courts of law and equity of a State in which a decision in a — could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice, or judge, or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered in a circuit court; and the proceedings upon the reversals shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision, as before provided, may, at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution. But no error shall be — as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, — such as appears on the law of the record, and immediately respects the beforementioned question of validity, or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.”

It will be seen that this section vests in the Supreme Court of the United States the right of judging in the last resort, of confirming or reversing the decision of the State courts, in all cases, civil and criminal, which may have been submitted to their adjudication. The tremendous power embraced in this section designates the particular class of cases of which the Supreme Court may take jurisdiction; but this does not lessen the evil of which the States have a just right to complain. Indeed, it is a power which draws within its vortex nearly every case that may, in the last resort, be decided by the State tribunals. By this section, the States are deprived of the right of determining on their own powers, and are made subordinate to the Supreme Court of the United States. The division of power in the federal constitution is intended to guard against the possibility of the States being reduced to the condition of inferiors to that which was created by their own voluntary choice. The powers delegated by the States to the General Government were intended to be adjudicated by a tribunal organized for that purpose by judicial authority. This tribunal, so far as authorized by powers delegated, is independent of the State tribunals, and the State tribunals independent of it; each acting on its own responsibility, and in the sphere of its own legitimate authority. To render the powers delegated by the States independent and sovereign, and for the States at the same time to retain their sovereign and independent character, were questions of delicate and deep consideration by the framers of the constitution of the United States. The conventions of the States to ratify the constitution of the United States, and particularly the convention of Virginia, composed, as it was, of her most distinguished statesmen, objected to its ratification, because the due powers of the States were not reserved by an express clause. To obviate this objection, it was urged, and not without success, that, at the first formation of such an instrument, perfection could not be expected; but that no danger should be apprehended by the State rights men, as the constitution could be amended at any time, when experience should suggest the propriety of such amendments. It was believed by many of the sages of that day, that the constitution was sufficiently explicit, without an express clause to guard against the usurpations of the Government just organized. Three distinct and separate departments were formed, and the powers and jurisdictions belonging to each were limited by different boundaries. To the judiciary department of the Government were allotted the power and jurisdiction necessary and proper to render the Government perfect. But, said Mr. D., the whole authority from which the advocates of supreme power in the courts of the United States justified themselves in enacting the 25th section of the judiciary act alluded to, will be found in the third article of the constitution, as follows:

“The Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming grants of land under different States; and between a State and the citizens thereof; and between foreign States, citizens, and subjects.

“In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make.

“The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where said crime shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as Congress may by law have directed.”

It is provided in the sixth article, second section, that “This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.”

In the third section it is further provided, that “The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this constitution: but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office of public trust under the United States.”

Thus stood the constitution, said Mr. D., when the judiciary act of 1789 was passed by Congress, and approved by the President. The constitutionality of the 25th section was then doubted; but it passed in company with other provisions, indispensably necessary to the salutary organization of the federal tribunals. It has remained on the statute book uninterrupted for many years, and age has given it some claim to veneration. That plea has often been asserted in its favor by the enemies of State rights. While the principles of the great revolution were adhered to, this act was seldom, if ever, resorted to; but as they have degenerated, that which was once considered as usurpation is now appealed to as an evidence of right, until the strides of federal usurpation begin to alarm the most indolent. The spirit of indignation has already gone abroad in the land, and the people are now seeking a remedy for the evil. It cannot be stifled nor subdued, let the friends of power do what they may to repress it. In vain do we ask for the clause in the constitution that authorizes a writ of error to be prosecuted from the decision of the supreme court of a State to the Supreme Court of the United States. The judicial power of the United States is vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish; and the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, and, in some specified cases, shall have original jurisdiction. The appellate jurisdiction refers to the inferior courts established by Congress, and not the inferior courts of the States. This doctrine, if successfully maintained, would prostrate every vestige of the sovereignty of the States. Their ability to keep the General Government in the proper sphere of its action would be taken away, and the State Governments left at the mercy of a splendid consolidated Government. This singular state of things would exist; the Government intended as one of limited specific powers, would become one of general unlimited authority, beyond the possibility of control. The power of judging of its own authority, as well as that of the States, assumed and maintained. What other powers are there in a Government which has any pretensions to sovereignty? It should be borne in mind, that all Governments are subordinate, and that they are only made sovereign by the sovereign will of those by whom they have been established. In this point of view the General Government is subordinate to the States; it is subject to their will and discretion. They can alter, change, or modify it. The power of judging of the General Government, in a great measure, belongs to the State Governments, because the Government was formed by the States in their sovereign capacity. It is true, the General Government has the power of judging in certain matters submitted to it by the forms of the constitution of the United States; and this judgment is final and obligatory on the individuals concerned. For example, the President of the United States has the authority to decide whether an individual convicted of a high crime by the judgment of a court, should be pardoned or not. Here the judgment of the President should be final. Congress possesses the authority to decide whether they will pass a certain bill, and the President possesses the power of putting his veto on them after Congress has passed them. These are proper exercises of the respective authorities granted to Congress, and the Executive of the Union, by the States. The judiciary of the United States has the authority to decide on all cases submitted to it under the express provisions of the constitution of the United States, and by the laws made in pursuance thereof. The decisions are final, and cannot be disturbed, because they are made under a proper exercise of delegated powers. But suppose these different departments were to take upon themselves the exercise of authority not delegated by the constitution; where then is the rightful remedy? Who is to judge of the infraction of the constitution? Those who have violated it? Or will you refer the matter back to the creating power, and let them decide whether the constitution has been violated or not? It is rare that a case of this character will occur; but when it does, it is proper that the principle should be applied. In the State Governments the remedy is at hand, and the people are secure from any injury that may result from a wanton violation of the constitution, by their frequent elections. Besides, the operations of the Government are under their immediate control. They pass judgment instantly on the acts of their representatives, or those of the Executive, or the judiciary. The State Governments were created directly by the people, and all violations of the fundamental principles of the Government are submitted to their decision. The General Government was formed by the States, and should be subject to the same principles, and the same rules of interpretation. Mr. D. said that no Government nor individual could be sovereign, without the power of judging and determining on its own acts.

In relation to the State and General Governments, each is sovereign and independent of the other; but not so in relation to the creative power. It is a solecism in politics, to maintain that a Government is independent of the power that creates it, or that the greatest despot on earth is independent of the people. To them Governments and despots owe their allegiance. The operations of the General Government are so far removed from the people, that the lessons of prudence dictated to the framers of the constitution the importance of limiting its action, while they retained to the States all that was necessary to enable them to maintain their authority and independence. In the estimation of the States, their rights were not sufficiently secured. Dissatisfaction arose on this subject among the people, and sundry amendments were proposed and adopted, which were the result of this dissatisfaction. Two of them bear on the judiciary act under consideration. They are as follows:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." "The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, or by a citizen or subject of any foreign State." These amendments were adopted long after the passage of the judiciary act of 1789, and show very clearly that they had for their object this independence of the States. The latter amendment appears, from the journals of Congress and the message of the President, to have been finally acted upon and adopted on the 8th of January, 1798. These amendments, whatever doubts may have existed before, must settle the question as to the unconstitutionality of the 25th section of the judiciary act. That provision of the constitution is not perceived, which authorized Congress to pass an act permitting a writ of error to be prosecuted from the State courts to the Supreme Court of the United States. I know, said Mr. D., that it has been drawn from that part of the constitution which declares that the constitution of the United States, the laws made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made by the authority of the United States, should be the supreme law of the land. This, he said, was a declaration that the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, should be supreme; and the courts of the United States, and also the courts of the States, in their adjudications, should so consider them; but that it confers any jurisdiction on the courts not previously given, is positively denied. It is true that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, &c.; but this can only be understood as applying to courts which were to be organized under the constitution, and not to the tribunals of the States. The judicial power of the United States was not vested by the constitution in the State tribunals: it was vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. Did Congress ordain and establish the supreme courts of the different States? Or were they, by an act of the National Legislature, made inferior courts? or could they be so made by any legislative act of the General Government? The superior court of a State is as much supreme as the Supreme Court of the United States. Each acts independent of the other; each has its limits assigned; and the one cannot coerce the other to the performance of its duty. The Supreme Court of the United States cannot compel the tribunals of a State to respect its mandates. The supreme court, it is true, may, if it chooses, refuse to permit their clerk to certify their record to the Supreme Court of the United States. A writ of error could not then be prosecuted. These facts show how entirely fallacious is the idea that the supreme court of a State is inferior, in relation to the Supreme Court of the United States. The judges of a State are as competent to decide on the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, as the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States. Those who do not admit that the State courts possess this qualification, must pay a poor compliment to the States, and the intellect of their judges, when they yield to the Congress of the United States the power to make the supreme court of a State an inferior tribunal. This exercise of power, if authorized by the constitution, would be highly improper, and could only be resorted to on the supposition that the judges of the State are either incompetent or corrupt.

The minority of the committee have placed it on the ground that the judges of a State are corrupt, and, therefore, are not to be trusted. They say that a State might pass laws to prevent the collection of the revenue, or to seize on the lands belonging to the United States; and that the courts of the States would enforce those laws, regardless of the oath taken to support the constitution of the United States. In that constitution, the laws and treaties of the United States are made the supreme law of the land, and the judges of the States are bound thereby. Can it be supposed by any rational man, that the framers of the constitution ever contemplated an encroachment on the sovereignty of the States, such as would reduce them to mere petty corporations, or to perpetual inferiority, annihilating at once every vestige of their sovereignty and independence? It is the opinion of some very distinguished men and jurists, that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have no authority to declare the law of a State unconstitutional. This duty was to be performed by the State tribunals; and the courts of the United States ought to take their decision as evidence of what the statute is, and its effects. If this course had been pursued, no collision would ever have arisen between the State and federal authorities; but a different practice has prevailed, and collision after collision has been the result. In some instances, the Federal Government, the harmony of the country, has been shaken to its very centre by these collisions. Nearly every State in the Union has had her sovereignty prostrated—has been brought to bend beneath the feet of the federal tribunal. It is time that the States should prepare for the worst, and protect themselves against the assaults of this gigantic tribunal. It is useless to disguise the fact. The national tribunal, sustained and supported as it is, stops at nothing to obtain power. Its jurisdiction is daily increasing, and will continue to increase till the tribunals of the States, and the States themselves, shall have been robbed of all their original jurisdiction. Courts, at all times, and in all countries, have sought to enlarge their jurisdiction, and have succeeded in the same proportion as the people have become supine and careless of their rights. In England, the court of king's bench, the court of common pleas, and the court of exchequer, were courts of limited jurisdiction; but they assumed one power after another, and at last became courts of general jurisdiction. The same, perhaps, is going on with regard to the courts of the United States; and, Mr. D. said, he would venture to predict that the same result would follow, unless Congress should aid in frowning down their usurpations; which, he thought, from recent occurrences, was not likely to happen. Opposition to the report is placed by the minority of the committee on another ground, equally flimsy and absurd. Law is a science, and he who is schooled in it must, in his construction, either of the constitution, of the treaties, or of the statutes of the United States, come to the same conclusion. It is admitted that the decisions of some of the courts may differ, either from ignorance or neglect; but this difference is not to be attributed to the system. Under the 25th section, the decisions may now be different: for example, if the State court sustain the law of the United States, no writ of error can be prosecuted; but if it should decide against its validity, a writ of error may be prosecuted to reverse or affirm that decision. If the opinion should be affirmed, no uniformity will exist in the courts. Uniformity does not even now exist in the courts of the United States. Where suits are brought in those courts by citizens of different States, and where the validity of treaties, laws, and the constitution of the United States, is not drawn in question, the decisions of the State tribunals are adopted as the rule of decision for the Supreme Court of the United States. To this rule there has never been any complaint. It has, on the contrary, been approved by the American people. The fears apprehended by the minority vanish at the touch. The jealousy that the States may pass laws to prevent the collection of the revenue, is idle and ridiculous. Do they know that the Federal Court exercises the power of preventing any interference by the States with the affairs that properly belong to the General Government, independent of the 25th section of the judiciary act? When the Legislature of Kentucky passed a law to tax the Bank of the United States, an injunction was granted and sustained by the Federal Court to prevent its operation, and the law declared null and void. If the Legislature of any of the States should pass a law to punish an individual who takes upon himself the collection of the revenue, the courts would, on application, declare the law a nullity. This power, although exercised by the court, Mr. D. said, was, in his judgment, a violation of the 11th amendment of the constitution of the United States. But this exercise of power is not so alarming as the exercise of power by virtue of the 25th section, because it strikes directly at the root of State sovereignty, and levels it with the dust. The repeal of this section, however, was scarcely determined on by the committee, before the majority was assailed in all the forms of newspaper slang and virulence by the prostituted tools of the old federal party. The writing editor of the National Journal—the putrid offal of Piccadilly—casts his mite of nauseous verbiage into the common reservoir of slander. Mr. D. said he knew but little of the private history of this individual, nor was it necessary in order to lead to a just estimate of his character. His appearance is sufficient to condemn him. His face would accuse and convict him of the most infamous crime in the calendar, which involved only the meaner and more grovelling passions of its committal. Even while he is moving about, he is constantly casting about him a quick sinister glance of the eye, as if in expectation every moment of being arrested by the high constable of London, to make atonement for some felonious or burglarious offence, that required not the exercise of manly courage, but cunning and dexterity. Another worthy editor of Virginia, distinguished only for the infamous notoriety of his crimes, through every stage of his existence, from the puling days of his boyhood down to the present time, has also made an attack upon the majority of the committee, and particularly on the individual who now addresses the Chair. To such worthy associates I will only say, "a villain's censure is extorted praise." All the opposition to the repeal comes from a source where it might be expected. It is of the same family as the alien and sedition laws. In order to render the measure odious or disreputable, it is designated nullification by some, and disunion by others. It is true, there is something in names; they have some influence on the public mind. The term federalist was harmless in its origin, but, from a variety of circumstances, which are not necessary to be related here, it became exceedingly odious to the people; and the party to which it was attached has of late been endeavoring to get rid of it as a cognomen likely to prove injurious to the success of their political aspirations. They have been exerting their ingenuity in order to barter it off for a new name—national republican. Nullification has been attached to the South, because certain politicians believe they can deceive the people by the use of the term. Those who believe so, calculate too largely on the ignorance of the public. The people of this country are too intelligent to be led off by such a shallow artifice. They are not to be alarmed by a raw-head and bloody-bones conjured up by those who have been at all times the enemies of equal popular rights. They will inquire who these nullifiers are,

H. of R.]

Reports of the Judiciary Committee.

and what part they bore in the darkest and most trying period of our history. They will ask, where were these nullifiers during the late war, when a foreign enemy polluted our shores, and threatened the liberties of our country? Did they contribute men or money to sustain us in our deep distress, to meet the wants of an empty treasury and destitute army; to repel the pampered myrmidons of a haughty foe; to mitigate the calamities of a relentless war, and to bring the contest to a happy and glorious termination? They must know the object of the nullifiers before they can sympathize with those who have a common interest in decrying them. Their object is to preserve the Union, and save the constitution at its last gasp. If they acted the part of patriots during the late war, when actions spoke devotion to liberty and the Union louder than words; if they have always sustained the principles of republicanism, and are now sustaining them in their purity, surely such men are not to be sacrificed, to gratify the indomitable ambition of weak, but cunning inguiters, who have no claims to the distinction after which they aspired, but an acknowledged capacity to plan and execute all the petty devices of political management. Sir, said Mr. D., the South has always been the defender of our country in times of difficulty and danger; the firm advocate and supporter of the constitution and the union of the States. The complaint urged against that patriotic State, (South Carolina,) by designing politicians, is, that her constituted authorities believe that the powers of the General Government have been transcended by Congress, and that their only relief is to be found in a direct appeal to the people of their own State in convention. In a measure of this character there is no danger to be apprehended, because the people have to settle the question whether there has been a palpable, deliberate, and dangerous exercise of power by the General Government. The solemn manner in which this subject is to be tested, the time given for ample investigation, are sure guaranties that the expressed constitutional rights of the General Government will be properly appreciated. The liberties of the people are always more secure in the hands of those politicians who refrain from the exercise of doubtful authority, than with those who estimate their own judgment as superior to their constituents, and, when the chain of legitimate power is stretched to its utmost, hesitate not to break a link, if necessary, to accomplish the ends of unchastened ambition. Hence the propriety of a full discussion and consultation by the people and their agents, before they proceed to decide on this very delicate and important question. The individual who may have formed an erroneous opinion in relation to the reserved powers of the States or the people, can never be a proper subject of popular censure, if the opinion so formed be favorable to the rights of the people. The agents, doubtful of their authority, appeal to the principals who are most interested, and ask them to settle the doubtful point. Who, I would ask, said Mr. D., is better qualified? The Government is their own property, formed by their own hands, created for their own use and convenience, and not to gratify the selfish cravings for power and patronage of those who may be called to administer its functions. The people have a right to dispose of this Government in the manner pointed out by the constitution. This is a position so clear that it cannot be denied. It then follows as a necessary consequence that the States have a right to judge of its operations, and to apply a remedy whenever it may appear to them that their agents have transcended the limits of the constitution. The beauty and harmony of our Government consists mainly in its operation, when that operation is not interrupted by collision with the State Governments. To prevent this evil, a proper respect must be paid to each. The one would then control the other, while each would control itself. Of this opinion was Mr. Hamilton, who, in one of the numbers of the Federalist, says, "that in a single republic, all the powers surrendered by the people are submitted to the administration of a single Government; and usurpations are guarded against by a division of the Government into districts and separate departments. In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct Governments, and then the position allotted to each is subdivided among districts and separate departments. Hence a double security to the rights of the people: the different Governments will control each other, at the same time each will be controlled by itself." In this article it is clearly seen that the State Governments were not considered as subordinate to the General Government, though the different departments of each had a portion of counter controlling power. The courts of the State Governments have authority to decide on the laws, treaties, and constitution of the United States; and the federal courts in turn have an equal power to adjudicate the laws and constitutions of the United States. Take from the States this privilege, and you destroy that reciprocal action, that principle asserted in the Federalist. Sir, said Mr. D., we have fallen on evil times; the good old republican doctrine of '98 is openly repudiated and discarded by many who once figured on the theatre of democracy. He [Mr. D.] remembered, that, after Mr. Clay had voted for the compensation law, so called, an excitement arose in his district against that measure. The opponent of Mr. Clay for a seat in the National Legislature, although at that time not a favorite with the people, yet he was likely to outstrip Mr. Clay in the canvass. In order to counteract, or rather counterbalance, the popular odium which this compensation law had excited, one of the friends of Mr. Clay published a handbill, charging his opponent with having voted against the famous resolutions of '98, declaring the "alien and sedition laws" unconstitutional, and asserting the absolute right of the States to judge of their constitutionality. During this animated contest, these resolutions were made the test between federalist and republican; or, in other words, between those who would retain, and exercise by the people and by the States, those powers not expressly granted by the constitution, and those who were disposed to yield up all to the decision of one grand consolidated Government, wielding the power and patronage of all, and tending to tyranny and despotism. These resolutions went as far, if not farther, in limiting the action of the Government, than the leading politicians of South Carolina. The President himself has not stopped short of that doctrine. He has said, in language not to be misapprehended, to the Cherokee Indians, that the State of Georgia had a right to extend her laws over them, the intercourse law of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. Sir, said Mr. D., I most heartily coincide with the President in this decision, and I am proud to be sustained by such eminent authority. It is true, we may differ about the mode of accomplishing the same object. In order to get rid of an act of Congress believed to be unconstitutional, the Legislature of Georgia passes an act extending her authority over the Indians within her limits; and the President tells the Indians that they must submit to its operation, all treaties or bargains to the contrary. This covers every principle contended for by the patriotic citizens of South Carolina; by this, an act of Congress, to use a common phrase, is nullified. In 1798, the pure days of democracy, the State of Kentucky was in favor of nullifying the alien and sedition laws. The resolutions passed on this subject are couched in plain language; they are said to have proceeded from the pen of Thomas Jefferson, the sage of Monticello, himself; let them speak for themselves. In these resolutions, the Legislature of Kentucky declare "that the Government created by the compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact, having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the mode and manner of redress."

This subject was re-examined in 1790, and the resolutions previously adopted were re-affirmed; and it was then declared, that, "if those who administered the General Government should be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by the compact, by a total disregard of the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the State authorities, and the erection, on their ruins, of a general, consolidated Government, would be the inevitable consequence. That, by the principles of construction contended for by several of the State Legislatures, the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it; stop nothing short of the despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers." "That the several States which formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its construction; and that the nullification, by these sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts done under color of that instrument, is the right remedy."

Sir, said Mr. D., Virginia responded to those resolutions, and the doctrines which they contain were re-asserted in an able report, which has ever since been the textbook of the republican party. If South Carolina has acted in any manner, on the subject of State authority, so as to incur the displeasure of Virginia or Kentucky, the offence evidently proceeds, said Mr. D., from the example set by these States. The issues of the controversy in that State, even admit that they have gone further than the Kentucky resolutions, prove that no danger is to be apprehended when a subject is openly investigated before the people. The principles of this Government are never in danger from an open, bold, and manly assertion of the rights either of the States or of the people. If ever this Government is subverted, it will be by indirect, insidious approaches, by secret conclaves, and treacherous machinations. The people of the South are too high-minded, chivalrous, and patriotic, to attempt any act which they may conceive their duty imposes on them, in secret, or under the cover of the shades of night. What they do, is done in the face of day. In all their public meetings they resolve that they are steadfastly attached to the Union; and their efforts are bent towards its preservation. It is a source of some amusement to hear the old federalists and Hartford convention men, with the parrot cry of disunion and nullification on their lips. They appear to have entirely forgotten the Hartford convention. In this memorable convocation, the seeds of treason and disunion were freely sown; and the time and manner selected for the occasion were congenial to a fruitful harvest. Their plots were all laid in private, with closed doors, and secrecy enjoined under the sacred obligations of an oath. One of these resolutions shows the character of the assembly, though it is to be expected that the most odious part of their proceedings has never yet been permitted to see the light. The resolution to which he alluded was couched in the following words: "The most inviolable secrecy shall be observed by each member of the convention, including the secretary, as to all propositions, debates, and proceedings thereof, until this injunction shall be suspended or altered." It is from proceedings of this character that danger is to be apprehended; and they are now mentioned, to show the reckless expedients to which some politicians will resort in order to obtain power. The judiciary of the Union, with that same reckless purpose, has given decision after decision, declaring the laws of the States unconstitutional and void. Not a single State, he believed, had escaped the nullifying spirit of this tribunal.

Kentucky has been made a victim by the prostration of her occupant laws. Under the 25th section, writs of error are now prosecuted from the decision of the supreme court of the State of Kentucky, with the view again to test the validity of these claims; and not only to vacate the law, but to vacate the decision of the court. To avoid consequences so injurious, and even destructive of the peace and harmony of the courts, the majority of the committee submitted the report now asked to be printed.

Mr. D. said, in conclusion, that he was in favor of nullification, so far as to remonstrate, either in convention, or by the State Legislature, against any act of usurpation, either by the General or State Governments. To an impartial people, seeking their own happiness in the manner which, to them, seems most suitable, matters of this character should at all times be submitted in an unsophisticated, unprejudiced, authentic shape. This cannot be better done than by the mode pointed out by Mr. Jefferson. He declares that "it is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State Governments are inferior to the Federal, or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide what belongs to itself, or to its copartner in government. In differences of opinion between their different sets of public servants, the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled in convention." The doctrine, that the States are inferior to the General Government, Mr. D. said, he could not subscribe to. He had always acted with the republican party—his constituents were republicans of the school of '98, of the Jeffersonian stamp, and they knew how to appreciate those principles, and to estimate the motives of honest, fearless, patriotic men.

To the House, Mr. D. said, he was under obligations for the indulgence they had extended to him; and, in return, offered them his thanks for the favor and attention they had bestowed.

[That portion of the hour allotted for the consideration of resolutions, which was given to this subject each morning, obliged Mr. DANIEL to deliver the preceding remarks in detached portions, on several different days, but his speech is given here entire.]

DEFAULTERS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House the amount of each defalcation, and the names of the defaulters; the names and amount of each peculation upon the treasury, or fraudulent use of the public money by individuals in the employment of the Government; and the names of the person or persons concerned therein; the instances in which the public money has been misapplied or diverted from the objects for which it was appropriated by Congress; and, also, the amount of improper allowances to officers, agents, or others, in the public employment, made by any of the departments of the Government; the amount thereof, and to whom allowed, since the 3d day of March, 1825.

LAND OFFICES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a land office in the Territory of Michigan, the amendment of the Senate to provide for the establishment of an additional land office in the State of Indiana being under consideration.

Mr. WICKLIFFE submitted an amendment, to strike out part of the Senate's amendment, and to provide for attaching the lands in Indiana proposed to be formed into a new land district to the Fort Wayne district. The motion to strike out was declared to be not in order.

After a few remarks by Messrs. IRVIN, of Ohio, and HUNT,

H. OF R.]

Minister to Russia.

Mr. WICKLIFFE submitted the following amendment: "That all the lands to which the Indian title is extinguished, lying in that part of the State of Indiana which is east of the Lake Michigan, bordering upon the northern line of said State, and not attached to any land district, shall be, and is hereby, attached to the Fort Wayne district."

This amendment, after some discussion between Messrs. WICKLIFFE, DUNCAN, JENNINGS, TEST, and VINTON, was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, returned to the Senate for concurrence in the amendment.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA.

The House then resumed the consideration of the general appropriation bill—the question being on the proviso yesterday submitted by Mr. PEACE, and which was accepted by Mr. STANBURY as a modification of his motion to strike out the appropriation for the salary of the minister to Russia.

Mr. HUNTINGTON submitted the following amendment to the amendment of Mr. PEACE:

Strike out all after the word "time," and insert the following: [so that it would read, "Provided that the time"]

"Shall be deducted, in computing the salary or yearly compensation of any minister, during which he shall have absented himself from the country, by the Government of which he shall have been received, for objects not connected with the public service, and in pursuance of permission so to absent himself, given previous to the commencement of his mission, and in anticipation that such absence would be necessary."

Mr. HUNTINGTON said a few words in favor of his amendment.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, next rose. He said he would make the most substantial acknowledgment in his power for the courtesy extended to him the preceding evening, by the utmost compression of what he had to offer. His peculiar excuse for offering any thing at this stage of the discussion, the House would not forget. This debate had the public for its mark, not the House. The missiles were forged and imbued with their venom here; but the House was only the medium to scatter them through the nation. The attack had been vehement on the Executive for the supposed abuse of one of its proper functions. It was due to justice that the case should be put on fair grounds; and if any thing had been omitted, or appeared to him to have been omitted, in this respect, Mr. A. said that he felt (from his position in the House) that he was placed in some degree of commitment to supply it. In his mode of discharging this office, he should probably meet exactly the views of the party or person. On the pretensions of Mr. Randolph, so much discussed, he should not add a word, nor a word of extenuation of the appointment. His object would be to prove that, whatever the defect of the one, or demerit of the other, the motion, in any of its forms, ought not to be sustained. Least of all, Mr. A. said, had he any design to mix in this conflict of asperity, which had made so large a part of the debate. He should be restrained by taste as well as former professions, from doing so. A large toleration was due to the exacerbations of party, and even personal contention in this House; but it appeared to him [Mr. A.] that there were extremes, which the credit of party required should be repressed. Whether an example had been afforded in the present instance, he should leave to others to pronounce, under his pledge to abstain from all participation of asperity.

The original motion proposed withholding the entire appropriation for the mission to Russia, as even expressive of dissatisfaction with the recent appointment of a minister. But the minister having accepted and gone out under his appointment, entitled by law to outfit, and salary to the legal termination of the mission, these could not be divested by our vote or action in any form. True, it happened that in this case the outfit has not been paid. A contract to pay was not of the less obligation. If paid, it would not be pretended that the disbursement could have been reclaimable, as made without authority. Thus, as regarded the prospective operation of the motion, no form could be given to it, to cut off the obnoxious minister, which would not at the same time cut off the entire mission—a result which no one desired, every person professed to deprecate. The error of gentlemen was in supposing that these effects could be separated. Give the motion any modification, yet this purpose could not be accomplished. We had to appropriate, or refuse, or reduce, or regulate the mode and forms of disbursement of the appropriation. Still we could not frame one grant in any way, to speak our disapprobation of the minister, without operation on the mission. Any denial, any retrenchment of allowances, must affect the successor, (supposing the knowledge of dissatisfaction to induce a new appointment,) no less than the incumbent. These gentlemen were carried beyond the mark they admitted to be proper by the motion. The amendments (in either form) were open to stronger objection and reprehension; still each of those proposed a proportionate limitation on the compensation, in the event of absence of the minister from his post. This would be planting in the statute book a stigma not confined to the obnoxious person, expressive of a distrust of common and decent fidelity in our diplomatic agents of every grade, which, surely, even party excitement would cease to regard with disapproval and regret.

The grounds of the motion were the unfitness of the late appointment, and the permission of absence from his post, of which the minister had availed himself. Were these grounds in any view adequate? Into the fact of unfitness, Mr. A. did not mean to inquire. Let it be assumed. Was it a warrant for the motion? The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BRIGGS] had put it to his [Mr. A.'s] candor to say whether it had not been usual to stir debate of this character in this House. The inference was, that there was nothing improper in stirring this. He [Mr. A.] had neither said nor supposed that there was. Undoubtedly it was both competent and proper, in this House, to have inquiry, or raise debate, on any or every subject connected with national interest. Wherever it was competent to make inquiries and debate, opinion, formal as well as informal, might be expressed. But it did not follow that there might be action, and in any form, at pleasure, ensuring this opinion. The propriety of entertainment of a motion, or of debate on it, was a very different question from that of its adoption. If it were conceived that a disregard of public interest had been evinced, either in the appointment of the minister to Russia, or in his conduct in his mission, nothing could be more unquestionably proper than the expression of this sentiment in any mode which the forms of the House would admit. If the proposition were to go further than the expression of opinion, other questions must be presented, respecting the competence of action, the propriety, supposing it competent, and the force of it, supposing it proper. It would not be contested that the selection of diplomatic functionaries, belonging to the office of the Executive, would not be competent or proper to intrude on this function. If, in any instance, the House should use the instrumentality of one of its proper functions for such a purpose, this would be an abuse. This proposition would not be contested. Suppose, then, the adoption of the present resolution was to have the desired effect of producing the supercession of Mr. Randolph, would this be a legitimate exercise of our authority over appropriation? If it would, upon the best founded grounds of disapproval, we might force the dismissal of this minister. What was to obstruct the employment of the same means for accomplishing the same purpose in every case of diversity of opinion from the Executive? And, if this might be done, what became of the substantial and real, though not nominal, office, of "appointing ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls?" Would it belong to the Executive, to which it had been confided by the constitution expressly, or to the House, from which it had been withheld?

The question on this part of the subject went beyond the point of the House, exerting an indirect control over the appointment of ministers. It might be pushed to the point whither the control might be exerted even over the missions themselves. It might be said that the right, on the part of the Executive and Senate, to depute diplomatic agents, gave an exclusive discretion as regarded the whole subject of the fitness of missions, as well as ministers, and that the House was bound to give effect to this discretion when the exercise of its power of appropriation was demanded for the purpose. Without intending, Mr. A. said, to intimate any concurrence of his own opinion with this doctrine, he must be permitted to observe, that it stood on stronger ground in this than the related case of treaties, in which it had been the subject of so much debate at different times. It had been held by a very large class of our politicians, that as the treaty-making power rested with the Executive and Senate, the obligation to give effect to the clearly expressed admitted functions of the other departments forbade the denial of appropriations for the execution of treaty stipulations. On the other hand, the subjects on which the provisions of treaties could be made to operate, belonging, in nearly the whole mass of cases, to the concurrent jurisdiction of Congress generally, with the treaty-making power, it might with reason be contended that the discretion of Congress, though controlled, was not extinguished by the exercise of the correlative authority by the President and Senate. But, in the present case, of the power of the Executive and Senate to send missions, there was no pretence of a concurrence of jurisdiction, from which the inference of a right to exercise a check on this function could be assumed. The case, therefore, Mr. A. repeated, was stronger in favor of the doctrine that the House was excluded from discretion as regarded the denial of appropriations in this case of missions, than in the case of treaties. He did not mean to profess his concurrence with the doctrine in either case. He believed, however, that, in either case, the abuse of discretion on the part of the Executive and Senate should be extreme, to authorize the interposal of our restraining and protective jurisdiction. That we were competent to the exertion of such an office, he did not doubt. But that its proper and legitimate character was protective only, and that any extension beyond this character would be an abuse, was as little to be doubted. The protective authority, too, was over the mission. It could not be legitimately pushed to a surveillance on the President and Senate, as regarded the fitness of their selections; unless, indeed, the abuse of their discretion, in this respect, was so flagrant or continued as to bring the case within the operation of the principle stated, and to justify the putting down the mission itself, as rendered mischievous or abortive. Then the rightful control over the mission—over the continuance of the relations in which the appointment of the minister was founded, might produce the annulment of the appointment incidentally, which, as a purpose sought directly and independently, would certainly be unauthorized. Whilst, then, the House would not be justified in denying or limiting the appropriation in this case, for the mere purpose of getting at the dismission of Mr. Randolph, if it thought that his appointment was of such a character as to frustrate all beneficial purpose in keeping open diplomatic relations with Russia, undoubtedly duty would require, as well as right permit, that the motion in its strongest form should be acceded to. The appropriation, however, could only be denied under this extent of responsibility; for the Executive could not be bound to understand, in the refusal of an appropriation, that nothing more was involved than objection to a particular minister, and a design to get rid of him, not the assertion of any principle of policy; nor would there be any constitutional obligation to respect this objection, if it were understood.

So much for the ground of the motion resting on the unfitness of the appointment of Mr. Randolph. This had been the main ground—the topic most insisted on in the early stage of the debate. The gentleman from Rhode Island, however, who figured so conspicuously in the discussion, [Mr. BURGESS,] on the last day he had addressed the House, had introduced another topic, which much enlarged the scope of his attack. He now rested principally on a doctrine which might be regarded as extraordinary even for this anomalous debate. He insisted that the motion ought to be sustained, on account of the mission being an illegal one; alleging, very truly, that we were not bound to appropriate for an illegal mission. The first impression produced by this suggestion, Mr. A. said, was, that as it could not be intended, so it ought not to be treated seriously. The fact must not be allowed to escape from memory, however, that this discussion was peculiar and out of rule in its policy as well as conduct. Things must be in it, which in a common debate might be passed by. The adroitness and undisputed talents of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island might give a color to his strange proposition, rendering it specious to persons not familiar with this class of subjects.

The gentleman had professed his ability to sustain it by authorities of public law. He had said he had them with him in the House. His exhaustion from bad health had not, however, permitted him to read, or even to refer to them by titles. Those who followed in the debate must, therefore, be exposed to some difficulty in encountering the allegation. The general proposition from which the gentleman started, was too elementary to require confirmation from authority. He stated truly that legations of embassy of every class being institutions of the law of nations, must conform in their modes and conduct to the requirements of this law to be valid, so as to draw after them the immunities which it attached. No proposition could be less contestable. The room for its application, not its correctness, constituted the difficulty. It was admitted freely, that the mission in this instance must be consonant in its character and form with the requisitions of public law, to be valid; and that, if not valid, we stood dispensed from any obligation to make provision for it. In what respect, then, was it wanting in this conformity? The nomination had been made and confirmed in pursuance of the usual forms. This much was not disputed. The appointment was alleged, however, to have been accompanied with a condition, which operated as a clause of defeasance, vacating the mission by incongruity. And what was this? It was found in the permission which had been granted to Mr. Randolph to absent himself from St. Petersburg.

Now, it must be observed, that though it had been true that Mr. Randolph had been guilty of irregularity of conduct to the full extent charged on him, still, on the principle assumed, the proposition would not be sustained that the mission stood vacated. It was the irregularity of the permission which was fraught with this effect, and the effect must attach if the principle were well founded, though no practical irregularity had followed. It would not be sufficient that Mr. Randolph had really established his domicile in England, not Russia, if this had been done in abuse, and not in pursuance, of his permission. This would constitute a case demanding a recall on the termination of his mission, but not operating its defeasance, ab initio, or from the time of the grant of the unlawful and annulling condition, which was the principle contended for. It was from the extent of the permission, then, that the measure of legality of the mission was to be taken. Where were we to look for this extent? The exclusive source of our knowledge on this subject, as regarded the existence as well as extent of the permission, was in the message of the President, disclosing it. What did this say? That the President regretted to inform the House that our minister lately commissioned, &c. had "been compelled, by extreme indisposition, to exercise a privilege which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion—of leaving, temporarily, his post for the advantage of a more genial climate." The assertion of the avoidance of the legality of the mission by this privilege could only be made in the view of its authorizing the residence of Mr. Randolph elsewhere than in Russia. We knew the extent of the concession, only from the message, and from this we learned that the allowance of absence was contingent only; and to be confined by the duration of the exigency, in which the resort to it had been authorized. How different from the assumption which the argument for the invalidity of the appointment required.

This argument was as little founded in principle, as in the application which had been attempted of it. The real principle on the subject was, that a minister once received, the regularity of his residence at the court to which he was deputed was a question for his own Government. If an irregular residence should be regarded by the Government receiving him in the light of disrespect, it would be a fair subject of representation in that view to his own Government, and that was the worst result with which it could be attended.

If an irregular residence was attended with the effects which had been ascribed to it, in this instance, what became of the case, not of unfrequent occurrence, of resident ministers sent on another service of indefinite duration? This had frequently occurred with our own ministers. Did they lose their caste, suffer impairment of their immunities, or require new credentials or reception on their return? What, in the same view, became of the cases in which the same minister might be accredited to more courts than one at the same time? There was nothing in principle to forbid this, and there might be a great deal of inconvenience to demand it. If one minister would be sufficient for our occasions with all Europe, why should we have more? Yet, irregular residence would be unavoidable: where several small courts were contiguous, an arrangement of this kind might be of the highest convenience. Suppose our own confederacy disjoined, must foreign Governments be compelled to support a diplomatic agent at each, or to have no diplomatic relations with those at which no agent was maintained? Or, might the arrangement be resorted to, which was now sometimes employed for consuls, of employing, if need be, the same for more States than one? Convenience usually demanded constant residence near the seat of Government of the Power to which the minister was accredited; and absence from the country, unless on special occasions, or for brief periods, would of course be absurd as subversion of the purposes of the mission. But there was no rigorous principle in this respect; convenience governed usage. In our own country, it had been a good deal the practice of the foreign ministers, and was at this time, to reside elsewhere than at Washington. There had been instances in which, if he [Mr. A.] was not mistaken, the visit had not been paid to the seat of Government for years, or, in any event, had been paid very rarely. Yet this practice furnished no occasion of discontent. It would be disused, undoubtedly, if it did. If Mr. Randolph were to fix his residence at Moscow, he would fall within the principle of this usage; yet he would be situated more inconveniently than at London, where he now was, for the purposes of his mission.

Permissions of the character of that granted to Mr. Randolph, and absences under them, of longer duration than his had been, were in the most ordinary course of diplomatic transactions. The occasions were various—for attention to personal affairs, for health, for recreation. Leave was not, necessarily, requisite, so much was this mode of proceeding in the common course. Mr. Adams, the elder, and Mr. Jefferson, when our ministers at the courts of St. James's and Versailles, passed and repassed, as occasion demanded, at will, between London, Paris, and the Hague. Mr. Jefferson made two excursions of recreation, or rather of instruction, (for with him time was in no way allowed to pass unprofitably,) the one into Germany; the other, as well as he [Mr. A.] recollected, into Italy. No leave appears to have been deemed requisite, as the absences were short. If Mr. Randolph, finding himself so much out of health as to demand a change of climate, had absented himself without leave, no clamor would probably have followed. It was the leave obtained in anticipation of the casualty, which was made the occasion of clamor. Yet a precedent equally in point, of which the gentleman from Rhode Island did not appear to be aware, was furnished, at a period to which the gentleman would not be prone to state exception. In the administration of Mr. Monroe, when the Department of State was in the charge of Mr. Adams, Mr. Forsyth received, coterminously with his appointment, and carried out with him, a permission to return home, immediately on the exchange of the ratifications of the treaty which had just been signed, and the ratifications of which were expected to have been exchanged immediately. Owing to delay in this event, Mr. Forsyth was prevented from availing himself of the permission as early as he had designed. But he did avail himself of it, by returning to this country for his family, where he remained six months. Who had thought of making this matter of imputation, or that the salary of Mr. Forsyth ought to have been curtailed on this account? In the administration of Mr. Adams, one of our diplomatic functionaries remained at home several months, not less than six, after the acceptance of his appointment, waiting a return of a season of health in the country of his destination. The salary was received from the time of his acceptance, yet no clamor was awakened, as we have heard in the case of Mr. Randolph.

The gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS,] by way of fortifying his proposition, that Mr. Randolph's appointment had become invalid, insisted that he was divested of his diplomatic privileges in his present situation. These privileges, he [Mr. B.] maintained, could attach nowhere but in the country to which the minister was sent. The proposition, if just, was not material in the discussion. But it was not just. Mr. Randolph did not stand divested of his privileges. These privileges did not attach only in the country to which he was sent. Mr. Randolph possessed in his present sojournment the personal inviolability on which the gentleman had dilated so much. A minister furnishing evidence, by passport, either by surety, &c. of his public character, not by courtesy merely, but the universal usage which made the law of nations, had extended to him, in countries in which he made transient sojournment, the same assurance of personal inviolability, that he would be entitled to rigorously, in the country to which he was accredited. He had more than this by the modern usages. He would be exempted from the operation of quarantine or blockade. And he [Mr. A.] would venture to affirm, that the effects of Mr. Randolph in entering England (as they would in departing) had been exempt from all search or duty. If diplomatic immunities were only of force in the country to which the functionary was accredited, where would be the safety for ministers in the transit to and from the places of their destination? And, if this security were wanting, how could intercourse and relations of diplomacy subsist with interior nations; that is to say, such as, not being accessible by sea, could only be reached through the territories of others? It was in early and barbarous times only, that the principle by which the security was guaranteed had not been recognised. It was not true, as the gentleman from Rhode Island had supposed, that the murder of the French envoys, in the time of the Emperor Charles V, supposed to be by his instigation, was not regarded as a breach of the law of nations. Vattel calls it expressly an atrocious violation. Nor is it any evidence to the contrary, that, owing to the disjointed condition of the times, and the ascendant influence of Charles, the indignation of Europe was only partially expressed. This view of the subject Mr. A. repeated, however, had no material relation to the subject. He should, therefore, pass it by, with some other remarks of the gentleman which he had noted for observation.

On review of the grounds assigned for the motion, they had appeared in every respect inadequate, even if they had been sustainable in fact. Had the spirit of party mingled, then, in this proceeding? This spirit was prone to run into excess, when not kept in restraint by the controlling influence of public opinion, to which appeal was made in the present instance. To the result of that appeal, he was willing, Mr. A. said, to submit the decision on the motion; not doubting that, as it would meet rejection in the House, it was equally destined to encounter the sentence yet more severe, and to which we were disposed to pay higher respect—the censure of our constituents.

Mr. TUCKER then, after a few remarks against spending further time on this subject, to the injury of the other public business, moved the previous question.

The motion being seconded, 73 to 33—

Mr. CONNER moved a call of the House, but the motion was negatived.

The question was then put on the previous question, viz. "Shall the main question be now put?" and was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Armstrong, Barringer, Baylor, Jas. Blair, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Bouldin, Brodhead, Brown, Buchanan, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Coleman, Conner, Craig, Crawford, Crocheron, Daniel, Davenport, W. R. R.

Storrs, W. L. Storrs, Strong, Swann, Swift, Taylor, Test, Vance, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, Edward D. White, Williams, Young.—70.

The main question (on the third reading of the bill) was accordingly put, and carried without a division, and the bill was then, on motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, read a third time.

Mr. CONNER called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and they were ordered by the House.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved a call of the House. The motion was negatived.

Mr. CHILTON rose to remark that the bill contained a feature exceptionable in the extreme. He would, however, vote for the bill; and he presumed other gentlemen would do the same, as it was the general appropriation bill.

Mr. BATES, after a few remarks, moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to strike out the word Russia from the 349th line of the bill, and to provide, at the end of the paragraph, for the salary of a minister to Russia. On this motion Mr. B. demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. STERIGERE demanded the previous question; and the demand was sustained by the House.

Mr. BATES then called for the yeas and nays on the motion for the main question; but the House refused to order them.

The House having determined that the main question should now be put,

The question was finally taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—yeas 115, nays 3.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

It was now half past four o'clock, and the House was about to adjourn; when

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said that he was about to ask a favor of the House, which would probably be the last he should ever ask of it. It was to indulge him so much as to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to take up the bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States. He had had the bill in charge for two years, and during all that time the parties interested had, with excited feelings, been looking for its passage. After a few other remarks, in which Mr. B. made a feeling appeal to the House, in favor of taking up the bill,

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. DWIGHT in the chair, and took up the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted an additional section, appropriating five thousand dollars to carry the provisions of the bill into effect; which was agreed to. The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended; and

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Internal Improvements, to which was referred so much of the message of the President of the United States at the commencement of the present session as relates to that subject, made a report thereon, and moved that it be committed and printed. [See Appendix.]

The report embraced a full reply to the opinions announced in the Executive message on the subject of internal improvement, and concluded with the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the General Government should continue to prosecute internal improvements, by direct appropriations of money, or by subscriptions for stock in companies incorporated in the respective States.

H. OF R.] Baltimore and Washington Railroad.—Extension of a Patent.—Susan Decatur et al. [FEB. 11, 1831.]

Mr. HAYNES called for the reading of the report. The Clerk having progressed at some length,

Mr. CHILTON moved to suspend the further reading, and that the report lie on the table, and be printed.

After a few remarks between Messrs. WICKLIFFE, CHILTON, and the CHAIR, as to a point of order,

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report; when, Mr. McDUFFIE moved to suspend the further reading.

[Here arose a discussion between Mr. McDUFFIE, the CHAIR, and Messrs. MERCER, SUTHERLAND, and WICKLIFFE, as to the correctness of the motion of Mr. McDUFFIE. It was insisted, on the one side, that when a motion or resolution was being read the first time, it was not in order for a member to move to suspend the reading. On the other hand, it was asserted that, by a rule of the House, "when the reading of a paper" was "called for, and the same objected to by any member, it should be determined by a vote of the House." Former decisions in the case were also referred to; and the decision of the Chair, that the motion was not in order, was appealed from. Mr. MARTIN was temporarily in the chair to-day. To save time, Mr. HAYNES withdrew his motion for the reading.]

The report was then ordered to be committed, and the usual number of copies directed to be printed.

Mr. VANCE moved for the printing of six thousand additional copies; which motion, by a rule of the House, laid over till the next day.

BALTIMORE AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

This being the day set apart for District business, Mr. DODDRIDGE moved that the House take up the bill to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, into and within the District of Columbia.

Mr. DORSEY stated that a portion of the delegation of Maryland was placed in an embarrassing predicament on this bill. They did not wish to do any thing which might endanger the bill; but the Legislature of Maryland had now before it a proposition to construct a railroad from Baltimore to Washington, by the State funds; and it would seem respectful for the members from Maryland to wait the action of the State Legislature on the subject. A portion of the delegation had therefore conferred together, and agreed to move a postponement of the bill for a few days.

Mr. HOWARD opposed the motion very earnestly, and stated the nature of the bill which was now before the Legislature of Maryland, to show the improbability that the proposition would result in the work being undertaken by the State. At his request, Mr. DORSEY, for the present, withdrew his motion; and

The House took up the bill and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee for the District of Columbia.

[Considerable discussion took place on the amendments, in which Messrs. HOWARD, DODDRIDGE, WASHINGTON, SEMMES, BROWN, MERCER, HOFFMAN, and McDUFFIE, took part.]

The remainder of the sitting was spent on the District bills.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

EXTENSION OF A PATENT.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill from the Senate, to extend the patent of Samuel Browning for a further period of fourteen years, without amendment, and moved its third reading at this time.

Mr. BUCHANAN opposed this motion, and moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. DANIEL preferred that it should be postponed to a particular day, as he was decidedly of the opinion, if it once got into a Committee of the Whole, it was the last we should hear of it this session. It was a bill, the provisions of which, Mr. D. thought highly important to the interests of the community as well as the individual for whose benefit it was brought up; and it ought to be acted on promptly. In order to meet the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and at the same time not to endanger the bill, he moved to postpone its further consideration till Tuesday next. He would further state, that the discovery of Mr. Browning was a new mode of separating iron from its impurities; it would be seen, therefore, by every member that it was a bill of general importance.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the patent which this bill sought to extend had expired two years ago, and now, after the discovery had been public property during that time, an attempt is made to revive the patent. He could only say that the case had no parallel in the legislative history of Congress, while he had the honor of a seat in it.

Mr. DANIEL replied: The case differed from others, it was true, but the public was not yet in possession of the discovery; the process was not understood; and there was only one machine in the United States, by which the practicability of the discovery could be tested; and that machine had fallen into the hands of a gentleman of fortune, after the time for which the patent right was originally granted had expired. This gentleman was totally ignorant of the mode by which the operation was to be carried on; and in his zeal to secure the advantages that must result to the nation from the invention, he searched out the inventor, and found that the machine under his management answered all the purposes which its inventor set forth.

After some remarks from Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, and Mr. EVANS, of Maine,

Mr. CONNER moved to lay the bill on the table; which motion was agreed to—yeas 82, nays 39.

SUSAN DECATUR ET AL.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved that the House do proceed to the consideration of the bill to compensate Susan Decatur, widow and legal representative of Captain Stephen Decatur, deceased, et al.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the yeas and nays on consideration, and they were ordered by the House. Being taken, they stood—yeas 102, nays 82.

So the House determined now to consider the bill.

The question was stated from the Chair to be on the amount of compensation with which the blank should be filled; when

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House.

The motion was negatived—58 to 76.

Mr. HOFFMAN, after a few remarks, moved to recommend the bill to a Committee of the Whole for this day.

Mr. MILLER moved its commitment to a Committee of the Whole for to-morrow; and the question being put on this motion, it was determined in the negative.

The motion of Mr. HOFFMAN was then agreed to, and the House went into committee, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the said bill.

[Considerable discussion took place between Messrs. HOFFMAN, POTTER, TUCKER, ELLSWORTH, STORRS, of New York, CROCKETT, CHILTON, McDUFFIE, DODDRIDGE, CRAIG, and BARRINGER, not only as to the sum to be appropriated, but on the merits of the claim; allusions were also made to what was called the improper interference of the President in favor of the claim. So much, however, has already been reported in both Houses of Congress, on the subject of this claim, that it is considered unnecessary to report what was said to-day. In the course of the discussion a letter from Indian Affairs—Question of Order.

[H. OF R.]

Mrs. Decatur was read, detailing her present distressed situation, and appealing to Congress, in very strong and eloquent terms, for relief.]

A motion to fill the blank with the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, was agreed to.

Some conversation then took place as to the proper mode of distribution of the sum appropriated between the surviving officers and crews and the legal representatives of the parties concerned, in which Messrs. STORRS, of New York, HOFFMAN, MALLARY, SPEIGHT, and McDUFFIE, took part. It was eventually decided that the words of the bill of the last session, to distribute the sum agreeably to the provisions of the prize act, should be stricken out.

Mr. MILLER then submitted an amendment, to give to the nieces of Commodore Decatur ten thousand dollars of the sum.

After some remarks by Messrs. HOFFMAN, CARSON, BARRINGER, CRAIG, SUTHERLAND, DODDRIDGE, STORRS, of New York, and McDUFFIE, and the reading of the will of Commodore Decatur,

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved that the committee rise, and that the bill and various amendments be printed, so that there might be some understanding of the provisions proposed to be adopted. The motion was negative.

Mr. MILLER then modified his motion so as to confine the donation of ten thousand dollars to two nieces of Com. Decatur, daughters of Mr. McKnight; and the question being put upon the motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 75, nays 81.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House, as amended. The motion prevailed.

In the House the amendments were agreed to; which provided for paying the boat's crew, adopted at the last session, and that adopted to-day for filling the blank in the bill with one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment striking out the clause for paying the parties concerned, agreeably to the provisions of the prize act; and they were ordered.

After some remarks by Messrs. CLAY, STORRS, of New York, HOFFMAN, and HUNTINGTON, the question was put, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 58.

Mr. WILDE then demanded the previous question, and Mr. DRAPER moved an adjournment; which motion was decided in the negative—yeas 59.

The House having seconded the demand for the previous question,

On the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The main question was then put, as follows:

"Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?" and determined in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Baylor, Beckman, Brodhead, Brown, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Clay, Coleman, Condict, Coulter, Craig, Crocheron, Crowninshield, Warren R. Davis, Deberry, Deny, Dickinson, Drayton, Dwight, Eager, Earl, Joshua Evans, Edward Everett, Finch, Ford, Forward, Fry, Gilmore, Gordon, Green, Halsey, Hawkins, Haynes, Hinds, Hodges, Hoffman, Howard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Thomas Irwin, Jarvis, Jennings, R. M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Lea, Leiper, Lent, Mallary, Marr, Martin, Thomas Maxwell, McCreery, McDuffie, McIntire, Mercer, Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Nuckolls, Patton, Overton, Pettis, Polk, Potter, Sanford, Scott, Sterigere, Stephens, Taliaferro, Varnum, Verplanck, Washington, Weeks, C. Storrs, Strong, Sutherland, Swann, Swift, Taylor, John Thomson, Trezvant, Tucker, Vance, Vinton, Whittlesey, Williams, Yancey, Young.—89.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, moved that, when the House adjourns, it do adjourn to Monday; and said he made the motion on account of the two or three hours' darkness that would occur to-morrow: whereupon,

Mr. WHITTLESEY moved that the House do now adjourn; but withdrew it, to give an opportunity for Mr. DODDRIDGE to move a reconsideration of the bill just rejected, with a view also to move a reconsideration of the last amendment agreed to. Pending which motion, another was made to adjourn; and

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

Soon after the House met, the eclipse of the sun creating considerable gloom within the hall, (although far from being dark enough to require candles,) an adjournment was moved by Mr. DWIGHT, and was carried—yeas 86, nays 77.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—QUESTION OF ORDER.

The petition laid on the table by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, last Monday, from sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying the repeal of the Indian law of last session, &c., was announced by the Chair as now before the House for disposal.

Mr. EVERETT rose, and was proceeding to address the Chair; when

Mr. TUCKER, of S. C., interposed, and demanded that the question of "consideration" be put, and the Speaker announced this to be the question.

[This question precludes debate on any motion, unless the House decides in favor of its consideration.]

Mr. LUMPKIN demanded the yeas and nays on the question of "consideration;" and they were ordered.

Mr. EVERETT said it was with great regret he was obliged to say that he considered the demand for the question of consideration out of order; the petition had been received by the House, and, if this motion were entertained by the Chair, it would cut off all debate on the petition, which Mr. E. said he had a right to discuss, on presenting it, if he thought proper.

The SPEAKER said the House had a right to decide whether it would consider the gentleman's motion—it had a right to refuse to receive the petition itself.

Mr. EVERETT. But the House has received the petition, Mr. SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER said the petition had been received and laid on the table; that the House had a right now to say whether it would consider the gentleman's motion touching its reference, and therefore the demand for the question of consideration was in order; and he proceeded to refer to the rules, and explain his construction of them, to show the propriety of his decision.

Mr. VINTON moved a call of the House, which was agreed to; and the Clerk having called the roll of the members, and the attendance appearing to be pretty full, further proceeding in the call was suspended.

H. OF R.]

Indian Affairs—Question of Order.

[FEB. 14, 1831.]

Mr. BELL asked, if the House decided in favor of "consideration" what time would the discussion be in order—could it be continued from day to day, or would it be limited?

The SPEAKER replied, it could only be continued to day, and the next days on which the presentation of petitions would be in order, (namely, on Monday alone.)

Mr. EVERETT again rose, and said he felt himself under the necessity of appealing from the decision of the Chair, on the correctness of entering the demand for the question of consideration; and he proceeded in support of his appeal at some length—arguing that this was no motion or proposition offered to the House, but simply a petition from a portion of his constituents, which they, in the exercise of their constitutional right, had presented to the House through him, their representative. He had laid it on the table, under the rule; it came up to-day as a matter of course; its consideration required no motion, and he had made none; the matter before the House was the petition itself, and to that he had a right to speak; it was a constitutional right to which the rule of consideration could not apply, and could not cut off. It was with unfeigned reluctance he made the appeal, but a sense of duty constrained him to do so.

Mr. TUCKER, in a few remarks, defended his call for the question of "consideration," and his motive for making it. His object was to save the time of the House from being wasted in a useless debate.

The SPEAKER then rose, and, after stating the case, read the rules in point, which he explained at some length, to show the correctness of his decision in entertaining the demand for "consideration." He referred particularly to the fifth rule, which is as follows: "When any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker." During the whole time while he had presided in the chair, he had never exercised the privilege of requiring the question of consideration; it was now required by another member, and he had no right to refuse it, it being in order under the rule.

Mr. WAYNE asked if he was to understand that the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TUCKER] was in order before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] had submitted any proposition.

The SPEAKER replied, that he considered there was, virtually, a motion before the House, on taking up the petition for disposal.

Mr. WAYNE thought that did not follow of course. The gentleman from Massachusetts had not submitted any proposition relative to the petition; and, until he did that, the House could not know what his motion would be, or decide whether they would consider it. The House would be voting in the dark. He maintained that the SPEAKER would be right, had the gentleman made any motion for the disposition of the petition, but at present the demand of "consideration" he thought premature.

Mr. TUCKER then withdrew his call for the question of consideration.

Mr. EVERETT said it was his intention to debate the petition which he had presented to the House; and when the SPEAKER decided that he could not do so, he denied a right which was sanctioned by the practice of the British Parliament, and was sanctioned by the practice of this House. During the last war, many important questions were debated on the presentation of petitions.

The SPEAKER. There must still be a motion before the House to authorize debate.

Mr. EVERETT. If I am entitled to the floor [several members were attempting to address the Chair] I will then submit a motion before I sit down.

The SPEAKER. It is in the power of the Speaker, or of any member, to require that every motion be reduced to writing, and the Speaker requires that the gentleman send his motion to the Chair in writing.

Mr. EVERETT accordingly sent to the Chair the following motion:

That the said memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to report a bill making further provision for executing the laws of the United States on the subject of intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, also, for the faithful observance of the treaties between the United States and the said tribes.

The motion having been read,

Mr. WICKLIFFE demanded that the question be put on the "consideration" of the motion. He had no idea of commencing another Indian war at this period of the session.

Mr. CONDUCT called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and the SPEAKER having stated the question,

Mr. EVERETT said, if he understood the Chair that it was in order to preclude debate on his motion, by the question of "consideration," he must appeal to the House from the decision of the Chair.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the appeal.

Considerable debate now ensued on the appeal, which, as it cannot be reported fully, is not attempted at all; the preceding outline being sufficient to show the reader the nature of the points which arose, and the course of proceeding on them, which is all that is intended by the sketch. The appeal was supported by Mr. EVERETT and Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, and it was opposed, and the decision of the Chair defended, by Mr. WAYNE and Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia. Finally,

Mr. EVERETT said, yielding to the wishes of several of his friends, he would withdraw the appeal, and meet the question at once.

The question was then put—"Will the House now consider the motion?" and was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

Indian Affairs.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVERETT then rose, and addressed the House as follows:

In presenting this subject last week to the House, I observed, that it was with regret that I found myself obliged to bring it forward in a manner, strictly parliamentary indeed, but somewhat unusual. I should have preferred to submit this great subject to the consideration of the House by the more usual course of a resolution. I have had a resolution prepared for that purpose, and lying in my desk for several weeks; but the Chair knows that there has not been a moment, for several weeks, when a resolution could be offered but by the unanimous consent of the House. Such consent I could not ask on such a subject. I should have been better pleased to meet the subject on a report from the Indian committee, to whom, in connexion with very numerous memorials from various parts of the country, with the President's message, and with the petitions of the Creek and Cherokee Indians, it has been referred. No report, however, has proceeded from that committee, and no intimation has been given that any is to be expected.

In this state of things, urged by my sense of duty, admonished by several expressions of public sentiment committed to my charge by the people I represent, and looking upon the subject as one of great, of paramount—ay, sir, of most painful importance—a subject eminently requiring the interposition of this House—I have felt myself constrained in the forbearance of others much better qualified to take this step to make this effort to bring it under the consideration of the representatives of the people.

I should think, sir, that a positive decision of this question by Congress would be highly desirable to the friends of the administration. They cannot, I should think, wish to leave with the Executive the responsibility of sitting still and witnessing the violation of a very large number of treaties and compacts, and of the clearest provisions of law. No man surely can pretend that such a policy can be within the competence of the Executive; and if, for reasons of necessity, or reasons of State, or any other reasons, the treaties with the Indians are to be annulled, and the laws touching our intercourse with them converted into a dead letter, it surely cannot require an argument to prove that Congress is the only power by which this can be done with any show of rightful authority.

I cannot disguise my impression, that it is the greatest question which ever came before Congress, short of the question of peace and war. It concerns not an individual, but entire communities of men, whose fate is wholly in our hands, and concerns them—not to the extent of affecting their interests, more or less favorably, within narrow limits. As I regard it, it is a question of inflicting the pains of banishment from their native land on seventy or eighty thousand human beings, the greater part of whom are fixed and attached to their homes in the same way that we are. We have lately seen this House in attendance, week after week, at the bar of the other House, while engaged in solemn trial of one of our own functionaries, for having issued an order to deprive a citizen of his liberty for twenty-four hours. It is a most extraordinary and astonishing fact, that the policy of the United States toward the Indians—a policy coeval with the revolution, and sanctioned in the most solemn manner on innumerable occasions—is undergoing a radical change, which, I am persuaded, will prove as destructive to the welfare and lives of its subjects, as it will to their rights; and that neither this House, nor the other House, has ever, even by resolution, passed directly upon the question.

But it is not merely a question of the welfare of these dependent beings, nor yet of the honor and faith of the country which are pledged to them—it is a question of the Union itself. What is the Union? Not a mere abstraction; not a word; not a form of Government; it is the undisputed paramount operation, through all the States, of those functions with which the Government is clothed by the constitution. When that operation is resisted, the Union is in fact dissolved. I will not now dwell on this idea; but the recent transactions in Georgia have been already hailed in the neighboring British provinces as the commencement of that convulsion of these United States, to which the friends of liberty throughout the world look forward with apprehension, as a fatal blow to their cause.

If any further apology were needed for bringing this matter before the House, it might be the fact that it has been frequently referred to us. It has formed a prominent topic in the two annual communications of the Chief Magistrate. Numerous memorials on both sides of the question have presented it to us; reports in both Houses of Congress have discussed it; but, owing to some strange fatality, it has never been plainly and decidedly met.

The Secretary of War tells us that a new era has within a few years arisen in relation to our Indian affairs. He does not indicate precisely what marks the new era; but, in one respect, there has unquestionably arisen a new era in this department, that of substituting Executive decision for congressional enactment. Formerly the Executive only carried into effect our laws and treaties made by the treaty-making branch of the Government. Now the President, 1st, permits the States to annul the treaties, and proceed on their declared want of validity, and, 2d, annuls the laws himself, and permits his Secretary to come down to Congress, with an argument to prove that a law substantially coeval with the Government is unconstitutional. I am willing to receive the Secretary's argument for what it is worth; but really, sir, I have studied the constitution unsuccessfully, if the mere opinion of a Secretary, with or without an argument, renders a law unconstitutional, and makes it cease to be obligatory. But to this I shall return, only repeating, now, that the assumption of these two principles in our Indian affairs does, indeed, constitute a new era.

Sir, I know the delicacy of this subject. I approach it with reluctance and pain, under the most imperious sense of duty. I would gladly have put it by, could I have justified myself in so doing. I know, by past experience, the odium I am to incur. I know that, humble as I am, the denunciations of hundreds of presses throughout the country await me. I have seen within a week, in a paper published at this place, and which has been made the channel of the most confidential communications between the President and the people; I have seen the course of the minority of this House who voted on the Indian bill last year—a minority comprising some of the most respectable friends of the President, and amounting to very nearly one-half of the House—ascribed to vile faction.

But, disagreeable as the consequence may be to one who loves strife as little as I, I cannot keep silence when I hear the laws of the land declared unconstitutional, by those executive officers who have no other duty in reference to the laws, but to enforce them; when I see treaties violated by States who are parties to them; treaties sanctioned by all the forms of the constitution, and ratified by the Senators representing the very States foremost in the violation. I cannot keep silence when I see the constitution invaded; the honor of the country tarnished; the Union impaired. If my whole course, during the six years that I have been honored with a seat on this floor, will not protect me in the judgment of others from the imputation of vile and factious motives, I shall have at least the consciousness in my own bosom, that a sense of public duty, and that alone, has impelled me to the course I have taken.

Sir, the Secretary says a new era has arisen in our Indian affairs. This is true. Up to the year 1828, the course of proceeding in our Indian affairs is well known, at least in reference to all the tribes whose rights are now in controversy. The United States had negotiated treaties with all the Southwestern tribes. Our relations with them, and the boundary between them and us, were regulated by treaty; and by the intercourse law framed in pursuance of the same policy. A limited and qualified sovereignty, sufficient to enable them to contract these treaty obligations, was conceded to the tribes. No State had pretended to extend her laws over either of these tribes till the year 1828. To show the various views entertained of this subject, I will cite several authorities, which will abundantly sustain me in this position. The distinguished individuals whom I quote, and the present Chief Magistrate at the head of them, took views somewhat different from each other, but none of them, I believe, intimated that the separate States possess the right now claimed.

H. OF R.]

In 1821, the Creek Path Indians, being dissatisfied with the conduct of their brethren of the Upper Towns, applied to General Jackson, then Major General of the Southern division, requesting him to use his influence with the General Government, to procure for the said Creek Path Indians an inalienable reservation of a part of their lands, on consideration of selling their proportionate share of the common lands of the nation. General Jackson was in favor of this project, and wrote to Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of War, as follows:

"I do believe, in a political point of view, as well as in justice to these people, their prayer ought to be noticed. It is inviting Congress to take up the subject, and exercise its power, under the Hopewell treaty, of regulating all the Indian concerns as it pleases. This is a precedent much wanted, that the absurdity in politics may cease, of an independent, sovereign nation holding treaties with people living within its territorial limits, acknowledging its sovereignty and laws, and who, although not citizens, cannot be viewed as aliens, but as real subjects of the United States." Here the right of legislating for the Indians is claimed, not for the States, but for the United States; and this under the treaty of Hopewell, a treaty negotiated before the adoption of the federal constitution, and containing the amplest guaranties of the rights of the Cherokees.

In treating with the Cherokee Indians, in 1823, Messrs. Campbell and Meriwether, citizens of Georgia, animated by a strong zeal for the acquisition of Indian lands, use this language: "The sovereignty of the country which you occupy is in the United States alone; no State or foreign Power can enter into a compact with you. These privileges have passed away, and your intercourse is restricted exclusively to the United States."

In the year 1824, March 10th, the Cherokees are spoken of, in the following manner, in a letter addressed by the Senators and Representatives of Georgia to the Secretary of War: "If the Cherokees are to be viewed as other Indians, as persons suffered to reside within the territorial limits of the United States, and subject to every restraint which the policy and power of the General Government require to be imposed on them, for the interest of the Union, the interest of the particular States, and their own preservation, it is necessary that these misguided men should be taught by the General Government, that there is no alternative between their removal beyond the limits of the State of Georgia and their extinction."

In 1824, Judge White, now the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, gave an opinion, in which he expressed himself as follows: "Under the parental care of the Federal Government, the Cherokees have been in a good degree reclaimed from their savage state. Under their patronage, they have become enlightened; they have acquired a taste for property of their own, from the use of which they can exclude all others; they have acquired the property itself. There must be laws to protect it, as well as to protect those who own it. By what community ought these laws to be enacted? Laws there have always been, and laws there must continue to be, emanating from some power capable of enacting them. Where is that power? It must be in Congress, or in the Cherokees. Congress has never exercised it, the Cherokees always have. I have never heard that their power was doubted."

Governor Troup, in 1825, March 25th, issued a proclamation, from which the following is an extract: "Whereas as it is provided in said treaty that the United States shall protect the Indians against the encroachments, hostilities, and impositions of the whites, so that they suffer no interruption, molestation, or injury, in their persons, goods, effects, their dwellings, or the lands they occupy, until their removal shall have been accomplished, according to the terms of the treaty:

"I have therefore thought proper to issue this my proclamation, warning all persons, citizens of Georgia, or others, against trespassing or intruding upon lands occupied by the Indians, within the limits of this State, either for the purpose of settlement or otherwise, as every such act will be in direct violation of the provisions of the treaty aforesaid, and will expose the aggressors to the most certain and summary punishment by the authorities of the State and the United States.

"All good citizens, therefore, pursuing the dictates of good faith, will unite in enforcing the obligations of the treaty, as the supreme law," &c.

Governor Troup, being exceedingly desirous to hasten the survey of the lands acquired by the treaty of the Indian Springs, asked permission to survey them, of General McIntosh, the chief of the emigrating party, as a necessary preliminary.

In 1826, a Senator from Mississippi, now deceased, (Mr. Reed,) disclaimed any right, on the part of the State, to extend her jurisdiction over the Indians. "At the last session, said he, of the Legislature of Mississippi, a proposition was made to extend the civil power of their courts to their own citizens, who had contracted debts within the State, and had fled to this savage sanctuary. The matter was debated many days, and it was at last decided that there existed no power in the State to extend its laws in the manner sought by the proposition."

These authorities, I think, will abundantly prove that the claim of the Southern States to exercise jurisdiction over tribes with whom there are existing treaties, forms a new era. Whether it be that to which the Secretary of War alludes, I pretend not to decide.

While the Secretary of War announces this new era, the President in his message at the opening of the session informed us, that "the benevolent policy of the Government, steadily pursued for nearly thirty years, in relation to the removal of the Indians beyond the white settlements, is approaching to a happy consummation." This statement appears to me at variance with that which was made in the annual message of the last year. In that document, we were told that "it has long been the policy of Government to introduce among Indians the arts of civilization, in the hope of gradually reclaiming them from a wandering state." This is certainly a benevolent policy: and this is the policy which has been steadily pursued for nearly thirty years. But last year, the President added: "This policy has, however, been coupled with another, wholly incompatible with its success. Professing a desire to civilize and settle them, we have, at the same time, lost no opportunity to purchase their lands, and thrust them further into the wilderness. By this means, they have not only been kept in a wandering state, but have been led to look upon us as unjust and indifferent to their fate. Thus, though lavish in its expenditures on the subject, Government has constantly defeated its own policy."

Indian Affairs.

Last year the benevolent policy of settling and civilizing them had been thwarted by another, that of removal to the West, declared to be incompatible with its success. This year the removal to the West is declared to be the benevolent policy which has been steadily pursued. In my judgment, the view taken in the message of last year is the sounder.

But the policy of removal has, I grant, been pursued steadily for thirty years, but never in the same manner as now. It was never thought of, that all the treaties and laws of the United States protecting the Indians could be annulled, and the laws of the States extended over them; laws of such a character that it is admitted, nay urged, that they cannot live under them. The policy of removal has been pursued by treaty, negotiated by persuasion, urgency, if gentlemen please, with importunity. But the compulsion of State legislation, and of the withdrawal of the protection of the United States, was never before heard of. If the President means that the policy of removal under this compulsion is thirty years old, I do not know a fact on which his proposition can stand for a moment. However pursued, the policy of removal had been attended with limited success. Vast tracts of land had indeed been acquired of the Southwestern tribes, but chiefly by bringing their settlements within narrower limits. Between the years of 1809 and 1819, about one-third of the Cherokees went over to Arkansas, and the hardships and sufferings encountered by them were a chief cause why their brethren, the residue of the tribe, resisted every inducement held out to persuade them also to emigrate. The Choctaws, by the treaty of Doak's Stand, acquired a large tract of country between the Red river and the Canadian; but would not, in any considerable numbers, emigrate to it. In 1826, a part of the Creeks were forced, by the convulsions in that tribe, to emigrate, under the treaty of that year. In 1828, the Choctaws and Chickasaws sent a deputation to explore the country west of Arkansas, which returned dissatisfied with its appearance.

While the policy of removal was going on with this limited success, that of civilization, the truly benevolent policy, was much more prosperous. The attempt to settle, to civilize, and to christianize some of these tribes succeeded beyond all example. If the accounts of their previous state of barbarism are not exaggerated, the annals of the world do not, to my knowledge, present another instance of improvement so rapid, within a single generation; unless it be that which has been effected, by a similar agency, in the Sandwich Islands within the last ten years.

During all the time that these two processes were going on, that of removal, (declared last year by the President to be inconsistent with civilizing them,) with partial success; and that of settling and improving their condition, on this side of the Mississippi, in which the success had been rapid and signal, no attempt was made to encroach upon their limited independence. The right of the United States to treat with them was not questioned; the States never attempted to legislate over them; and the possessions and rights guaranteed to them by numerous treaties, were considered by them and by us as safe beneath the protection of the national faith. But, at length, under the late administration of the General Government, the Southwestern States, taking advantage of the political weakness of that administration, seemed determined to adventure the experiment, how far they could go, to effect, by a new course of State legislation, a revolution in the Indian policy of the country.

Georgia led the way. In 1828, she passed a summary law, to take effect prospectively, extending her jurisdiction, civil and criminal, over the Indian tribes within her limits. In 1829, this law, with more specific provisions, was re-enacted, to take effect on the 1st day of June, 1830. This example of Georgia was imitated by Alabama and Mississippi. By these State laws, the organization previously existing in the Indian tribes was declared unlawful, and was annulled. It was made criminal to exercise any function of Government under authority derived from the tribes. The political existence of these communities was accordingly dissolved, and their members declared citizens or subjects of the States. What a contrast, in two or three years! In 1826, after many days' debate, the Legislature of Mississippi decided that it had no right to pass a law to pursue its own citizens, being fugitive debtors, into the Indian country. In 1829, the same State extends all its laws over the Choctaws, abrogates their Government, and denounces the punishment of imprisonment on any person who should exercise any office under the authority of the tribe.

The Indians, as was natural, looked to the Government of the United States for protection. It was the quarter whence they had a right to expect it—where, as I think, they ought to have found it. They asked to be protected in the rights and possessions guaranteed to them by numerous treaties, and demanded the execution, in their favor, of the laws of the United States governing the intercourse of our citizens with the Indian tribes. They came first to the President, deeming, and rightly, that it was his duty to afford them this protection. They knew him to be the supreme executive officer of the Government; that, as such, he had but one constitutional duty to perform toward the treaties and laws—the duty of executing them. The President refused to afford the protection demanded. He informed them that he had no power, in his view of the rights of the States, to prevent their extending their laws over the Indians; and the Secretary of War, in one of his communications to them, adds the remark, that the President had as little inclination as power to do so.

When this decision of the President was taken, does not certainly appear. On the 23d day of March, 1829, he informed a delegation of Creek Indians, that, if they remained, they must become subject to the law of Alabama. On the 11th of April, the superintendent of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, by direction of the Secretary of War, stated to the Cherokee delegation, "that the Secretary of War is not now prepared to decide the question involved in the act of the Legislature of Georgia to which you refer, in which provision is made for extending the laws of Georgia over your people, after the 1st of June, 1830. It is a question which will doubtless be the subject of congressional inquiry, and what is proper in regard to it will no doubt be ordered by that body."

"In regard to the act of Georgia, no remedy exists short of one which Congress alone can apply."

On the 18th of the same month, a letter of the Secretary of War, to the same delegation, tells them, in the most positive terms, that the Indians must submit to the State laws.

On the 14th of October, the Secretary, writing to Governor Forsyth, uses this language: "At an early period, therefore, when this question arose, the Cherokees were given distinctly to understand that it was not within the competency or power of the Executive to call in question the right of Georgia to assert her own authority within her own limits; and the President has been gratified to witness the extent to which a principle so reasonable in itself, and so vitally important to State sovereignty, has received the approbation of his fellow-citizens. This oft asserted and denied right being settled, on the side of the State, to the extent that Executive interference could go, it was expected and hoped that a little longer continuance of that forbearance which Georgia has so long indulged, was all that was wanted to assure to her the purposes and objects she had before her; and after a manner, too, to which philanthropy could take no exception."

Such was the fate of the question which was to be the subject of congressional inquiry. In what way that popular sanction had been given, which the President appears to have taken in lieu of any legislative decision on this question, does not appear.

At the ensuing session of Congress, a memorial was presented to this House, signed by three thousand and eighty-five individuals of the Cherokee tribe. Another memorial was laid upon our tables from the Creeks. The subject was also presented to us in the annual message of the President, disclosing a state of facts which seemed to require, as well as to invite, the decisive action of Congress. Finally, the public mind was extensively awakened. Very numerous memorials, on the subject of the revolution which was going on in our Indian policy, were sent in to Congress. Some of these (and of this character was the first presented) approved the change: by far the greater part condemned it.

In this way, the question of the right of the State to extend her laws over Indian tribes, in contravention of treaties and the laws of the United States, was brought before Congress in the fullest and amplest manner. It was not, however, directly met. The President had, in the recess of Congress, declared that he could not, and would not, enforce the treaties and laws. The Secretary of War had almost sneered at the idea that the Indians could possess rights under a treaty forty years old; as if the validity of a treaty were impaired by the length of time its provisions had been in force. But the treaties were still preserved in our archives. The intercourse law founded upon them still stood unrepealed on the statute book; and it appears to me that the proper way in which this question was to be met, would have been a proposition to repeal the laws and abrogate the treaties.

In my judgment, there was an error in the first step taken by the President. He decided a question which he had no constitutional competency to decide. When the first movement was made by the States, he should have interposed to maintain the treaties and enforce the laws, and have referred the subject to Congress. What other power has the Executive over a treaty or a law, but to enforce it? The principle assumed by the President and by the Secretary is, that, whenever the Executive thinks a law unconstitutional, he may forbear to execute it. Now, how will this operate on other questions? Suppose Mr. Adams had thought the compact of 1802 unconstitutional, (as it was held to be in this debate last winter by a Senator from Alabama,) could he have refused to enforce it—could he have forborne to expend an appropriation granted to carry it into effect? The President has plainly intimated that the Bank of the United States is unconstitutional. Is he thereby authorized to put it out of the pale of the law? A very respectable portion of the community regards the tariff as unconstitutional, and propositions have been made to annul it by the authority of a State, and within its limits. But who ever heard that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury might between them declare it unconstitutional, and, as such, null and void? The intercourse law was passed, as it stands, in 1802; the substance of it was enacted in 1791; and the Secretary of War, with the full concurrence of the President, lays his hand on this law, which is forty years old, tells us it is unconstitutional, and, as such, not obligatory.

Let us but consider the extravagance of this doctrine. The constitution gives to the President a veto on an act of Congress in its passage; and, if he withholds his signature, it fails to become a law. But, even without the sanction of his name, without the Executive concurrence, which may be withholden on the very ground of unconstitutionality, the act becomes a law if two-thirds of Congress adhere to it. But of what use is this or any other limitation on the exercise of the President's veto, if he may annul any law and all the laws in the statute book, on the simple opinion that they are unconstitutional?

But what, it may be asked, is the President to do? How is he to proceed with an unconstitutional law? I answer this question, by asking another: how is he authorized to arrive at the conclusion that a law is unconstitutional? Is he created by the constitution a functionary to pass on the unconstitutionality of laws? I can find no such power given him in the constitution. It is one thing for a law to be ascertained and declared unconstitutional, by the competent tribunal, and another thing for it to be thought unconstitutional, by any citizen or officer called on to obey or to enforce it. The citizen is not bound to obey an unconstitutional law: for it is no law. But, if he undertakes to disobey a law, because, in his private judgment, it is unconstitutional, it is at his risk and peril; and it will not probably be long before some process of law will teach him that he is not authorized finally to adjudicate such a question. An executive officer, high or low, is certainly not bound to execute an unconstitutional law; but his simply thinking it to be unconstitutional, is a very different affair.

Suppose a collector should think the tariff unconstitutional, could he forbear to collect the duty? Could the Secretary of the Treasury, holding the same opinion, remit the duty? Could the President direct his Secretary to remit it?

In the Government under which we live, a power is provided to pass on the constitutionality of laws. The President is not that tribunal. His office is executive. The opinion he holds of the constitutionality of a law, (except when called to sign it on its passage,) he holds not officially, but as any other citizen, at his peril; and, as it is his sworn duty to execute the laws, if he refuses to execute a law, for whatever cause, he is guilty of a high breach of official duty, and commits an impeachable offence. It is the province of this House to hold him to his duty.

There is no end to the absurd consequences which would flow from an opposite principle. To what would it not lead? If the President may annul a law which he thinks unconstitutional, the Secretary may annul another which he thinks unconstitutional; and so may any of his clerks. The Clerk of your House may refuse to carry a bill which you pass to the Senate, if he thinks it unconstitutional: for, in that case, it is no more a law, on this principle, than an old newspaper. And, if gentlemen contend that they reserve to the President alone this dispensing power of refusing to execute laws which, in his private judgment, are unconstitutional, they merely give us, instead of the anarchy which would arise from its being possessed by all the executive officers, a perfect Oriental despotism, produced by imparting it to one.

We have heard a good deal said about nullification, and no small opprobrium attached to the word. Has it never occurred to some gentlemen, willing enough to stigmatize that doctrine, that they themselves have lent their countenance to the same doctrine, not in theory alone, but in practice? Georgia orders a survey of the Cherokee lands. The law of 1802 makes it highly penal to survey lands belonging or secured to Indian tribes by treaty. It subjects those who transgress the law to a thousand dollars fine and twelve months' imprisonment, and authorizes the President to call out a military force to execute the law. The President tells all concerned that he will not enforce the law, because he thinks it unconstitutional. Is not that nullification? The convention of the judges of Georgia decide all Indian treaties to be unconstitutional. Is not that nullification? And yet, if I mistake not, propositions have been made in the quarter where this nullification is practised by wholesale, to censure the doctrine as theoretically advanced in a neighboring State.

I have remarked that the direct way to meet this question would have been to propose a law abrogating the treaties and repealing the intercourse law of 1802. But a different course was pursued. A bill was presented, ably drawn and carefully worded, so as to leave this question entirely aside. Although the bill was an integral part of the policy of the States, designed to co-operate with it, and in fact built upon it as upon a foundation, it was so worded as not, in terms, to afford it any sanction. We were obliged to go to the President's message, and to the reports of the committees of the two Houses of Congress, to ascertain its character. We did so; and we discussed the policy, as it discovered itself in those documents.

But, harmless as the bill was in its terms, it could not have passed, but for the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RAMSEY,] by which amendment it was provided that "nothing in this act contained shall be construed as authorizing or directing the violation of any treaties existing between the United States and any Indian tribe." I was perfectly well persuaded, at the time, that this proviso would be without practical effect, but it saved the bill from being lost; and now, from one end of the continent to the other, this proviso is held up to show that the Indian bill of last winter does not sanction the compulsory removal of the Indians; that the treaties are to be held inviolate; and that the Indians are to be protected in their rights; all the while that it is perfectly notorious, as I shall demonstrate before I sit down, that the Indians are not to be protected; that the treaties are violated; and that this proviso is a dead letter.

The bill passed, we all remember how, under the severest coercion by the previous question, that I have ever known, applied, too, for the purpose of shutting out the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HEMPHILL,] the object of which was to obtain information in respect to the character of the country to which the Indians were to be removed. For I beg it may be recollected, after all we have heard of the factious course pursued by the minority, that all we asked was the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which proposed to send a respectable commission into this region, to see if it be fit for the habitation of the fellow-beings whom we are driving from their homes; and that this was denied us. Still the act seemed to promise something to the Indians, for it bore on its face, that the treaties were not to be violated. The money which it granted was granted conditionally: the condition was contained in a proviso; and, if that proviso were not acted up to, no appropriation was made, and no expenditure was lawful. Just two, or perhaps three days after the passage of the act, the Georgia laws took effect and went into operation over all the Indians included within the nominal boundaries of the State.

And here I reach a part of the subject, on which I dwell with great pain—the legislation of Georgia over the Cherokees. It is my duty to inquire into the character of the Georgia laws, against which our interference is invoked, and our protection demanded. I speak of the laws of Georgia individually, and not of the other States who have extended their jurisdiction over the Indians, because the legislation of Georgia is better known. I do not single out her laws invidiously. Neither do I pretend an acquaintance with her whole code. I have not seen it. A few laws only, that form a part of it, have come to my knowledge; but these are sufficient to establish my proposition, that these Indians have great and just cause to look to us for protection.

I will first speak of the effect of the Georgia legislation upon the Cherokee Government. The Cherokees, sir, have a very respectable representative Government; respectable in its character; respectable in its origin. The first sketch of it proceeded from the same pen that draughted our own declaration of independence. In 1809, Mr.

Jefferson gave this people the first elements of a system of government, adapted to their condition, which I will venture to read to the House.

"My children, deputies of the Cherokee Upper Towns:

"I have maturely considered the speeches you have delivered me, and will now give you answers to the several matters they contain.

"You inform me of your anxious desires to engage in the industrious pursuits of agriculture and civilized life; that, finding it impracticable to induce the nation at large to join in this, you wish a line of separation to be established between the Upper and Lower Towns, so as to include all the waters of the Hiwassee in your part; and that having thus contracted your society within narrower limits, you propose, within these, to begin the establishment of fixed laws and of regular Government. You say, that the Lower Towns are satisfied with the division you propose, and on these several matters you ask my advice and aid.

"With respect to the line of division between yourselves and the Lower Towns, it must rest on the joint consent of both parties. The one you propose appears moderate, reasonable, and well defined; we are willing to recognise those on each side of that line as distinct societies, and if our aid shall be necessary to mark it more plainly than nature has done, you shall have it. I think with you, that, on this reduced scale, it will be more easy for you to introduce the regular administration of laws.

"In proceeding to the establishment of laws, you wish to adopt them from ours, and such only for the present as suit your present condition; chiefly, indeed, those for the punishment of crimes and the protection of property. But who is to determine which of our laws suit your condition, and shall be in force with you? All of you being equally free, no one has a right to say what shall be law for the others. Our way is to put these questions to the vote, and to consider that as law for which the majority votes—the fool has as great a right to express his opinion by vote as the wise, because he is equally free, and equally master of himself. But as it would be inconvenient for all your men to meet in one place, would it not be better for every town to do as we do—that is to say: Choose by the vote of the majority of the town, and of the country people nearer to that than to any other town, one, two, three, or more, according to the size of the town, of those whom each voter thinks the wisest and honestest men of their place, and let these meet together, and agree which of our laws suit them. But these men know nothing of our laws. How then can they know which to adopt? Let them associate in their council our beloved man living with them, Colonel Meigs, and he will tell them what our law is on any point they desire. He will inform them also of our methods of doing business in our councils, so as to preserve order, and to obtain the vote of every member fairly. This council can make a law for giving to every head of a family a separate parcel of land, which, when he has built upon and improved, it shall belong to him and his descendants forever, and which the nation itself shall have no right to sell from under his feet. They will determine, too, what punishment shall be inflicted for every crime. In our States generally, we punish murder only by death, and all other crimes by solitary confinement in a prison.

"But when you shall have adopted laws, who are to execute them? Perhaps it may be best to permit every town, and the settlers in its neighborhood attached to it, to select some of their best men, by a majority of its voters, to be judges in all differences, and to execute the law according to their own judgment. Your council of representatives will decide on this, or such other mode as may best suit you. I suggest these things, my children, for the consideration of the Upper Towns of your nation, to be decided on as they think best, and I sincerely wish you may succeed in your laudable endeavors to save the remains of your nation, by adopting industrious occupations and a Government of regular laws. In this you may rely on the counsel and assistance of the Government of the United States. Deliver these words to your people in my name, and assure them of my friendship.

“THOMAS JEFFERSON.

“JANUARY 9, 1809.”

In 1817, this Government received the sanction of the United States, in a treaty negotiated in that year by the present Chief Magistrate, as a commissioner plenipotentiary for that purpose. In the preamble to this treaty, the incidents of 1809 are alluded to; the purpose of the Cherokees who remained on this side of the Mississippi, to begin the establishment of fixed laws and a regular Government, is recognised, together with the promise, made by Mr. Jefferson, of the patronage, aid, and good neighborhood of the United States, alike to those who emigrated and those who staid behind. This treaty was unanimously ratified by the Senate of the United States. Thus originated and thus confirmed, the Cherokee Government subsequently assumed a highly regular form, and an improved organization. Its practical operation was excellent, and it did the United States no harm, because it was assumed as the principle of our Government, that no change was to be wrought by the improved institutions of the Cherokees on their relations with us.

Of the orderly and becoming manner in which the Cherokee Government was conducted, we have the satisfactory testimony of Messrs. Campbell and Meriwether, who went among them to negotiate a treaty in 1823. I read an extract from a letter addressed by them to the council of the Cherokee nation, dated Newtown, 16th October, 1823:

“Friends and brothers: We are happy that a short time has been consumed in the correspondence between you and the State commissioners.

“This has afforded us an opportunity of becoming partially acquainted with several members of this council. For the whole body we entertain a high respect, and we trust that with some of you we have contracted individual friendships. In saying this, we do no violence to our feelings, neither do we lower the elevated character of the United States. People who have never seen you, know but little of your progress in the arts of civilized life, and of the regular and becoming manner in which your affairs are conducted.

“Your improvement reflects the greatest credit upon yourselves, and upon the Government by which you have been improved and fostered.”

Such was and is the Cherokee Government which Georgia has avowed her purpose, by one sweeping act of legislation, to put down. That State has enacted a law making it highly penal to exercise any of the functions of this Government. Chiefs, headmen, members of the council, judicial and executive officers, are all subject to four years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, if they presume to exercise any of the functions of Government within their own tribe, and under that constitution which we originally and repeatedly exhorted them to frame.

In this way the greatest confusion is at once introduced into the concerns of this unhappy people. Their own Government is outlawed, and it is made highly penal to execute its functions. The protection of the United States is withdrawn, because Georgia has extended her laws over the Indians; and Georgia herself, although asserting, and in many respects exercising, her jurisdiction, has not yet organized it in such a manner as to keep the peace among this afflicted race. Their system of Government, instead of being regarded as almost all Governments, however defective, are entitled to be, as an institution necessary for the wellbeing of the people, which ought to be treated with tenderness, and not be destroyed till a substitute is provided, has been abated and broken down as a nuisance.

But among the laws of Georgia, extended over the Cherokees, there are some which, from their nature, must take an immediate effect; and among these I cannot but notice several whose operation must be as injurious to the welfare of the Indians, as the entire system is destructive of their rights. At the late session of the Georgia Legislature, a law was passed, “that no Cherokee Indian should be bound by any contract, hereafter to be entered into, with a white person or persons; nor shall any Indian be liable to be fined in any of the courts of law or equity in this State, on such a contract.” I am aware that laws of this kind have been found necessary among the dwindling remnants of tribes, in some of the States, whose members are so degenerate that they are unable to preserve, against the arts of corrupt white men, the little property they possess. But among the Cherokees are men of intelligence and shrewdness, who have acquired and possess large accumulations of property—houses, shops, plantations, stock, mills, ferries, and other valuable possessions; men who understand property and its uses as well as we do, and who need all the laws which property requires for its judicious management. Notwithstanding this, Georgia, at one blow, makes all these people incapable of contracting. Men as competent as ourselves to all business transactions, are reduced by a sweeping law to a state of pupillage.

[Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, explained, that this law was passed for the benefit of the Indians, to prevent their being imposed on. That it did not release white men from their engagements to Indians, but Indians from their engagements to white men.]

I understood and stated the law, said Mr. E., precisely as the gentleman from Georgia states it. I know this character may be claimed for the law. But how does it seek the benefit of the Indians? By reducing them to a state of minority. Sir, it is for the benefit and protection of children, that they are unable to contract; but still they are children, and the law holds them to their infancy. And what sort of a boon is it to men of large property and active dealings, to pass a law releasing them from their contracts? Does it not directly follow, that, if they cannot be held to their contracts, no one will contract with them; and that the apparent limitation of the law, which exempts the Indian, while it binds the white man, is illusory; for who will contract with a person who is, by law, exonerated from compliance with his engagements? Such a law can have no other effect among Indians than among white men; and what would be the effect on the business of a community of white men, to enact a law releasing them from all engagements into which they might enter?

By the law of Georgia, of 1829, the testimony of an Indian was declared inadmissible in any case in which a white man is a party. This law was generally condemned during the discussions of last year. The objections taken to it were declared by some of the advocates of the course pursued by Georgia to be unreasonable, captious, and groundless, and were set down to the score of morbid sensibility and political philanthropy. Now, what has been the practical operation of this feature in the Georgia law? Governor Gilmer thus describes it in his message, at the opening of the late session of the Georgia Legislature:

“It is also due to our Indian people, that that provision in the law of 1829 should be repealed, which prevents Indians, and the descendants of Indians, from being competent witnesses in the courts of the State, in cases where a white man is a party. The present law exposes them to great oppression, while its repeal would probably injure no one. Attempts have been made to strip them of their property by forged contracts, because of the impossibility of defending their rights, by the testimony of those who alone can know them. And although 'the moral feeling of our frontier community has been too correct to permit such infamous proceedings to effect their ends; yet the character of our legislation for justice requires that the rights of those people should not be exposed to such danger.'

Such is the character which Governor Gilmer gives of this law, and of its operation. I have heard some details of the oppressions to which he alludes. I have no reason to doubt their truth; but I will not repeat them to the House, without vouchers to support them. I will only add, that this law rejecting the testimony of Indians, remains un repealed; and that their rights and property are still dependent on "the moral feeling of the frontier community" of Georgia. That frontier community must have better feelings and principles than usually actuate a part of every community, if, in the continued operation of this law, the Indians are not subjected to the most grievous oppressions.

I will mention another law of the new code. Its design may be imperfectly apprehended by me: and if I err in the motive for which I suppose it was enacted, I hope I shall be excused, on the ground of the great difficulty of picking up here and there—one law in this newspaper, and another in that—the information which, as it seems to me, ought to have been spread before us, in an ample detail, to enlighten and guide our legislation. The law to which I allude, subjects all white persons, who shall reside within the Cherokee country without a permit from the Governor of Georgia, or such agent as the Governor shall authorize, and who shall not have taken an oath of allegiance as a citizen of Georgia, to four years' imprisonment at hard labor in the penitentiary. Now, I should be glad to be informed where, on her own principles, Georgia gets the right to exact such an oath from all persons resident on her soil, granting the Cherokee country to be her soil. The constitution of the United States gives Georgia no such right. It is there provided, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." Grant that the country is subject to her laws: what right has she to tender to the citizens of another State an oath of allegiance as citizens of Georgia? If I go to Savannah or Milledgeville, and demean myself peaceably, I wish to know what right, under the constitution, Georgia possesses to shut me up to hard labor in her penitentiary, if I will not take an oath, as a citizen of that State.* I am told that this law is intended to strike at the missionaries. I do not assert the fact, nor ascribe motives to men or bodies of men. If this is its design, as it will unquestionably be its effect, I trust it will be borne in mind that the missionaries were introduced into the Cherokee nation under very respectable auspices. It was during the administration of Mr. Madison, and with the express consent and approbation of Mr. Crawford, while this gentleman held the office of Secretary of War. His letter to Mr. Kingsbury, to this effect, is among the documents formerly communicated to the House. The missionaries were then promised the protection, countenance, and co-operation of the Government; and the annual appropriation for civilizing the Indians was recommended to be made, and has been applied in furtherance of their operations. They are, to say the very least, an innocent and harmless class of men. They expressly disclaim having interfered in the political relations of the Cherokees with the United States. They have unquestionably been the instruments of great good. If this region, and its ill-fated inhabitants, were swallowed up to-morrow by an earthquake, and sunk from existence, the missionaries would have left monuments of their benevolent labors, which will last as long as the history or the memory of this generation lasts; yes, sir, as long as the earth and the heavens shall last.* The law I have quoted is supposed to aim at their exclusion.

Thus far it is possible that Georgia (and I again beg leave to say that I name that State not invidiously) may be thought by some persons not to have gone beyond some abstract right of civil jurisdiction, capable of being reconciled with a "possessory right," in which the Indians were promised by the Executive to be protected. But Georgia has not stopped here. In the course of the year 1829, it was found that this region possessed, and probably in abundance, veins of gold. As soon as this discovery was made, intruders from every quarter, and from all the States in the neighborhood, flocked into the gold region, and overran the land. The Indians demanded their removal by the agent. The agent referred the case to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War gave the requisite orders for their removal. This took place before the 1st day of June, 1830. That day the laws of Georgia took effect. And very shortly afterwards I read a proclamation in the papers, proceeding from a gentleman whom I most highly respect, the present Governor of Georgia, and which appeared to be of a character so strange and unexpected, that I could scarcely credit my senses as I read it. Let me read a portion of this proclamation to the House, which bears date 3d June, 1830.

"Whereas it has been discovered that the lands in the territory now occupied by the Cherokee Indians, within the limits of this State, abound with valuable minerals, and especially gold: and whereas the State of Georgia has the fee simple title to said lands, and the entire and exclusive property of the gold and silver therein: and whereas numerous persons, citizens of this and other States, together with the Indian occupants of said territory, taking advantage of the law of this State, by which its jurisdiction over said territory was not assumed until the 1st day of June last past, have been engaged in digging for gold in said land, and taking therefrom great amounts in value, thereby appropriating riches to themselves, which, of right, equally belonged to every other citizen of the State, and in violation of the rights of the State, and to the injury of its public resources," &c. And then the Governor warns "all persons, whether citizens of this or other States, or Indian occupants, to cease all further trespass on the lands of this State, and especially from taking any gold or silver from the lands included within the territory occupied by the Cherokee Indians," &c. All further trespass on their own lands, and all further digging for their own gold!

It is true the Governor, in his message at the opening of the late session of the Legislature of Georgia, attempts to justify this strange pretension. "The right thus asserted," says he, "was supposed to be established by the customary law of all the European nations who made discoveries, or formed colonies, on the continent, by the fee simple or allodial title, which belongs to the State, to all lands within its limits, not already granted away, and the absence of all right in the Indians, they never having appropriated the mineral riches of the earth to their own use." Neither had Georgia appropriated these mines by occupation. As soon as the Cherokees knew their existence, they proceeded to take possession of, and to work them, till they were driven away by the laws of Georgia, and the troops of the United States. What force there can be in the English common law of fee simple and allodial title, to control the stipulations of a treaty between the United States and a tribe of Indians, I confess my inability to imagine. The argument from the customary law of the European conquistadores proves a great deal too much. It would justify the Governor, not only in seizing the gold mines, but in reducing the Indians themselves to bondage, and to labor in the mines. The Portuguese did this, and so did the Spaniards. The slave trade was projected by the benevolent Las Casas, to relieve the Indians from digging their own gold for their conquerors.

When this subject was under the consideration of the House, at the last session, I certainly did not entertain very favorable auguries of the treatment which the Cherokees were likely to receive; but it never entered into my head that they were to be denied a right to their own mines. On the contrary, I assumed it as a matter of course, that they were the lawful and admitted owners of this mineral wealth. Having, in the course of my remarks on this subject, had occasion to allude to the intruders into the gold region, before I could finish the sentence in which I made that allusion, a gentleman, who voted for the Indian bill, interrupted me, with the prompt assurance that these intruders were ordered to be removed by the Executive. I was gratified at the information, although it was then no more (as I thought) than a matter of course. My next information on the subject was derived from Governor Gilmer's proclamation, claiming for Georgia the absolute property of the gold mines, and warning the Indians to desist from digging them.

Extraordinary as this is, I fear something more extraordinary remains to be told. By the intercourse law, the Executive is authorized to employ the military force of the United States to remove intruders from lands belonging or secured to Indians by treaty. This power has several times been exercised. But the Indians also possess, by treaty, the right of proceeding summarily to redress themselves. They possess the right by the treaty of Holston, negotiated in 1791. The Secretary of War, in alluding to the right which the Indians thus possess, under the treaty of Holston, speaks of it disparagingly as a treaty forty years old. But it will be recollected that, with all the other treaties, it was confirmed by an express article in that of 1817. What are the terms in which this right is secured to the Indians by the treaty of Holston?

"If any citizen of the United States, or other person, 'not being an Indian, shall settle on any of the Cherokee lands, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Cherokees may punish him or 'not, as they please.'—Treaty of Holston, Art. 8th.

In pursuance of this right, guaranteed by treaty, but flowing from that law of nature which is before all treaty, the Indians have exercised this power of protecting themselves from intruders: nor was it, that I know of, ever questioned by any administration till this. It has received the sanction of the present Chief Magistrate in the amplest terms. In a letter to Path Killer, and other Cherokee chiefs, dated Head Quarters, Nashville, 18th Jan. 1821, General Jackson thus expressed himself:

"Friends and brothers: I have never told a red brother a lie, nor deceived him. The intruders, if they attempt to return, will be sent off. But your light-horse should not let them settle down on your land. You ought to drive the stock away from your lands, and deliver the intruders to the agent; but if you cannot keep intruders from your land, report it to the agent, and, on his notice, I will drive them from your land. I am your friend and brother,

"ANDREW JACKSON."

In pursuance of the authority conferred on the tribe, by the treaty of Holston, an authority to the exercise of which they had been exhorted, a few years ago, by General Jackson, and of which the validity was, I believe, never questioned before, the Cherokees, in the course of the last year, in consequence of the number and disorderly conduct of the intruders upon their lands, proceeded to remove a portion of them. This step, which they were perfectly warranted to take, occasioned a hostile incursion from Georgia, in the result of which one Indian was killed, and some others wounded and carried prisoners into Georgia. This occurrence occasioned the detachment of a party of United States' troops into the Cherokee country, who accordingly came, rather, as it would seem, to protect the intruders from the Cherokees, than the Cherokees from the intruders. Being there, orders were given to the troops to remove intruders from the gold region, and these orders were at first complied with, but with partial success: for, as soon as a band of gold diggers were driven from one spot, they settled in another, like hungry vultures frightened from their prey. They are said to have been a colluvies of all classes and characters; a lawless and desperate gang. And here ensued a scene of a character bordering on comedy, if any thing can be considered burlesque in so grave a matter. I give it as it is related in the memorial of the Cherokee Indians, on our tables:

"In another case, in the name and authority of George R. Gilmer, Governor of Georgia, a bill was filed in chancery, in the superior court of Hall county, in July last, against certain sundry Cherokees, praying for an injunction to stop them from digging and searching for gold within the limits of their own nation; and the bill being sworn to before the same A. S. Clayton, he awarded an injunction against the parties named in the bill as defendants, commanding them, forthwith, to desist from working on those mines, under the penalty of twenty thousand dollars, at a time and place where there were unmolested several thousand intruders from Georgia and other States, engaged in robbing the nation of gold, for which the owners were ordered not to work by the said writ. Under the authority of this injunction, the sheriff of Hall county, with an armed force, invaded the nation, consisting of a colonel, a captain, and thirty or forty militia of the State of Georgia, who arrested a number of Cherokees engaged in digging for gold, who were at first rescued by the troops of the United States stationed near the place, and the sheriff and his party themselves made prisoners, and conducted fifteen miles to the military camp, when a council of examination was held, and the exhibition of their respective authorities was made, which resulted in the release of the sheriff and his party, and a written order by the commanding officer of the United States' troops, directing the Cherokees to submit to the authority of Georgia, and that no further protection could be extended to the Cherokees at the gold mines, as he could no longer interfere with the laws of Georgia, but would afford aid in carrying them into execution. On the return of the sheriff and his party, they passed by the Cherokees, who were still engaged in digging for gold, and ordered them to desist, under the penalty of being committed to jail, and proceeded to destroy their tools and machinery for gleaming gold, and, after committing some further aggression, they returned. Shortly afterwards, the sheriff, with a guard of four men, and a process from the State of Georgia, arrested three Cherokees for disobeying the injunction, while peaceably engaged in their labors, and conducted them to Wadkinsville, a distance of seventy-five miles, before the same A. S. Clayton, who then and there sentenced them to pay a fine of ninety-three dollars, cost, and stand committed to prison until paid, and also compelled them to give their bond in the sum of one thousand dollars, for their personal appearance before his next court, to answer the charges of violating the writ of injunction aforesaid. In custody they were retained five days, paid the cost, gave the required bond, and did appear accordingly, as bound by Judge Clayton, who dismissed them on the ground that the Governor of Georgia could not become a prosecutor in the case. For the unwarrantable outrage committed on their liberty and persons, no apology was made, and the cost they had paid was not refunded."

I confess, when I first read the account of this incident, in the papers last summer, I supposed it was the wild freak of some inconsiderate subaltern; I did not imagine that it could have taken place by order from the Executive of the United States. The affair is but partially explained in any document I have seen; but thus much is certain, that orders were sent by the Secretary of War to the Cherokee agent, and to the officer commanding the troops of the United States, to forbid the Cherokees as well as the intruders from digging the gold mines. On the 26th June, 1830, an order was issued from the War Department at Washington to the officer commanding the United States' troops in the Cherokee country, "directing him, until further orders, to prevent all persons 'from working the mines, or searching for or carrying away gold or silver, or either metal, from the Cherokee nation.'"

This order was communicated by the agent to Mr. Ross, the principal chief of the Cherokees, in a letter dated 10th July, 1830, in which he says: "I have also enclosed you a copy of a letter from the War Department, on the subject of the gold mines, by which you will see that all persons are ordered to be kept from digging for gold until further order; and have to request that you will, in such way as you think best, make it known to the Indians, and also that you will advise them to desist for the present, as I am very desirous that no difficulties should take place between the United States' troops and them on the subject."

And now, sir, I think I may safely appeal to many gentlemen of the House, who voted for the Indian bill last winter, whether it entered into their imaginations that, under that bill, and with its proviso, the Indians should be prohibited by the armed force of the United States from digging gold within the limits secured to them by numerous treaties. There were gentlemen, I know, who voted for the bill, condemning the policy of which it is a part, but deeming it necessary to save the Indians. Others thought something ought to be done, in consequence of the compact of 1802. Others were influenced by some refined notion of a jurisdiction co-extensive with the charter. Did any of them mean or intend that, within less than a twelvemonth—within less than three months—after adopting a proviso that the treaties should not be violated, the Cherokees should be driven, by the bayonet of our United States' troops, from gold mines within the boundaries secured to them by treaty and law? The winding up of this affair was in keeping with its commencement and progress. The object of marching the troops into the Cherokee country, according to Major General Macomb, "was to guard against the difficulties which it was apprehended would grow out of the conflicting operations of the Cherokees and the lawless intruders upon the mineral district within the State of Georgia. Having fulfilled the instructions of the Government, the troops were directed to return for the winter to their respective quarters."

On the 29th of October last, Governor Gilmer wrote to the Secretary of War, requesting the removal of the troops, on the ground that the State of Georgia could enforce her own laws. On the 10th of November, the Secretary answers him, that, previously to the receipt of his letter, (two days before,) the troops had been ordered out of the Cherokee nation, because the purposes for which they had been sent into it were, in a great measure, accomplished. This object, according to the general commanding in chief, was to prevent collisions between the Cherokees and lawless intruders into the gold district. It was answered, by removing both!

And here it is obvious to ask, how, on the ground assumed by Georgia, and sanctioned by the Executive of the United States, the President could feel himself authorized to employ the armed force of the United States in removing gold diggers, lawless or lawful, Indians or white men, from the gold mines of Georgia, if Georgia's they must be? It is not his duty to enforce the laws of Georgia, nor to protect her property. She maintains that she is able to do it herself. Nay, the still broader question presents itself—what right, on the ground assumed by Georgia and the Executive, have we to go upon the soil of Georgia to remove or bribe away a part of her subjects or citizens? What right to keep an agent there, or to pay them an annuity? Am I answered, it is done in pursuance of treaties? The treaties are declared unconstitutional and void. Sir, it happens now to accord with the interest of Georgia to permit it, but surely she will not bend her principles to her interest.

It has been urged against the Colonization Society, on very high authority, that it is unconstitutional for the United States to go into a State to remove a part of its colored population. In a very able report made to the Senate, I think at the first session of the twentieth Congress, I find the following argument:

"Before they leave this part of the subject, the committee will observe that the framers of the constitution most wisely abstained from bestowing upon the Government, thereby created, any powers whatever over the colored population, as such, whether this population was 'bond or free.

"If the United States possess the right to intrude into any State, for the purpose of withdrawing from thence its free colored population, they undoubtedly must exert practically the power of previously deciding what persons are embraced within this description. They must have the power of determining finally not only who are 'colored, but who are free persons. This committee believe, however, that any attempt, by the United States, to exercise such a power, would not only be a direct violation of the constitution, but must be productive of the 'worst effects."

Now, sir, it is not necessary to consider how far this argument applies to the operations of the Colonization Society. But on the principle that the Indian country is a part of the soil, and its occupants a portion of the people of the State, I confess I do not see how gentlemen who stand on the ground of State rights and strict construction of the constitution, can move an inch in this matter. What, sir, constitutional for the General Government to go into the counties of Georgia, into Hall and Habersham, to get the people of those counties together—people subject to the laws of Georgia—make a compact with them to move away in a body—take millions of money out of the treasury of the United States to effect this object—to enable the President to go upon the soil of Georgia, and buy off her people! In what part of the constitution, on the principles which gentlemen set up, is there a word to warrant such a policy, or to justify an appropriation of money to carry it into operation?

I know it has been answered, that it is constitutional to fulfil a compact. I must own that this mode of getting at a grant of power is, for statesmen who advocate a strict constitution, liberal enough. According to this principle, the General Government may enter into a compact to do an unconstitutional thing, and it thereby becomes constitutional. On the ground upon which this new Indian policy rests, the compact of 1802 was itself unconstitutional, and was so argued to be in the Senate last winter. If the soil and jurisdiction of this territory were already Georgia's, the United States had no right to interfere with it, not even to extinguish the Indian title on peaceable and reasonable terms. Unless the principles of the constitution vary with the complexion of those who are the subjects of its provisions, the United States have just as little right to enter into compact to extinguish the title of the red men of one county of Georgia, as that of the white men of another county. The gentlemen are actually obliged to come to us for principles on which they can remove the Indians. Unless the treaties are valid, the United States have no power to act in this matter. Gentlemen deny the validity of the treaties, in order to get at the soil; and then come back to the treaty-making power, to get the Indians removed from it.

The conduct which Georgia has pursued with respect to the gold, forcibly reminds me of the opposite course adopted by Mr. Jefferson, in reference to some iron mines discovered at the mouth of the Chickamauga, in Tennessee. Tennessee did not claim these mineral treasures, but the Indians themselves expressed a wish to cede these mines to the United States, for the purpose of having them wrought. Mr. Jefferson accordingly negotiated a treaty of cession for six miles square, including these mines, and gave the following reasons to the Senate as his inducement: "As such an establishment would occasion a considerable and certain demand for corn and other provisions and necessities, it seemed probable that it would immediately draw around it a close settlement of the Cherokees; would encourage them to enter on a regular life of agriculture; familiarize them with the practice and value of the arts; attach them to property; lead them of necessity, and without delay, to the establishment of laws and Government, and thus make a great and important advance towards assimilating their condition with ours."

But the seizure of the gold mines, violent as that measure is, beyond any thing that was or could have been apprehended, loses its importance, when contrasted with another act of great, of unexampled, and, I must add, stupendous injustice. I refer to the law which has passed the Legislature of Georgia, for the survey and disposal of the lands of the Cherokees. Let it be remembered, then,

1. That there is a boundary between the Cherokees and the States surrounding them, fixed by numerous treaties and by law.

2. Let it be remembered that the treaty of Holston, which was negotiated in 1791, on instructions previously ratified by a unanimous Senate, contains this simple and expressive pledge: "The United States solemnly guaranty to the Cherokee nation all their land not hereby ceded."

3. That, as late as 1817, this, as one of the previous treaties, was declared to be "in full force," with all its "immunities and privileges;" and that this confirmation is contained in a treaty, negotiated by the present Chief Magistrate, and unanimously ratified by the Senate.

4. And that the intercourse act makes it highly penal to survey the lands belonging or secured to any Indian tribe by treaty.

And now, sir, I hold in my hand a law of Georgia, authorizing the survey of the lands thus solemnly guaranteed; their division into districts and sections, and their distribution by a land lottery!

There is a provision in this act of Georgia, by which, if the President of the United States should execute his sworn duty, in enforcing the laws of the United States, he would subject himself to imprisonment for five years in the Georgia penitentiary; that being the punishment denounced by this State law on any person who shall obstruct the surveys, which it is most assuredly the duty of the President to do.

The law provides for the survey of the country into sections and districts. The sectional surveyors, twelve in number, are to proceed, with as little delay as possible, to the duties assigned them. The survey of the districts is to be suspended until the next meeting of the General Assembly, and until further enactments for that purpose. The number of district surveyors is one hundred and ninety-six, and the Governor is authorized to call out a military force to protect them in the discharge of their duties.

The only mitigation of the severity with which this bill acts on the Indians, is the provision contained in the thirty-first section. By this section, it is directed that "the Indians and their descendants, who have made improvements upon the territory, are to be protected in the possession of those improvements, and of the lots of land upon which the said improvements are made, until otherwise directed by the General Assembly, or until they are voluntarily abandoned by the Indian occupants. Indians not allowed to sell their right of occupancy to any person, unless it be to the Government of the United States, or the Government of Georgia, for the use of the persons drawing such improved lots in the lottery, and no grant to be issued until the Indians shall have abandoned the lots in their occupancy; the fortunate drawers of such improved lots to forfeit their draws, should they, by threats, or menaces, or violence, remove, or attempt to remove, any Indian from such improved lot."

How much this mitigation is worth, may be judged of, by considering that it exists only during the pleasure of the General Assembly, and that the evidence of the Indian occupants, and of all those able to support his title, is inadmissible in the Georgia courts. In this state of things, it little matters whether he be expelled at once, or his estate be thrown into a land lottery, to be drawn as a prize, and a "fortunate drawer" planted at his door, or dogging him, wherever he goes, till he voluntarily abandons his home.

Especially when we recollect that, objectionable as this law is, a still more objectionable and oppressive measure was proposed and strenuously advocated, and, if I am not misinformed, adopted, in the House of Representatives of Georgia. I derive my information from a letter written from Milledgeville, and published in the Augusta Chronicle. I know nothing of its author, but that, as appears on the face of the letter, he is a friend of the present administration.

Extract of a letter to the Editor of the Augusta Chronicle, from a correspondent in Milledgeville, dated 27th November, 1830.

"The particular question now and for several days past before the House, is the adoption of Mr. Hayne's substitute to the bill reported by Judge Schley, from the Committee on the state of the Republic. This contemplates, as you are aware, the taking immediate possession of the Indian lands, and forcibly driving the Indians therefrom. How such a bill can be the subject of a moment's consideration in a christian land, is to me the subject of the deepest astonishment, and yet many intelligent men believe and fear it may be successful. For my own part, I will not believe it possible, and indeed should scarcely credit the evidence of my own senses, if such were the fact. God forbid such a fatal consequence! and I will confidently rely on his overruling goodness and protection to avert it, to save the Indians—nay, tenfold more, to save our own State from the serious evils which must inevitably follow it. I must not trust my feelings further on this point; they are perhaps too deeply and unnecessarily wounded. We will at least hope so. One thing is certain, that no effort is or will be spared to prevent the adoption of the measure; and I am proud to see among its opponents many, very many, of the first and ablest men of the Assembly of both parties. Indeed, it is by no means a party matter, &c.

"Numerous as are the advocates of this measure, the array of talent against it is very powerful, and the arguments of its opponents are sound and incontrovertible. To say nothing of humanity; the want of necessity or expediency; the ingratitude of opposing the President and his administration, which have long been and still are making every possible effort in our behalf; the folly of now necessarily arraying them against us, contrary to their will, and of indirectly giving their and our enemy, Mr. Clay, still further and greater power against them; the imminent danger of a direct and violent controversy with the General Government, all of which are directly opposed to this measure, the faith and honor of the State stand openly and irrevocably pledged against it. But for this pledge given by our representatives, Mr. Wilde and others, on the floor of Congress, last session, against the exercise of any force against the Indians, any effort to drive them forcibly from their lands, the bill to encourage their emigration to the west of the Mississippi would not and could not have been passed."

This bill with some amendments passed the House of Representatives of Georgia, 76 to 55. I read this to show that it is not merely "the white savages of the North," nor the opponents of this administration, who condemn the course pursued by Georgia. But I do not find that the law passed is essentially better. The evil is only delayed. The lands improved by the Indians are not exempted from the lottery. An amendment to that effect was rejected, by a vote of nearly two to one; and after the lottery is drawn, the unhappy occupant is only to keep possession till "the fortunate drawer" can persuade him to go.

And now, sir, is there a member of this House, who can recollect that the United States have solemnly guaranteed this land to the Indians; that we guaranteed it for a valuable consideration, which we keep; that we guaranteed it voluntarily, unanimously, and before the compact of 1802, and not feel that the guaranty ought to be re-deemed; that the pledged faith of the country ought not to be violated?

I again appeal to gentlemen, who, without approving of the principles of this policy, gave their votes for the bill of last session, qualified as it was by the proviso, whether they would have lent their sanction to the measure, had they believed that, within a twelvemonth, a law would be passed by Georgia, to send any army of surveyors into the territory of the Cherokees, and to subject any person who should presume to execute your laws, to the punishment of the penitentiary, from the President of the United States down to the lowest officer in the service?

Why, sir, granting that all these treaties made by the United States are unconstitutional and not binding; granting the truly atrocious proposition, that we can break the treaty, and keep the consideration; granting that Georgia still possesses the power, which, if she ever had it, by adopting the constitution she gave up to the United States, and that things now stand as they stood under the old confederation, all this would not mend her title to these lands. Under the confederation, she admitted the right of the Cherokees to treat as an independent nation. She treated with them herself; the treaty of Augusta in 1783 stands in her statute book; and in that treaty, in words evidently of her own choosing, words of the English common law, she accepts a cession of land from the Cherokees, and in so doing recognises their right to cede, and to keep what they do not cede. I will read to the House the first and sixth articles of that treaty.

"Whereas a good understanding and union between 'the inhabitants of the said State and the Indians aforesaid are reciprocally necessary and convenient, as well 'on account of a friendly intercourse and trade, as for the 'purposes of peace and humanity; it is, therefore, agreed 'and covenanted—

"1st. That all differences between the said parties, 'heretofore subsisting, shall cease and be forgotten.

"6th. And lastly, they, the said headmen, warriors, 'and chiefs, whose hands and seals are hereunto affixed, 'do hereby, for themselves and for the nation they are empowered to, and do effectually, represent, recognise, declare, and acknowledge, that all the lands, woods, waters, 'game, lying and being in the State, eastward of the line 'hereinbefore particularly mentioned and described, is, are, 'and do belong, and of right appertain, to the people and 'Government of the State of Georgia; and they, the In'dians aforesaid, as well for themselves as the said nation, 'do give up, release, alien, relinquish, and forever quit 'claim to the same, or any part thereof."

Now, what would have been thought of the transaction if, the day after signing this treaty and accepting this cession, Georgia had laid claim to all the rest of the land; had passed a law disposing of it; had gone into the country (supposing her to have been, what, at that period, she most assuredly was not, strong enough for that purpose) with an army of surveyors; and divided it out for distribution by a land lottery? It would have been thought an unparalleled breach of good faith.

But I will go further than this: Suppose there had been no treaty at all—not even a state of peace—suppose that the armies of Georgia had done what, at that time, it was wholly impossible for them to do—suppose they had overrun and conquered the land, even then the laws of nations and civilized warfare would not have justified this measure. Why, sir, as a war measure, and in the hot blood of victory, such a thing has never, in modern times, been heard of, as the forcible seizure of the entire domain of a conquered people, a partition of it into sections, the unoccupied part of which are to be immediately taken possession of, and the improved parts thrown into a lottery with the rest. It comes up to the precedent of the Norman conquest, and goes beyond the partition of Poland. I doubt if a single Polish proprietor has been disturbed in the possession of his estate, from the date of the first partition to the present day. Suppose that Russia, and Austria, and Prussia, in addition to extending their laws over the Poles, had enacted a code, under which it was admitted that they could not live, had cut up their lands into districts and sections, thrown their estates into a land lottery, granting to the proprietors no other privilege but that of occupancy, till they could be induced by legal duress and governmental persecution to emigrate to the deserts of Bucharra! What language would have furnished adequate terms for the condemnation of such a policy?

The very ground on which Georgia claims the right to pursue this course, is the strongest reason why she should not pursue it. Sir, she denies that they are an independent or even separate community. She says they are her citizens or subjects; calls them "her people;" constitutes them an integral part of her community; and then passes a law to distribute their lands by a lottery. Does not this show the injustice of the measure? Let her pass a law to dispose by lottery of the property of the people of Chatham and Effingham, of Richmond and Columbia; let her plant a "fortunate drawer" at the door of each man's shop and house, and the gate of his plantation, to worry him off to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. No, sir, the very process of reasoning, by which Georgia would withdraw the Cherokees from our protection, can serve only to bring them under her own, and is itself the most incontrovertible of all arguments against this oppressive policy.

But we live under a Federal Union, designed to bring all the States, to a certain degree, under one Government, and possessing tribunals of eminent jurisdiction, for the adjustment of controversies which are placed by the constitution within the province of such tribunals. What is the aspect of this affair, in reference to this Federal Union, and the authority of its tribunals?

Let it then first be borne in mind, that Georgia in 1789 voluntarily became a party to the constitution, "which is the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding;" and that it is also a provision of that constitution, to which Georgia is a voluntary party, that "the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

Indian Affairs.

Under her new laws, Georgia has proceeded to take the life of an Indian, for a murder alleged to have been committed on another Indian, within the Cherokee boundary. It belongs, in no degree, to my argument, to inquire into the guilt of this person. I have seen but an imperfect newspaper report of his trial, in a paper friendly to the policy of Georgia, which I mention only as authorizing the presumption that the report is probably not strained against Georgia. From that report, it appears that Corn Tassel (such is the name of this Indian; it is also the first Indian name subscribed to the great Hopewell treaty) was found guilty of murder, chiefly on evidence which would not be admissible against the life of a white man, (I mean Indian evidence,) and on the testimony of a white man, whose evidence is contradicted by the judge in his charge. Now, whatever may be said against the admissibility of Indian testimony in cases of property, I am clear that, in a case of life and death, as good evidence ought to be required to convict an Indian as a white man. The jury that puts an Indian to death, needs, I think, as clear a warrant of credible evidence against him, as the jury that puts a white man to death. The other testimony, to which I have alluded, is that of the officer who arrested Tassel, who testified that at first he talked only in the Indian language, but afterwards spoke English intelligibly. The judge, who sat in the trial, mentions it as a circumstance to be regretted, that the prisoner at the bar "could not understand him."

But though I am inclined to think there was not evidence to establish the malice, I waive that point entirely, and do not pretend that Tassel is an object of sympathy. I go upon the assumption that he was guilty, though I do not think that proved on the trial as reported. This "unfortunate" being, (as he is justly called by Judge Clayton,) on his trial before a court and jury, whose language he did not understand, pleaded by his counsel to the jurisdiction of the court. The ground of this plea appears to have been, that, under the treaties between the United States and the Cherokees, the latter were independent of the laws of Georgia. This plea was reserved for the consideration of all the judges. They overruled it, mainly on the ground that these treaties were unconstitutional, and could not bind Georgia.

Here the momentous bearings of the question begin to appear. Georgia decides that numerous Indian treaties, negotiated during nearly fifty years, sanctioned by every branch of the Federal Government, under every administration, and by Georgia herself, at whose request, and for whose benefit many of them were entered into, are all unconstitutional and void. Whence the courts of Georgia derived the power to decide on the constitutionality of treaties and laws of the United States, I do not know. Her constitution does not give it to her; and if it did, it would be a void grant, for Georgia is a voluntary party to the federal constitution made prior to her own.

The right of deciding in cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties, is one of the rights expressly granted by the people of Georgia to the federal judiciary. The allegation, that the Indian treaties are unconstitutional, is no more than might be made of any other treaties, that of Louisiana, for instance, (which was at first supposed by Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison to require an amendment of the constitution to carry it into effect;) and if the judges of a State can entertain the question of the constitutionality of the Cherokee treaties, I see no reason why they cannot do it in the case of any others.

It will easily be supposed, that the unfortunate being whose life was at stake, would be disposed by his counsel to maintain the validity of these treaties; and he accordingly applies for that writ of error, which, under the judiciary act, issues, as a matter of course, when duly demanded. This was a case arising under the law and the treaties, the validity of which was denied by Georgia, and affirmed on behalf of the Indian. The citation issues in the usual form, the form in which it has been respected by the courts of the most powerful and enlightened States of the Union, who understand and love their rights as well as Georgia. This writ the Legislature of Georgia instructs the Governor and all other officers "to disregard, and with it every mandate and process that has been or shall be served upon him or them, purporting to proceed from the Chief Justice or any associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the purpose of arresting the criminal laws of this State."

In other words, Georgia repeals for herself a considerable portion of the 25th section of the judiciary act of Congress, and annuls, in all criminal cases, the 2d section of the 3d article of the constitution of the United States. Georgia, on the principles she has now asserted, has only to make it penal to do any act or thing under a law of the United States, and she thereby acquires exclusive jurisdiction over the subject, and annuls the law.

This is a much more compendious process than a convention of the people of a State, elsewhere proposed. And almost at the moment that this House resolves, by a majority nearly unexampled, that it will not repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act, Georgia repeals one-half of that section, and of the clause of the constitution on which it is founded. Where is this to stop? Is it to stop any where? What laws of the United States have not been declared unconstitutional? What laws and treaties will not be acted on, as if they were unconstitutional, if a process so summary is permitted to obtain?

I will observe, in conclusion, that, till the validity of these treaties has been settled by that tribunal which is alone competent under the constitution to entertain the question, and settled in favor of Georgia, Tassel could not be put to death by any lawful warrant. The very judge who tried him is made in the report to say that he "belongs to another nation." And, till it is settled by the competent authority, that this other nation is subject to the laws of Georgia, the death of Tassel remains illegal. At the same time I admit there may be difficulties in the case. The constitution is clear, but it is not certain that the judiciary act gives full force and effect to all the provisions of the constitution. But although there may be no remedy for the wrong done to the being whose life is taken, (if he has lost that life at a bar to which he was not amenable,) this want of remedy for the wrong proves nothing in favor of the right of Georgia. It is greatly to be lamented that she had not imitated the best part of the New York precedent, and granted a pardon or reprieve to Tassel. As a first case, a case of life and death, of an individual of a different nation and language, appealing to the faith of the Union, and asking only to be tried by that tribunal by which (if the treaties are indeed valid) he had a right to be tried, it is greatly to be deplored that a little time could not have been granted.

I will only add, that as there was a United States' force in the country when Tassel was arrested, and as Congress had just enacted in a law, which the President signed, that the treaties should not be violated, I think those troops would have been as well employed in protecting the life of a fellow-being, pending his appeal to the courts of the United States, as in driving the Cherokees from their own mines.

And here I may suitably consider the plea, that Georgia has done no more in this matter than other States, and particularly New York. No argument is more apt to be fallacious than the argument from analogy. There is great danger of mistaking slight and merely circumstantial points of resemblance for entire parallelism. I will examine this case briefly but fairly. I will admit the points where it is a precedent in favor of Georgia, and I will point out those where it is not; premising, that if the legislation of Georgia violates law and treaty, it by no means follows that the Government of the United States may withhold the protection which it owes, and which is demanded by those who are the victims of that legislation, because New York has adopted similar acts of legislation.

It is matter of surprise, too, if the legislation of New York affords a sanction to that of Georgia, that it was not insisted on sooner. Three great negotiations have been held by citizens of Georgia since the New York law of 1822, with the Creeks or Cherokees, and this precedent was never pleaded, as far as I can find, in the record of the negotiations.

Now let us compare the cases. New York, in 1822, passed a short law extending her criminal jurisdiction over the dwindling remnants of tribes within her borders, and there she has stopped. She leaves her Indians as she found them. She makes no attempt, by severe penal enactments, to break down the organization of their tribes. She has neither claimed nor surveyed their lands, nor seized their mines. As to the individual condemned by her courts, So-called, her assembly pardoned him. Her law, I understand, has not since been acted upon; and it is the opinion of the highest legal authorities in the State, that it leaves the rights and condition of the Indians where it found them. Here then are points of great and vital difference.

The New York law, in its terms confined to crimes and offences, was evidently intended, in its origin, to arm the State with power to protect the Indians against the evil of imaginary and superstitious crimes; a power, as the event shows, designed to be called forth only when such a peculiar occasion should require it. The Georgia code is one of civil and criminal jurisdiction, the last of a series of measures, having for its great and avowed object to effect the removal of the Indians. Hence, while New York stops at the claim of criminal jurisdiction, and does not, in point of fact, enforce that, Georgia enacts the severest laws against the entire social existence of the tribe, claims their lands, seizes their mines, and substantially drives them from her borders. If New York had gone into the Seneca reservation with a score of surveyors, declaring the alternative of removal to the West, or extinction, and drawing a lottery for their lands, the case would have been more nearly parallel. Accordingly we find, in the last place, that the Senecas never invoked our protection, because no practical evil was done or threatened; the Cherokees invoke our protection, because the choice is set before them, of subjection to State laws, under which they are told they cannot live, and removal to a desert, where they believe they must die. There is, therefore, the greatest difference in all the matters of fact, which give a character to the two cases. In point of equity and justice, the New York precedent could not of course alter the case, as one wrong affords no justification of another.

I will here also answer the argument drawn from the example of the colonies, and of the States, before the constitution. The argument from the practice of the colonies is of twofold aspect, looking to the question as one of humanity and of right.

First, as to humanity. Grant that the treatment of the Indians, by the colonies, was barbarous and cruel. We have lately been taunted with the fact, that, when taken as prisoners of war, they were sometimes sold as slaves to the West Indies; and our recollection has been refreshed with the circumstance, that, according to Cotton Mather, on occasion of storming an Indian fort, the huts within it took fire, and several of the wretched inmates were (as this author with detestable quaintness expresses it) "broiled" to death. These are the facts quoted against us. They were the incidents of a war of mutual extermination, between the colonies and a powerful savage foe. But I let that pass. What is gained by citing these facts? Suppose they prove the only thing they seem to prove, that the early settlers of New England were a blood-thirsty race, and treated the Indians barbarously? Is any thing gained for Georgia, and her sister States, by proving that fact? Those who would get an argument to support their policy, out of the fact, that, in the seventeenth century, some Indians were sold to the West Indies as slaves, need not go so far back. The slave trade, till very lately, was carried on throughout the civilized world. All nations were stained with its guilt. The States of New England brought the slaves from Africa; the Southern States bought them into bondage. And what then? Is the traffic less atrocious? or is it inconsistent for any one, north or south, at the present day, to denounce and reprobate it?

Let me not, however, be thought to admit the charge of barbarity against the early settlers of New England towards the Indians. Some incidents occurred, in the perilous condition in which the colonists, in the early periods of their settlements, were placed, which I surely will not vindicate; but their conduct towards the Indians in the main was honorable and kind. The charges against them, from whatever quarter, are substantially unjust. They had a right to come to this continent; they were guided hither by the hand of the same Providence that had planted the Indians before them. There was room for both. Our forefathers had a right to a part of the soil, to be obtained by honest dealing with the natives. I have never pretended that the Indian had an exclusive right to all the land he could see from the top of a mountain, or over which the deer may fly before him in the chase. But what follows from this admission? That after we have made an agreement with an Indian tribe, and got all we need, and guaranteed the rest, we shall not be bound to the faith of our compact? I trust not.

How then is the question of right affected by the practice of the colonies? It is said they legislated over the Indians. But this is vague and general. I want something specific and distinct. Did they, after making a long series of treaties with the Indian tribes, fixing boundaries, accepting cessions, and guaranteeing unceded lands, did they turn round, declare those treaties null, break down the boundaries and seize upon the land, in time of profound peace, and under the pretence that the treaties were unconstitutional? This is the kind of precedent wanted; not one resting in mere political metaphysics.

But grant they did all this, (no part of which they did,) and grant they did it as independent States, before the constitution of 1789. All this would not help the argument. The States, under the confederation, were clothed with many attributes of sovereignty, which they gave up on entering the Union. They coined money, enacted navigation laws, imposed tariffs to protect manufactures. The right to treat with the independent tribes of Indians was not one of the rights ceded to the States, although conflicts existed between the Congress and some of the States as to the extent of their power in this respect. But all the sovereign powers I have enumerated were given up by the States in adopting the constitution. When Georgia adopted the constitution, the treaty of Hopewell was in existence, containing the most decisive guaranties of the rights of the Cherokees. Before the constitution, Georgia claimed the right of treating with the Indians; but afterwards never. She frequently has requested the United States to treat for her benefit, and the United States have done it. And now the argument is, that Georgia has a right to annul all these treaties, because, in former times, the colonies or the States extended their laws over the Indians!

But it is said that the late administration pursued the same policy of removing the Indians, and the friends of that administration are charged with inconsistency in now opposing it. No one denies that the late administration earnestly desired the removal of the Indians. It saw, what every body sees, the inconveniences incident to the residence of the Southwestern tribes in the neighborhood of the States, so resolutely bent on acquiring their lands. It is well known that the project of colonizing them west of the Mississippi was submitted by Mr. Monroe to Congress, near the close of his administration, and again, with some modifications, by Mr. Adams in 1828. But it is a matter of equal notoriety, that neither the last administration, nor that which preceded it, contemplated the attainment of this object in any other way than by the joint and voluntary co-operation of the Indians themselves, and the United States. The idea that the States could annul the treaties, was never countenanced by the late President for a moment. It cannot surely be forgotten in what emphatic language, on a very trying occasion, Mr. Adams avowed his resolution to support the Indians in the rights secured to them by treaty and by law.

Georgia had passed a law authorizing the survey of a portion of Creek lands, ceded by the treaty of the Indian Springs, which the Senate of the United States had annulled, and not ceded by that of Washington. Mr. Adams immediately ordered the arrest and prosecution of the surveyors. Georgia declared a determination to support her surveyors by military force; and the President submitted the subject to Congress. In the message sent for that purpose, he used this language: "It ought not, however, to be disguised, that the act of the Legislature of Georgia, under the construction given to it by the Governor of that State, and the surveys made or attempted by his authority beyond the boundary secured by the treaty of Washington of April last, to the Creek Indians, are, in direct violation of the supreme law of this land, set forth in a treaty, which has received all the sanctions provided by the constitution, which we have sworn to support and maintain. In the present instance, it is my duty to say that if the legislative and executive authorities of the State of Georgia should persevere in acts of encroachment upon the territories secured by a solemn treaty to the Indians, and the laws of the Union remain unaltered, a superadded obligation, even higher than that of human authority, will compel the Executive of the United States to enforce the laws and fulfil the duties of the nation, by all the force committed for that purpose to his charge."

I may be permitted to add that this message, and other important documents in the Georgia controversy, were committed to a select committee of this House, of which I had the honor to be chairman, from which a report proceeded, supporting, in all points, the principles laid down by the President in the message I have just cited. It is obvious, therefore, that there is no foundation for the charge that the last administration was friendly to the policy of removing the Indians as now pursued. In fact, it is matter of surprise that a charge so notoriously groundless should be adventured. Had Mr. Adams done what is now pretended; had he countenanced Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, in their policy, the South would never have been consolidated, as it was, against him; and I much doubt if the chair of State would have been filled as it now is.

Sir, I think I have made out my case. I have shown that the Cherokee Indians have been invaded in the territory and rights secured to them by treaty and by law. In addition to the particulars which I have mentioned, there are others set forth in their memorial, well deserving the consideration of the House. Most of these, for want of time, I must pass over; but on two of them I will dwell for a moment. Georgia has contended for a boundary line, under the treaty of the Indian Springs, of 1825, (and in contravention of that of 1826 at Washington, by which the treaty of the Indian Springs was annulled,) which would take a million of acres of land from the Cherokees. The ground of this claim on the part of Georgia is, that the ancient boundary between the Creeks and the Cherokees was greatly to the north of the recent boundary; and that the Creeks and Cherokees, by compact between themselves, had no right to change it. If this were true, it would not affect the case, because the treaty of the Indian Springs, which gave Georgia all the Creek lands, being fraudulent in itself, could never have given any rights, and was solemnly annulled by the Senate, the present Secretary of War voting in favor of annulling it. Nevertheless, passing by the treaty of Washington, which fixed the boundary, and acting under that of the Indian Springs, which the Senate declared void, the President has undertaken to settle a new boundary, equally to the dissatisfaction of the Cherokees and Georgia; and has actually dispossessed the Cherokees, by a simple executive order, enforcing a treaty declared by the Senate to be fraudulent, null, and void, of four hundred and sixty-four thousand six hundred and forty-six acres of land, occupied, as they allege, by their tribe for generations.

I might also speak of the countenance which has been given to intruders, in establishing themselves on lands vacated by the emigrants to Arkansas, by which serious evils and constant vexations are occasioned to the Cherokees; but I forbear, for want of time, to dwell on the subject.

Nor is the order given last summer, to change the mode in which the annuities are paid, less vexatious. It has been called, and I think with justice, a small business. The annuity due to the Cherokees, amounts, I believe, to but six thousand six hundred and sixty-six dollars. It is by treaty due to the nation. Since the Cherokees took our advice, and established a regular Government, it has been paid to the treasurer of the nation. It constitutes a considerable part of the little revenue of the tribe. The President has seen fit to order its payment to the treasurer to be discontinued, and to be made hereafter to the Indians individually. It amounts to about forty-two cents for each of the population. It must of course be paid in specie. A part of the tribe live a hundred or two miles from the agency. Shall it be sent to them? Shall they travel this distance to receive their few cents? What is the object of this change? I have understood that it has been stated by the Secretary of War, in a letter published in the course of the last summer, that complaints had been made that some of the Indians are defrauded by their chiefs of their share. However this may be with other tribes, to which the same change extends, and of this I know nothing, I believe it is not so with the Cherokees. I have seen a letter from Mr. Montgomery, the Cherokee agent, dated last October, in which he declares that no such complaint has ever come to his knowledge. I hope there is no reason for the suggestion which has been made on very good authority, that this change in the mode of paying the annuities has been ordered, to deprive the Cherokee Government of the funds necessary to enable them to carry on the arduous and discouraging contest in which they are now involved with the Executive authorities of the United States and with Georgia.

I have confined myself, for the reasons stated in the outset, almost entirely to the case of the Cherokees. There is a memorial from the Creeks on our tables, from which it would appear that they suffer from the same policy. They are overrun with intruders, whom the Government of the United States does not remove; and the legislation of Alabama has been extended over them. I find the following account of it in a letter, apparently by a member of the Legislature of Alabama; "Tuscaloosa, (Alabama,) 9th January. The Indian bill, which has been passed in the House of Representatives, provides for extending over the different tribes within the territorial limits, the civil and criminal laws of the State, prohibiting them from enacting or executing any laws of their own—taxes their black population, between the ages of twelve and sixty, with a poll tax of fifty cents. The Choctaw and Chickasaw nations are, however, to be exempt from the operations of this act, so soon as the treaty concluded by their respective nations with the United States shall have been ratified by the Senate. This was a favorite amendment of mine, and it was all I could do to soften, in this very small degree, the rigor of the law."^{*}

With the Chickasaws and Choctaws treaties have been concluded under the law of last session, and, as I will demonstrate, in direct violation of its provisions.

Let me revert a moment to the history of the proviso contained in that law. The President's message took the ground that the Indians could not be protected against the legislation of the States. The reports of the Committees on Indian Affairs, in the two Houses, took the same ground. The bill did not directly grapple with that point; but, on both sides of the House, that was the point argued; and the great objection to the bill was, that it played into the hands of that policy. The House, as the event proved, was nearly in equilibrio: the bill passed by a vote of 102 to 97. In this state of division in the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. RAMSEY] moved an amendment, which prevailed. It provided, "that nothing in this act contained should be construed as authorizing or directing the violation of any treaty between the United States and any Indian tribe." Without this proviso, I am persuaded the bill could not have passed.

By this clause, the House solemnly provided that the treaties were constitutional, and could not be violated; and if, as it would seem, the President thinks them unconstitutional, I do not understand how he could sign the bill. He thought proper, by a special message, to guard the House against even construing a law passed at the last session, in a sense deemed by him unconstitutional; and, in appending his signature to it, it would appear that he has endorsed upon the official roll of the law a sort of qualifying reference to that message: an entirely novel, singular, and, as I think, unconstitutional step. In this case, he signs a bill, in which the constitutionality of the treaties is expressly recognised, although he deems them all null and inoperative.

With this act in his hand, and the half million in his pocket, the Secretary goes down to the Chickasaws and Choctaws, tells them that the President will not protect them from the legislation of the States; and, "under these circumstances," negotiates the new treaties. These treaties have not been submitted (not being as yet ratified) to the House of Representatives. From the best sources of information to which I have had access, I have been led to the opinion, that the tone of the Secretary's communications with the Choctaws was of the most urgent and imperative character. No one denies that the extension of State laws over the tribes is, of itself, a violation of all the treaties; but, in the case of the Choctaws, there were peculiar provisions in their treaties, which are contravened and broken. By the treaty of Doak's Stand, negotiated with that tribe in 1820, by the present Chief Magistrate and the worthy gentleman [GEN. HINDS] who now represents the State of Mississippi, it was, in the fourth article, stipulated as follows: "The boundaries hereby established between the Choctaw Indians and the United States on this side of the Mississippi river, shall remain without alteration, until the period at which said nation shall become so civilized and enlightened as to be made citizens of the United States; and Congress shall lay off a limited parcel of land for the benefit of each family and individual in the nation."

Some uneasiness on the part of the Choctaw nation appears to have been produced by this stipulation; and it was, accordingly, in the treaty with the Choctaws, negotiated at Washington in 1825, further provided, "that the fourth article of the treaty aforesaid shall be so modified as that the Congress of the United States shall not exercise the power of apportioning the land for the benefit of each family or individual of the Choctaw nation, and of bringing them under the laws of the United States, but with the consent of the Choctaw nation!"

So unequivocal was the condition of the Choctaws, under these treaties, that the State of Mississippi decided, in 1826, that they had not a right to legislate for their own citizens, wandering into the Choctaw nation, fugitives from the justice of the State. In the face of these treaties, in the face of the proviso of the law under which he was acting, refusing expressly to authorize their violation, the Secretary goes to the Choctaws, tells them in substance that the old treaties will be regarded by the Executive of the United States as unconstitutional, and, knowing that their consent to remove depends upon this one fact and no other, he assures them the President will not enforce the treaties, and, under these circumstances, induces a portion of them (how large a portion, I know not) to cede the lands of the nation. To effect this object, there is great reason to believe that very large temptations were offered to the individuals possessing influence in the tribe.

Now, I say the law of the last session was conditional; and the appropriation contained in it was conditionally made. The condition was, that the treaties should not be violated. It is known to every gentleman in the House, that the sole consideration which induced the Choctaws to agree to remove, was the assurance of the Secretary, that the Government of the United States would not protect them from the violation of the treaties. It is unnecessary to press this matter much further. I have stated most of the grounds on which I rest the propriety and expediency of adopting my motion. It is admitted by the States that they consider these treaties as unconstitutional, and act accordingly.

The President acquiesces in this course, on the part of the States, although it is his sole duty, in reference to this matter, to enforce the law, of which these treaties are a part. Congress last winter made express provision against their violation. They are violated. Let us then either make provision to execute, or let us abrogate them avowedly. It is due to consistency, good faith, and common honesty.

The President has, with his annual message, sent us a letter from the superintendent of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, in which that officer states that the law of 1802 "is the principal one which governs all our relations with the Indian tribes," and recommends its revision and modification, to suit the changes produced by subsequent treaties, and other causes. The same message is accompanied by the letter from the Secretary of War, to which I have already referred; telling us that the provisions of that law are unconstitutional, and the President neglects to enforce them in favor of those tribes over which the States have extended their laws.

Let us, then, the Congress of the United States, if we think this law is constitutional, make provision to execute it; if we think it is defective, let us amend it. If we think it is unconstitutional, let us repeal it. That law, by which all our Indian relations are regulated, ought not surely to remain in its present state.

If the treaties are constitutional, let us enforce them. If they are unconstitutional, let us abrogate them; let us repeal the proviso of the last session; declare them null and void, and make what compensation we can to the deluded beings who, relying upon our faith, have, at different periods, ceded to us mighty and fertile regions, as a consideration for the guaranty contained in these compacts.

Sir, this is a dreadful affair. Heaven is my witness, that I would rather palliate than magnify its character; but I can think of nothing so nearly parallel to it, as the conduct of the British Government towards the native inhabitants of St. Vincent. This is a precedent from one of ^{*}Since this speech was delivered, I have understood that bills have been introduced in both branches of the Legislature of Alabama, to repeal the law extending the jurisdiction of the State over the Indians; with what success, I am uninformd.

Indian Affairs.

the worst periods of the British Government—that of the administration which drove America into revolution. It was a transaction on a small scale, in an obscure island, and toward a handful of men. But it left an indelible stigma on those responsible for it; a stigma on an administration, which nothing moderately unjust could disgrace; a stigma, which would have been as notorious as it was indelible, but for the overshadowing enormity of the treatment of America, which succeeded. If we proceed in this path, if we now bring this stain on our annals, if we suffer this cold and dark eclipse to come over the bright sun of our national honor, I see not how it can ever pass off; it will be as eternal as it is total.

Sir, I will not believe that Georgia will persevere. She will not, for this poor corner, scarcely visible on the map of her broad and fertile domains, permit a reproach to be cast upon her and the whole Union to the end of time.

As for the character of the country to which it is proposed to remove the Indians, I want only light. It was all we asked last session; all I ask now. I quoted then all the authorities, favorable as well as unfavorable, with which I was acquainted. The friends of the policy refused us the only means of getting authentic information on the subject—a commission of respectable citizens of the United States, sent out for the purpose. Since the subject was discussed last session, two more witnesses, not then heard, have spoken. Dr. James, who was appointed to accompany Colonel Long on his tour of exploration in this region, has thus expressed himself: “The region to which Mr. McCoy proposes to remove the Indians would, such is its naked and inhospitable character, soon reduce civilized men who should be confined to it to barbarism.”

In 1827, before this question was controverted, a report was made by the commissioners appointed to lay out a road from the western boundary of Missouri to Santa Fe, in New Mexico. These commissioners report, that, in the whole line of their march, extending seven hundred miles, if all the wood which they passed were collected into one forest, it would not exceed a belt of trees three miles in width!

But all this does not change the question. It merely suggests the possibility of an alternative of evil. If all the land were as fertile as some small part of it probably is; if it were as safe from the wild tribes of the desert, as it is notoriously exposed; if wood and water were as abundant as they are confessedly scarce; if it were the paradise which it is not; so much the worse for the Indians—the miserable victims whom we are going to delude into it. The idea that they can there be safe is perfectly chimerical; and every argument to show that the land is good, is an argument of demonstration that they will soon be driven from it. If all these treaties cannot save them, nothing can. What pledges can we give stronger than we have given?

It is partly for this reason that I urge the House to settle the question; and the more plainly we meet it, if we settle it against the Indians, the more humane will be our conduct. If we intend to be faithless to all these compact, let our want of faith be made as signal and manifest as it can be.

Here, at the centre of the nation, beneath the portals of the capitol, let us solemnly auspicate the new era of violated promises, and tarnished faith. Let us kindle a grand council-fire, not of treaties made and ratified, but of treaties annulled and broken. Let us send to our archives for the worthless parchments, and burn them in the face of day. There will be some yearnings of humanity as we perform the solemn act. They were negotiated for valuable considerations; we keep the consideration, and break the bond. One gave peace to our afflicted frontier; another protected our infant settlements. Many were made when we were weak; nearly all at our earnest request. Many of them were negotiated under the instructions of Washington, of Adams, and of Jefferson—the fathers of our liberty. They are gone, and will not witness the spectacle; but our present Chief Magistrate, as he lays them, one by one, on the fire, will see his own name subscribed to a goodly number of them.

Sir, they ought to be destroyed, as a warning to the Indians to make no more compacts with us. The President tells us that the Choctaw treaty is probably the last which we shall make with them. This is well; though, if they remain on our soil, I do not see how future treaties are to be avoided. But I trust it is the last we shall make with them; that they will place themselves beyond the reach of our treaties and our laws; of our promises, and our mode of keeping them.

There is one sad alleviation of the fate of some of these tribes. When the possessions of the rural population of Italy were parcelled out among the Roman legions, by a policy too similar to that which we are now pursuing towards the Indians, it was the pathetic inquiry of a poor shepherd, who was driven from his native soil, his cultivated farm, and the roof of his infancy,

Impius hæc tam culta novalia miles habebit, Barbarus has segetes? En quis convivimus agros!

It will be some sad alleviation of the fate of these dependent allies, whom we are urging into the Western wilderness, that their lands, and their houses, their fields, and their pastures, their civilized, improved, and christian homes, will pass into the possession of their civilized and christian brethren; who, I doubt not, will do their best to mitigate the bitterness of the cup. “At some future day, should they escape the destruction which, as I think, impends over them beyond the Mississippi, some of their children will perhaps be moved by the desire to undertake a pious pilgrimage to the seats from which their fathers were removed. The children of the exile will not, I know, be turned unkindly from the door of the child of the “fortunate drawer.” Here, they will say, are the roofs beneath which our parents were born, and for which our white brethren cast lots; here are the sods beneath which the ashes of our forefathers are laid; and there are the ruins of the council house where the faith of our great father was solemnly pledged to protect us!

Sir, it is for this Congress to say whether such is the futurity we will entail on these dependent tribes. If they must go, let it not be to any spot within the United States. They are not safe; they cannot bind us—they cannot trust us. We shall solemnly promise, but we shall break our word. We shall sign and seal, but we shall not perform. Let them go to Texas; let them join the Camanches, for their sakes, and for ours; for theirs, to escape the disasters of another removal—for ours, that we may be spared its shame.

Now, sir, I have done my duty. I have intended nothing offensive to any man, or body of men. I have aimed only to speak the truth, honestly and earnestly, but not opprobriously. If, in the heat of the moment, I have uttered any thing which goes beyond this limit, I wish it unsaid.

I am not without hopes that Congress will yet throw its broad shield over these our fellow-beings, who look to us for protection, being perfectly satisfied that, if the question could be presented free from all extraneous considerations to the decision of the House, it would be for the preservation of the treaties.

But, however this may be, I am confident that the time is not far distant when the people will be all but unanimous in this matter. I believe that even now, could it be freed from all delusive coloring, and submitted to the mighty company in the Union, of sober, unprejudiced, disinterested men, their voice would reach us, like a rushing storm from heaven. Rather than have this hall made the theatre of such a disastrous violation of the national faith, they would speak to us in a tone which would shake these massy columns to their base, and pile this canopy in heaps on our heads.

[Mr. E. addressed the House until near four o'clock to day; when, being evidently much exhausted, (having not long since recovered from a severe illness,) Mr. WAYNE and Mr. VANCE rose at the same moment, to request that he would yield to a motion for adjournment; which he did, and the House adjourned. Mr. E. therefore delivered a portion of the preceding remarks on the following Monday, when the subject again came up; but the whole of his speech is embodied above.]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

Mr. CHILTON, by instruction of the Committee on Military Pensions, moved a resolution to set apart Wednesday, the 16th instant, for the consideration of bills and reports respecting the claims for revolutionary pensions.

Considerable discussion took place on the resolution, principally as to the propriety of giving preference to this species of business, over the other important matters before the House, in which Messrs. CHILTON, HOFFMAN, TREZVANT, CRAIG, POLK, GRENELL, DRAYTON, and WICKLIFFE, joined. After an ineffectual motion of Mr. SPEIGHT to lay the resolution on the table, Mr. TAYLOR, for the purpose, he said, of preventing more time from being consumed on the resolution, than it would take to pass half of the pension bills, moved the previous question, which was carried, and the resolution adopted, (so modified, at the suggestion of Mr. WHITTELEY, as to confine its operation to bills, to the exclusion of reports.)

Mr. HAYNES, for the purpose, he said, of obtaining an opportunity of replying to some of the remarks of Mr. EVERETT, yesterday, on the Indian question, and returning some of the favors he had bestowed on Georgia, moved to suspend the rule which confined the continuance of that debate to Mondays, and to allow it to proceed to-day; but the motion was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. H., then referring to a case stated in the journals of last session, where the question on the reference of a petition, near the close of the session, was debated from day to day, asked of the Chair in what that case was distinguished from this, to justify a different practice? He knew of no rule of the House on the subject.

The SPEAKER was understood to reply that there was no positive rule which forbade the continuance of the debate from day to day; but the decision in the present case was founded on what was understood by the Chair to be the sense of the House, and the acquiescence of the House in that decision.

Mr. LECOMPTE then moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of calling up his resolution proposing to limit the term of service of the judges of the Supreme Court; but the motion was rejected almost unanimously.

BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF SUSAN DECATUR.

Mr. DODDRIDGE, according to notice, now moved a reconsideration of the vote of Friday last, by which this bill was rejected. Had the bill been so amended as to grant to the nieces of Commodore Decatur a portion of the sum of thirty-one thousand four hundred and twelve dollars, proposed to be allowed to his widow, he believed the bill would have passed; and it was to try it with such an amendment that he moved its reconsideration. He therefore hoped no gentleman would vote for the reconsideration who did not intend to vote for the bill if it should be so amended, as it would be a waste of the time of the House.

Mr. MERCER, lest that which was done by a full House, might be undone by a thin one, moved a call of the House; but the motion was negatived.

The question was then put on the reconsideration of the former vote, and was carried in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 96; and the question therefore recurred on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. MILLER moved an amendment to the bill, providing that twenty-one thousand four hundred and twelve dollars be paid to Mrs. Decatur, and ten thousand dollars to the daughters of Commodore Decatur's sister, Mrs. McKnight.

Mr. HAMMONS moved to strike out the words which particularized the nieces, so as to leave the grant to be divided amongst all the nieces of the deceased Commodore, his brother, John P. Decatur, having daughters equally entitled.

Mr. DODDRIDGE opposed the motion. His object was to provide for those who were brought up by Commodore Decatur as a part of his family.

The motion of Mr. HAMMONS was lost; and, on motion of Mr. HOFFMAN, the yeas and nays were ordered on Mr. MILLER's amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to amend the amendment, by adding thereto a provision, that an additional sum of ten thousand dollars be given to Mrs. Decatur, if, at the end of three years, that amount should not be claimed by the inferior classes provided for in the bill.

Mr. MILLER accepted the amendment; but, it being opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, TAYLOR, and DRAYTON, it was subsequently withdrawn.

The question was then put on Mr. MILLER's amendment, and agreed to by the following vote—yeas 100, nays 82.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved to recommit the bill to the Naval committee, with instructions so to amend it, as to provide for distributing the one hundred thousand dollars appropriated according to the prize act.

Some debate arose on this motion, on the part of Messrs. WILLIAMS, CHILTON, and BARRINGER; when, to put an end to what he deemed further unnecessary discussion, as he presumed every member was prepared to vote on the bill,

Mr. POTTER moved the previous question; which, being sustained, it brought the question at once to the third reading of the bill.

The question was accordingly put, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" It was decided in the negative, as follows:

Relief to Land Purchasers.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The House took up the bill from the Senate, supplementary to the act passed on the 31st March, 1830, for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of fraudulent practices at the public sales of the lands of the United States.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, opposed the bill with much earnestness, and moved to strike out the second section.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said, he hoped he should be indulged by the House in giving some explanation, and in the statement of a few facts, in reference to the bill under consideration. It will be perceived, said he, by all who have attended to the reading of the bill, that its provisions are intended to be supplementary to, and emendatory of, the law passed at the last session for the relief of land purchasers. That law has extended relief imperfectly, and very unequally. To those who bought land at fourteen dollars per acre, and upwards, which had reverted with the one-fourth paid thereon, patents were given, without further payment; whilst those who had purchased lands at less than fourteen dollars, which have since reverted, were required to pay additional sums per acre, varying according to the original price. So in regard to the relinquished land, however valuable it may be, or at whatever prices it may have sold, (and the prices varied from two dollars up to forty, fifty, and even as high as seventy and eighty dollars per acre, merely for agricultural purposes,) yet no higher price than three dollars and fifty cents per acre is required by the law for any class or portion of it, while none is permitted to be taken at less than one dollar fifty-six and a fourth cents. This is a variation of less than two dollars in all the different classes and grades, from the most inferior and unproductive to the most fertile and valuable. It is of the injustice and inequality of the operation of this law, that the memorialists, whose interests are embraced by this bill, complain.

It seems to me that this brief explanation of the principles of the law passed at the last session, would be a sufficient exhibition of its defects, to satisfy every mind that some amendment is demanded by that justice which regards the interests of all classes with equal favor. But, sir, as the bill has been attacked with such vehemence by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. IRVIN,] as he has thought proper to speak of the large amount which it proposes to give away, and has endeavored to impress the House with the idea that an immense interest is involved, and that the measure is one of unusually important character, I feel called upon to go further into the discussion. The advocates of the bill can lose nothing by investigation; for the better it is understood, the more conclusive will appear the justness and reasonableness of the claim urged by this unfortunate class of our fellow-citizens.

Sir, as this bill is intended to carry out the principles of the act of last session, already mentioned, and to equalize its operation, it may not be improper or unprofitable very briefly to review the grounds on which your interposition was asked, and upon which that measure was accorded. You had been memorialized year after year upon this subject, both by the people and the legislatures of the new States. Again: at the last session your attention was called to the various causes which had conspired to produce the unprecedented embarrassment and intolerable distress which prevailed more especially in the Southwest, from which quarter came the petitions for the modifications of the law now proposed. You were reminded of the great inducement to purchase land in that section of the country—the production of cotton, the great staple of the South, to which the soil and climate were believed to be alike adapted; and that at the time of those sales (during the years 1818 and 1819) this staple was more in demand, and commanded a higher price than at any other period of our history, except in the two or three preceding years. You were called on to take into view the superabundance of the circulating medium in those years, occasioned, in no small degree, by the extraordinary multiplication of banks in every State and territory, particularly in the West, which were then issuing millions of money, in the shape of promises, never to be redeemed; and all this then receivable in your land offices. You were told of the five or six millions of “Mississippi stock,” the fruit of compromise with the “Yazoo claimants,” as they were familiarly called, issued by your authority and direction, to be received in the land offices of Mississippi and Alabama alone, which added greatly to the already delusive appearance of capital and prosperity in those States. They reiterated their well-founded complaints of the combinations of speculators, who crowded the different places of sale, for the purpose of monopolizing the lands which had been improved, and rendered productive by their toil, and industry, and enterprise; in consequence of which they were reduced to the alternative of giving prices the most extravagant, even for those extravagant times, or submit to be driven still further back into the wilderness, at seasons when ruin and starvation would have been the almost inevitable result to many of their families. After all this, when the currency of the United States had been reduced from about one hundred and ten millions to forty-five millions of dollars; when the Mississippi stock had almost entirely disappeared; when many of the banks had exploded, and the paper of nine-tenths of them was refused in payment, you abandoned the credit system, and sold your land for cash, at a reduction of 57½ per centum.

They turned your attention to another fact, which seems to me, of itself, conclusive of their claim to your equitable consideration—the sudden and unprecedented reduction in the value of their staple, its continued depression, and the consequent proportionate diminution in the value of the capital employed in its production. When the lands in question were sold, and for several previous years, cotton would readily command from twenty-five to thirty cents per pound; for some years past, the average price has not been more than one-fourth. As much land and as much labor are now required to produce a given quantity, say fifty thousand pounds of nett cotton, as then; but mark the difference in the sum received by the planter. At the price in 1813, (assuming twenty-eight cents as the average,) that quantity was worth $14,000; at the price of the last four or five years, (assuming seven cents as a fair average,) the same quantity would only be worth $3,500. Bear in mind, too, that the diminution in the amount of incidental expenses has not been in equal proportion; while cotton has gone down three-fourths, they have not been reduced more than one-fourth. Suppose the former amount of those charges to have been $2,000, it would have left the planter's nett profit at $12,000; take from the total product now $1,500, being one-fourth less, and it leaves him only $2,000, only one-sixth of the former profit. If the same quantity of land, with the same amount of capital and labor employed in its cultivation, will profit the owner but one-sixth, can it be worth one-fourth the price at which it might before have been reasonably estimated? That it is not, is as clear as demonstration itself; and the truth of the melancholy conclusion would be attested by the judgment of all who have lived in the region alluded to during the last twelve years.

Relief to Land Purchasers.

But, besides those facts, which were abundantly established by reference to the history of the country, it was shown by the official report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the purchasers of land in Alabama had paid, for nearly half a million of acres which had reverted, an average price of one dollar and thirty-nine cents per acre, when your sales of about the same quantity, in the same State, during the three preceding years, had exceeded that average but three-tenths of a cent per acre, and when the average price of near a million and a half of acres, sold during the same three years in Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, had fallen short of that average about fourteen cents per acre, having brought but one dollar twenty-five cents and six mills per acre.

In view of such facts, they called upon you to relieve them from their distress and embarrassment—to exempt them from the ruinous consequences of contracts, which had been made improvidently, but in good faith. Upon this candid and just exposition of the grounds on which they rested their claims, they asked you to suffer them to retain their homes, which they had improved by much labor and expenditure, at the fair value, as it had been ascertained by that most infallible of all tests—experience. They called on you as their brethren, and the representatives of their brethren in every section of their beloved country, to deal with them on the broad and liberal principles of equity and good conscience. They appealed to your sense of justice and your magnanimity. Thank heaven! their appeal was not wholly in vain; you did accord to them partial relief; many of them, perhaps the larger portion, are satisfied. Those who had purchased the most valuable lands were entirely relieved from the insupportable burden of debt which had been hanging over them for years, and threatening them and their families with bankruptcy and ruin. Those who had purchased inferior lands found in the law some mitigation of their grievances—a suspension of the sales of their homes, which were to have taken place in the ensuing spring and summer, and the harbinger, as they hoped and believed, of more equal and liberal justice at the present session.

The petitioners now complain that the act of last session “does not afford to them either an adequate or proportionate relief.” They disclaim all “invidious feelings at the good fortune of the holders of high priced lands, who are presented with patents on surrendering their certificates and paying the fees of office.” Nor do they complain “of the pre-emption rights granted to settlers on the public lands;” but they “view with surprise and regret the fact of their forming an isolated class, apparently excluded from the favor of Government.” They think (and it is certainly a reasonable opinion) that “if the object of Congress was to raise a certain amount from land debtors,” it was but “just that it should have been drawn in ratable proportions from all;” whilst, in point of fact, “the heaviest contributions have been levied upon the holders of low priced lands, generally consisting of the poorer classes of society.” Such is their language, and such are their views; and they are unquestionably founded in truth. Whoever has examined the enactments of the law complained of, and has understood its operation, will be ready to respond to the truth and accuracy of every ground assumed by the memorialists.

Sir, what do the petitioners ask? Simply that you will extend to them relief proportionate to that which you have extended to their more fortunate and more wealthy brethren and fellow-sufferers. They ask a measure of justice, equal to that which you have meted out to others, who are less needy, and have no better claims, on any fair principle. The basis, the very foundation of their claim is, that it is as fair to presume that reverted or relinquished lands, which originally sold for less than fourteen dollars per acre, brought, or rather exceeded, its proportionate value, as that those lands did which sold for higher prices.

And is not this assumption perfectly reasonable and well founded? Is it not a fair conclusion, that land, situated in the same section of country, put up at auction at the same time, in the same market, and in the same community, would sell according to its proportionate value, having reference to the quality of soil, situation, and all other incidents which enhance or diminish it? You must admit it, or agree that your mode of selling the public lands is entirely erroneous; for the auction system is predicated on the assumption that it is the true mode of getting the full and fair value of each tract of land.

Sir, it may not be improper to explain how this inequality was produced. Although the bill, as originally introduced, was less favorable to a large portion of the purchasers who sought relief, yet it was far more equal in its distribution. The influence which the favorable opinion and sanction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office would probably have on the action of the House, induced me to enclose to him a copy of the original bill, and ask him to examine its provisions, and give his views in reply. He did examine it, and approved its provisions in the main; but, in conclusion, remarked, “As those persons who purchased originally at very extravagant prices, say at fifteen dollars per acre, or upwards, may not be disposed to avail themselves of the first provision of the first section, and those of the second section, I would suggest the propriety of inserting a maximum price for those lands.” He accordingly returned the copy of the bill, which I had enclosed, with provisos inserted in the first and second sections, limiting the price of each class to three dollars and fifty cents, as it finally passed. I have the original letter of which I have spoken now on my desk, subject to the examination of any gentleman who may desire it. The Committee on the Public Lands were willing to report the bill as approved by Mr. Graham, while they had refused again and again to report, without amendment, the bill which had passed the Senate, fixing the price to be paid for both classes of land at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Under these circumstances, what course was left to be pursued by the delegations from the new States? If they could not obtain all they thought required by the situation of their respective constituents, would they have been justified in rejecting that which was offered or could be obtained? I can answer more particularly for my colleagues and myself. All the reverted and relinquished land in Alabama had then already been proclaimed for sale in the months of May and June following. Our constituents were the great sufferers. Indeed, they had suffered more than the citizens of all the other new States together; and, in a sale at auction, they would have been obliged to encounter bands of speculators of every grade, from the capitalist who enters the market and buys on his own money, down to the contemptible hush-money dealer, who often swindles without money. Sir, a system of this character had grown up and been matured among us, and we had witnessed the baneful effects of its operation. No time was to be lost; for only a few days more than two months were to elapse between the time at which the measure was under consideration and the commencement of the sales. With this threatening array of evils before us, my colleagues and myself, on consultation as to the most discreet and prudent course for the interest and safety of our constituents, determined to pass the bill, if possible—not as the most just and equal measure which we could have asked or desired, but as the best that could then be obtained. We could not feel justified in the rejection of relief to one portion, because it could not be equally extended to all; and, if we had done so, we should have merited and received the execrations of all. For one, I should have felt it my duty to have obtained relief for any portion, however few, if nothing better could have been done.

H. OF R.]

Relief to Land Purchasers.

But, sir, whence comes this violent opposition to the bill on your table? From one of the Representatives from Ohio—from a Representative from a Western State, and of a people who have, doubtless, in some degree, once struggled with the same current of adversity which has so long threatened to overwhelm the people of Alabama. His constituents having escaped from the difficulty and danger which perhaps once embarrassed them, and obtained a secure footing on firm ground, he would look back upon us, still striving to extricate ourselves from the peril which surrounds us, and menaces our existence; and, so far from extending the helping hand, he would dissuade others from doing so. Sir, can this be consistent with the clarity and magnanimity of the people of Ohio? Would they, because they are now independent, and may possibly have become so under a less liberal policy than we ask, be willing to refuse us assistance when our situation requires it? Would they deny aid to others, because they had not received it, (were it the fact,) or because they now stand in no need themselves? Sir, I am unwilling to believe it; and I will not ascribe to them a character so selfish and illiberal.

But the gentleman speaks of the prejudicial effect which is to be produced on the value of lands owned by individuals: he means what I have often heard him express, that such measures are calculated to unhinge the value of real estate. Whose interest is likely to be so affected? Not that of the planter or farmer, who usually has only the quantity of land he wishes to occupy and cultivate for the support of his family, and to rear and educate his children. Such men do not wish to sell; they do not regard the market price as matter of interest to themselves; they generally expect to live and die on the particular places which they have selected for residence; but, if they did, the cheapness of land elsewhere would be proportioned to the diminution of the value of their own, and would meet the wants and interests of their rising families. Would the gentleman insist, that, because some of us may have made hard bargains, and have given high prices for our lands, we should object to others getting theirs on reasonable terms? Sir, many of my constituents have given much more than the value of their lands; do they oppose the relief sought by their neighbors and fellow-citizens? By no means; but, on the contrary, would rejoice at their deliverance. I have given more than twenty dollars per acre for a portion of the land I cultivate, for which I could not now obtain five dollars per acre; but would I, on that account, refuse to let my neighbor have his land on just terms, or envy his good fortune were he to get it for less than its value, because the effect might be to cheapen mine? No, sir; far from it. Were I capable of such illiberal sentiments, such want of magnanimity, the high-minded and generous people whom I have the honor to represent, would spurn me—they would discard me from their confidence.

Sir, it is not interest of the farmer or planter that is to be affected by reducing the price of public lands, or extending relief to land debtors. It is only the interest of the speculator; the interest of the landmonger, who buys and sells for profit, and who has large quantities on hand, that can be injured by such measures; and they alone would be likely to complain. I will not charge the gentleman from Ohio with intending to represent the interest of large landholders and speculators, instead of that of the great body of the people; but I will state some facts, from which gentlemen can draw their own deductions, as to the effect of his course of policy.

Many years ago, certain grants were made to certain agents and directors of the "Ohio Company of Associates." I think the first was for seven hundred and fifty thousand acres, a second tract contained about two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres, and a third contained one hundred thousand acres. All those grants, I believe, were made to the same "Ohio Company of Associates," amounting to more than a million of acres. A grant was subsequently made to John Cleves Symmes for one million of acres, though afterwards modified, and the quantity somewhat reduced. Still another grant was made to the inhabitants of Gallipolis, for twenty-four thousand acres. There may have been other large grants to companies or to individuals, which I have not noticed; but those stated amount to about two millions of acres. Now, sir, much of this land may, and doubtless does, remain unsold; nor will it sell for profit while there is much land in market on reasonable terms. Consequently, it would be to the interest of individuals or companies, so situated, that no land should be brought into market; or, if any be offered for sale, that it shall be on terms so high as to make it the interest of purchasers to buy of them rather than of the Government. On the same principle, relief to purchasers who have made ruinous contracts ought not to be granted, or, if granted at all, on cautious terms, lest the value of real estate in the hands of individuals should be impaired. Such an interest as that to which I have alluded, is much better subserved by keeping up the price of the public lands, and by refusing relief to the purchasers under the credit system, than the interest of the great body of the people, or that of the Government.

Sir, the people of Alabama have paid a larger amount of money into the treasury, in proportion to the number of acres which have been sold within her limits, than those of any other State. By the report of a select committee, made in February, 1829, it appears that the whole quantity of land then sold amounted to twenty-one million six hundred and seventy-eight thousand one hundred and twenty-nine acres, for which the Government had received thirty-six million thirteen thousand four hundred and three dollars. Of that sum, Alabama had then paid seven million two hundred and seventy-four thousand seven hundred and forty-six dollars and twenty-four cents—being more than one-fifth of the total amount paid by all the other States, for a little more than three millions of acres, or about one-seventh of the aggregate quantity of land sold. Up to the same time, Ohio had paid about sixteen millions of dollars for about nine millions of acres. The average price paid by Ohio was one dollar and seventy-eight cents per acre, while Alabama had paid an average price of two dollars and twenty-four cents per acre, and exceeding the average price of Ohio forty-six cents per acre. If gentlemen will take the trouble to make the estimate, they will find the excess paid by the people of Alabama, over those of Ohio, for an equal quantity of land, according to this difference of price in the two States, amounts to nearly a million and a half of dollars. Is not this difference enormous to result from the sale of a little more than three millions of acres? Yet it is from a part of the representation from Ohio that we encounter the most prompt, decided, and unrelenting opposition to every measure proposed for the relief of purchasers in the State from which I come, and, I may add, to every measure which is calculated to favor the growth and prosperity of the new States generally.

Under this view of the subject, I appeal to gentlemen to say whether it is unreasonable to ask, or to expect, the relief contemplated by the bill under consideration. We do not propose to take a single acre for a less price than one dollar and twenty-five cents. We offer for this inferior land such price as you have received (deducting six mills per acre) for near a million and a half of acres, sold in three of the new States, in three successive years preceding the last session of Congress; and within a few cents of the price received for near half a million of acres sold, in the same three years, in the State which I, in part, have the honor to represent. We offer the same price for which you sold several hundred thousand acres during the last year, under the "act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," a large portion of which was, most likely, land of the best quality. Nor should it be forgotten that the individuals who now ask relief, and seek the award of justice at your hand, "generally consist of the poorer classes of society," as they have themselves remarked. This position is obviously true, judging from the nature of things, and the experience and observation of all. It is almost a necessary result of competition at a sale of lands to the highest bidder, that men of wealth should become the purchasers of the most fertile and valuable tracts, by the force of capital, driving those who are poor to the more inferior lands. But, sir, if reasoning be not sufficient to establish the fact, I have no hesitation in offering in its support the humble testimony of my own knowledge of its truth, as a general proposition, from personal observation. As I urged in the committee at the last session, and have repeated at the present one, the holders of this inferior description of land are the class of persons who, above all others, have had the hardest bargains from the beginning, and have the strongest claims to favor and indulgence.

Sir, in any just aspect in which the subject can be presented, the relief proposed by the bill is but fair and reasonable. The grounds on which it is asked are fully sustained by the facts and views which have been presented, whether considered in reference to the interest or true policy of the Government. The relief prayed is from contracts the most hard and inequitable, made under circumstances against the influence of which no man's wisdom or circumspection was a sufficient safeguard. I will not believe, until it is demonstrated by a vote of the House, that you will rigidly adhere to the unequal, unjust, and severe terms of the act of last session; or that you will deny relief commensurate with the most liberal principles of equity and good conscience.

Mr. BAYLOR also supported the bill, and replied to Mr. IRVIN.

Mr. IRVIN rejoined more at large against the bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE commenced a speech in favor of the bill, and had spoken some time, when he gave way to a motion to adjourn; and

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution proposing to print six thousand additional copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Judiciary committee.

Mr. DANIEL resumed the floor, and consumed the remainder of the allotted hour, in the continuation of his speech on the judiciary—[as reported on a preceding page.] When he had taken his seat,

Mr. BARRINGER gave notice that when this subject came up to-morrow, he should make a question of order, whether it was competent for members, on a simple motion, to print the reports, to go into a general discussion of the reports themselves, and the whole subject of the judiciary.

SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend the rule of the House in regard to motions, for the purpose of enabling himself to submit a resolution requesting the Executive to enter into negotiations with the maritime Powers of Europe, to induce them to enact laws declaring the African slave trade piracy, and punishing it as such; but the motion (requiring two-thirds) was lost—63 to 34.

REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act of 1828, for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution.

[This bill, as usual on all bills making general provision on the subject of pensions, gave rise to much debate; especially on the often discussed question of including the militia in the relief extended to the regular soldiers. The debate on this question arose on a motion by Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, to include the militia volunteers and State troops in the present bill, which was ultimately adopted, almost by general consent. The gentlemen who entered into the discussion (some of them repeatedly) were, Messrs. VERPLANCK, DAVIS, of Mass., WILLIAMS, TUCKER, TAYLOR, CHILTON, CRAIG, BURGESS, BATES, RICHARDSON, HUNTINGTON, SPENCER, of New York, McDUFFIE, A. H. SHEPPERD, STRONG, WILDE, CAMPBELL, ELLSWORTH, SPEIGHT, BARRINGER, POLK, and SWIFT. The following sketch embraces the principal features of the discussion.]

Mr. VERPLANCK, (on whose motion the House took up the bill,) said that the memorial of the parties was so succinct, and at the same time so expressive, that he should refrain from entering into an argument in support of their claims. He merely wished the memorial to be read.

The memorial was then read.

Mr. VERPLANCK explained the object of the bill. It went to give to those individuals who had retired from the service after the capture of Cornwallis, but before the conclusion of the war, the benefits of the pension act of 1828. He moved, in amendment, that such of them as had served two years and six months, should be included.

Mr. TAYLOR said, that when it was considered what a length of time had elapsed since these services were rendered, he thought that a service of two years might be considered sufficient to entitle the parties to the benefit of the act. He submitted a motion to this effect.

The motion was agreed to; and several other blanks in the bill having been filled up,

The subject was further debated by Messrs. VERPLANCK, TAYLOR, CHILTON, BURGESS, DRAPER, BATES, HUNTINGTON, DRAYTON, McDUFFIE, and A. H. SHEPPERD.

Mr. TUCKER then moved the amendment providing for an extension of the benefits of the bill to the militia of the several States who actually served for six months in the war of the revolution.

Mr. CHILTON moved that the committee rise, report, and ask leave to sit again, in order that the House might go into a Committee of the Whole on the military pension bills, as directed by the resolution passed on the preceding day.

Mr. WILLIAMS was in favor of extending the provisions of the bill to the militia of the States. He trusted that the committee would not rise until they came to a final decision on the subject.

Some discussion arose on a point of order, whether the question of a motion for the committee to rise was debatable.

It was decided by the Chair that the question of a motion to rise was not debatable.

The question was then taken on Mr. CHILTON's motion, which was negatived.

The subject under consideration was the amendment of Mr. TUCKER.

Mr. WILLIAMS resumed his observations in its support.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, argued that if the amendment should be attached to the bill, it would, in his opinion, be indubitably lost in the Senate. It would be better that, if the militia should be compensated in the same manner with the regular soldiers, a separate bill on the subject should be brought before Congress.

Mr. McDUFFIE was in favor of the amendment proposed by his colleague, [Mr. TUCKER,] and he assured the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPENCER] that it was not with a view of defeating the bill, nor did he think it should produce that effect. He thought, if "six months" were stricken out, and "nine months" inserted in lieu, that the bill ought to pass. If the regular soldier who served in the revolutionary war, was entitled to the relief of Congress, he contended that the militia soldier, who was equally meritorious, was entitled to the same consideration. Since the year 1818, all regular soldiers who had served nine months in the revolutionary war, and were in needy circumstances, had received pensions. It is now only asked that the same provision shall be made for the militia man of equal merits, as was made twelve years ago for the regular soldier.

Mr. TUCKER had no objection to modify his amendment so as to place the militia on the same footing as the soldiers of the line who had served nine months:

Mr. STRONG suggested that if Mr. TUCKER should withdraw his amendment, and the words "of the continental line" were erased from the bill, it would include the troops of all descriptions who served in that war.

Mr. TUCKER declined to accept of any modification which would defeat his object. What that object was, he had before stated. It was to render one and the same justice to the regular soldier and the militia man. Mr. T. subsequently modified it so as the bill should read, to include volunteer State troops and militia.

Mr. WILDE adverted to the eminent services rendered by the militia; to the battle of King's mountain; to the deeds of Generals Marion and Sumpter; and to numerous other actions, in which the militia and State troops had distinguished themselves during the revolutionary contest, and contended that they deserved equally well of their country, with the continental troops.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved that the committee rise; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. TUCKER then modified his amendment, so as to provide for compensating the officers and soldiers of the militia in a proportion to the compensation allowed to the officers and soldiers of the continental line.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, rose, and said his sentiments on this subject were so well known to most of the members of the committee, that it would be a work of supererogation to make a formal expression of them. It was well known that he was sincerely and ardently desirous of doing justice to all persons who belonged to the army of the revolution. He was anxious they should all be paid for their services; and, had it depended on him, this act of justice would not have been postponed to this late day. Important, however, as time is to the House, he felt himself constrained to make some reply to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. WILDE,] who, while he had done ample justice to the militia of the South, had not been equally true to history in his account of that class of troops in the North. The services of these men, said Mr. D., are so identified with the great achievements of the revolution, and so revered and cherished in the recollections of the population of the North, that they need no vindication there; but there are persons less familiar with the story of the revolution, who may be misled by the declaration of the gentleman that many of the militia of the North were out who did little service, and therefore are not entitled to the consideration of this Government. I know this assertion was made without the slightest intention of giving offence; but, as it does great injustice to this deserving class of persons, I cannot suffer it to pass unnoticed.

The militia of the North did no service! Who, sir, moved by the great impulses of patriotism and an ardent love of liberty, opened the great avenue of the revolution at Lexington? The militia. Who were they that volunteered their services against oppression, left the peaceful occupations of private life, and marched under the standard of freedom to Bunker's hill, and offered up their lives in the great cause of liberty, when you had no Government to raise or pay an army, or even to protect your citizens from being executed as rebels and traitors if they fell into the hands of the enemy? The militia; and they carried on the memorable siege of Boston, and drove from the devoted State of Massachusetts the armies and navies of Great Britain. This is service enough to immortalize them—but their achievements did not end here. The triumph at Bennington stands emblazoned on the page of history; and who was there? The militia of the granite State. The militia too had a large share of the glory and honor of arresting the career of Burgoyne. The regular army was driven before him; but the men from the plough poured in to sustain them from all quarters, and the campaign ended by his defeat and surrender. They were at Rhode Island in the midst of the fight and the peril there. Indeed, it would be difficult to name any one achievement in the North during the revolution which signalized the war, that did not owe much of its success to the militia.

But this is not all: there were dark, forlorn, and almost hopeless periods of that war, when the country was without funds, without credit, without an army, and almost without hope. In these times, when you could offer no bounty to invite enlistment, when you had no reward to offer but the feeble hope of the future enjoyment of a free Government, the militia were summoned to the field to sustain the sinking interests of the country, and they obeyed the call. They bore you triumphant through these seasons of peril. They stopped not to ask for any assurance of pay—but it was enough for them to know that the country was in danger—for it was their country, and, if it fell, they fell with it.

What pay did they get for such important and patriotic services? Some received nothing, others received a miserable depreciated paper currency, mere worthless rags. The pay of many months, as many of these veterans have informed me, was insufficient to defray their expenses home from camp, when dismissed from the service. Now, sir, these were men who left their families behind them to suffer, and their affairs to go to ruin; and ought they not to be remembered by this Government, now that it is rich and able to do them justice, while many of them are not only old, but poor and needy? Sir, they have never been paid, and the appeal is not made to your bounty, but to your justice. They are not beggars, but rightful claimants, and it is a misnomer to call any grant made to them a pension upon your bounty.

I have made these desultory remarks to rescue the militia of the North from reproach; and while I am up, I will take occasion to say that I almost regret that the worthy gentleman from South Carolina has offered this amendment: for, as has been observed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SPENCER,] it may endanger the passage of the bill in the Senate, where measures of this sort encounter great opposition. I should have preferred to act on this matter by itself; but, as it is before us, and as the Senate will in no shape be bound by it, but can strike it from the bill if they see fit, I shall support the amendment, provided the mover will place the militia and the troops of the line on the same footing: for I am not willing to deal more favorably by one class than by the other, and I am sure the same measure of justice to all will be most acceptable. I hope, therefore, the amendment will be so modified, and it will then have my hearty approbation. I have omitted to say any thing of the provisions for the troops of the line, not because they do not meet my most cordial approval, but because there seems to be little opposition to that measure. Those troops did us great service, and certainly had most miserable pay. Like the militia, they took what their country could give, and cancelled the legal obligation, but the moral obligation is still in force.

The Judiciary.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BURGESS supported the proposition, and the subject was further discussed by Mr. WILDE and Mr. BATES, the latter of whom suggested that a pro rata compensation should be allowed to all who had served, whether in the line or the militia, either for nine or six months. This he thought necessary to be done, and it was equally necessary that it should be done speedily.

Mr. TAYLOR moved an amendment, providing that the State troops, volunteers, or militia, who should at one or more times have served for two years, or for any period not less than six months, should be included within the benefits of the act.

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the amendment; but it was carried without a division.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved an amendment providing that the provisions of the act should only extend to those who are now, and may be hereafter, reduced to the necessity of applying to their country for support.

Mr. BARRINGER hoped his colleague [Mr. SPEIGHT] would not press his amendment. It would continue and increase the odious distinction at present existing in pension cases on the part of the rich and poor, by which the latter were obliged, were compelled to prove themselves to be paupers before they could be entitled to a reward for their services.

Mr. POLK said that he should vote for the amendment. The original pension law of 1818 contained a similar provision, as also did that of 1828.

Mr. TUCKER followed, and maintained that the pensioning of the militia was nothing more than the payment of a debt of gratitude due by the nation to those who had fought for and obtained its independence. He moved that the committee rise, and report the bill; but afterwards withdrew his motion by request.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. A. H. SHEPPERD, SPEIGHT, BATES, and BURGESS.

The question was then taken on Mr. SPEIGHT's amendment; which was negatived by a vote of yeas 34, nays not counted.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, a provision was adopted to allow to the widow or children of a deceased pensioner the balance of the semi-annual pension following his decease.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill as amended, and the House concurred in the amendments of the committee.

Mr. MCCREERY then submitted the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act for the relief of certain officers and soldiers of the revolution, passed the 15th day of May, 1828, shall not hereafter be extended to officers who were commissioned after the 30th day of December, 1781, unless they were in the service prior to the date of their commissions; and that all such officers who are now receiving pensions, be stricken from the roll from and after the passing of this act.

Mr. McC. said that he would, in a very few words, state his reason for offering to the consideration of the House this amendment to the bill. He said that it was notorious that commissions were granted to many after there was any active service performed, and that many of those who were thus commissioned, had not performed any kind of service prior to the date of their commissions, and, consequently performed none afterwards. He said that his attention had been called to this subject by a fact, which came to his knowledge some time last session, which was, that a certain presiding judge in Pennsylvania, through the influence of some of his friends, received a commission in the latter part of the year 1782, when he was quite a young man; and, although he never performed any duty, either before or after he was commissioned, is now receiving a pension. If this judge was a poor man, he would not make any objection, but this was not the case.

From the best information he was able to collect, he said, this judge was worth more than one hundred thousand dollars, and had an annual salary of sixteen hundred. He said that, in his opinion, it never was the intention of this Government to grant pensions under such circumstances, and suffer thousands of meritorious soldiers to drag out the remainder of their days in poverty and want. He said that he felt but little interest on this subject; but he felt it to be his duty to bring it before the House, and with their decision he would be satisfied.

Mr. DODDRIDGE moved the previous question; which, being sustained, cut off Mr. MCCREERY's motion.

Mr. SPEIGHT called for the yeas and nays on the previous question; but the House refused them.

Mr. LEWIS, of Alabama, moved a call of the House, but this also was negatived; and then

The question being put on ordering the bill to be engrossed, and read a third time, it was carried by the following vote:

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution proposing to print six thousand additional copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Judiciary committee.

Mr. FOSTER rose, and intimated an intention of taking a course of some latitude on the general question, in the remarks which he should offer; when

Mr. BARRINGER rose to a question of order. He desired to know of the Chair whether, after a subject had been before the House, and finally acted on, (as the bill to repeal the 25th section of the judiciary act had been,) it was in order for members to go into the merits of that subject, on an incidental question to print a document.

The SPEAKER replied, that it was not possible for the Chair to prevent members from going into the merits of the reports, to show why an extra number ought or ought not to be printed. They must be permitted to do so if they chose, however much the House or the Chair might regret it. It was a constitutional right which the Chair could not restrict. On the question simply to print the reports for the House, the debate would not be in order; but, on a motion to print an extra number, the debate on the merits could not be restrained by the Chair.

Mr. BARRINGER would not contest the decision of the Chair, although he still thought the latitude taken in the debate irregular, and would be glad if some gentleman would suggest a mode by which the sense of the House might be taken on it.

Mr. FOSTER then resumed, and entered into a review of the proceedings which had been had on this subject. Several weeks ago, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed, by a resolution of the House, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or amending the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789. Scarcely had this resolution passed, when an alarm was sounded through the newspapers, and the people were warned that a deep and fatal blow was meditated against the great judicial tribunal of the country. The committee were denounced even in anticipation; and we were threatened with the reproaches and indignation of the people, if we presumed to touch this hallowed law. But a majority of the committee, acting under a conscious sense of duty, had the temerity, in the midst of these alarms, and in the face of this galling fire from the press, to make a report recommending the repeal of the section in question, accompanied with a bill for that purpose. The minority of our associates, under a sense of duty equally conscientious, have submitted the counter report which is now on the table.

The bill thus reported, said Mr. F., it was expected would have taken the usual course; but, instead of this, even its second reading was objected to, and its rejection moved, and, on this motion, the previous question was ordered: so that all opportunity of discussing its principles was entirely prevented; and this, too, after a remark by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DODDRIE], that the bill reported was equivalent to a motion to dissolve the Union. Sir, we were not even allowed to repel the imputations thus cast on us.

[Here the SPEAKER reminded Mr. FOSTER that it was not in order to allude to the bill which had been reported by the committee, nor to the proceedings of the House with regard to it. He must be confined to the principles contained in the reports proposed to be printed.]

Mr. F. resumed. In order to confine himself to the limits prescribed by the Chair, he must pass over some remarks he intended to have made, and come immediately to the reports.

The majority of the Judiciary committee, of whom, said Mr. F., I am one, maintain that the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act of 1789 confers upon the Supreme Court of the United States powers not authorized nor contemplated by the constitution. It is my purpose to present some views, in addition to those embraced in the report, to establish this position. And, in the outset, I will notice an argument with which we are so often met on questions of this kind. The law, of which the section under consideration is a part, was passed shortly after the adoption of the federal constitution. Many of the members of the Congress by which it was enacted, were also members of the convention which framed the constitution; they, we are told, certainly knew what powers were intended to be conferred on the different departments of the Government, and would not have attempted to confer powers not authorized by the constitution. Mr. Speaker, there is much force in this argument. I place great reliance on the exposition of constitutional powers made by those who aided in the formation and adoption of the great charter of this Government. But, sir, the argument in this instance proves too much for our adversaries—it applies with equal force to every part of this judiary act; and yet one clause of it has already been declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. The 13th section of that act provides, among other things, that the Supreme Court “shall have the power to issue writs of mandamus in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed or persons holding office under the authority of the United States.” But, in the celebrated case of Marbury versus Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, the Supreme Court determined that the authority thus given was not warranted by the constitution. So, sir, gentleman must admit that the passing of this law by the framers of the constitution and their contemporaries is not conclusive as to its constitutionality, or that the Supreme Court have erred in their decision—a heresy which charity itself would scarcely tolerate at this day.

But, Mr. Speaker, I will call the attention of the House to another section of this act. The constitution declares that “the judicial power (of the United States) shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution” &c; and, after enumerating other subjects of jurisdiction, specifies “controversies between citizens of different States.” The clause first read is general; the power extends to “all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution,” &c., and even the latter clause is entirely unqualified; no particular class of “controversies between citizens of different States” is designated, and no power is given to Congress to limit the jurisdiction of the court. And yet, sir, in providing for the exercise of this jurisdiction by the circuit courts of the United States, “in suits of a civil nature at common law, or in equity, where the United States are plaintiffs, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State,” the eleventh section of the judiciary act requires that the matter in dispute should “exceed, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars.” Will any gentleman show me where the authority is given to regulate the power of the courts, or the rights of the parties, by the amount in controversy? What clause of the constitution gives Congress the power to throw open the doors of the federal courts to an individual who has a demand of six hundred dollars, and close them against him who claims only four hundred? None, sir; there is no such clause; the distinction is entirely arbitrary and unauthorized.

Sir, there is another section of this act, which merits some consideration. The twelfth section provides, that, “if a suit be commenced in any State court against an alien, or by a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of five hundred dollars, and the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in such State court, file a petition for the removal of the cause for trial into the next (United States) circuit court to be held in the district where the suit is pending,” then, on certain conditions, the State court is prohibited from proceeding any further, but the cause shall be removed to the circuit court, “and then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process.” Mr. Speaker, in my view, this is a most extraordinary provision. Here is an instance of a court’s being ousted of its legitimate jurisdiction, without being permitted to pronounce a judgment, and that without the consent of one of the parties. I say its legitimate jurisdiction—for it is not pretended that the cause which may be thus removed is not cognizable by the State court. If this were the case, the party would have only to plead to the jurisdiction of the court, and terminate the suit at once. But the law, from its phraseology, evidently contemplates causes in which the State courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States; and, if the defendant chooses to submit to the jurisdiction of the State court, and permit his cause to be tried, its judgment would, doubtless, be valid and binding. Here, then, the court is dependent on the consent of the party for the exercise of its jurisdiction. I repeat that this is a most extraordinary provision, and, so far as I am informed, without a precedent: certainly the country from which we derive most of our principles of jurisprudence furnishes no similar proceedings, and I am not aware that there are any in any of the States where they have courts of different grades, possessing, in many instances, concurrent jurisdiction. I will not say that the law giving this privilege of removing a cause from the State to the United States' courts, is contrary to the constitution; but I cannot believe that such a proceeding was contemplated by the framers of that instrument. I have referred to these different sections of the judiciary act, sir, for the purpose of showing how much is wanting of that perfection which is imputed to it, and to lessen that sanctity which is attempted to be thrown round it. I now proceed to the consideration of the section more immediately in question—that section which gives to the Supreme Court its omnipotent powers.

The Judiciary.

The twenty-fifth section of the act referred to declares that “a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity,” &c., “may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error,” &c. The first idea that suggests itself to the mind, in reading this section, is, the distinction made between the parties to the suit, in allowing an appeal. An action is brought in a State court; the defendant sets up, in his defence, a treaty, or the constitution, or a law of the United States. If there be a right of appeal to the Supreme Court from the decision which may be made, it must be derived from that clause of the constitution conferring on the Supreme Court its appellate powers; but that clause extends the power to “all cases in law or equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under their authority;” whereas this twenty-fifth section confines it to cases where the decision shall be against the validity of the treaty, constitution, &c. The case, then, so far as regards the Supreme Court, arises under the decision of the State court, and not under the constitution or treaty. The party who sets up this defence has a double advantage: if his plea is overruled, he appeals to the Supreme Court, where the decision may be reversed; but, if it is sustained, his adversary has no resort—the judgment of the State court is final. Is there not manifest inequality and injustice here? And will gentlemen tell us by what forced construction of the constitution (that convenient auxiliary of the advocates for power) they establish the right of Congress thus to discriminate between individuals prosecuting their rights in our courts of justice? Sir, this is the law on which, we are gravely told, the union of these States depends—the provisions of which are so perfect, and its character so sacred, that, in the opinion of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CRAWFORD,] even to touch it is profanity!

I come now, said Mr. F., to the principal, and much the most important, feature of this celebrated section—the power it confers on the Supreme Court to re-examine and reverse the judgments of the State courts. And here, sir, the simply inquiry is, whether this power is given by the constitution. For, if it is not, it will not be contended that it can be conferred by statute. On the contrary, if the constitution does give the power, a repeal of this section would not prevent the exercise of it by the court. The powers and duties of the different departments of the Government are specified and defined by the constitution; the mode of their exercise is, in many instances, prescribed by statute. If the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act had merely pointed out the manner in which appeals should be taken to the Supreme Court, there could be no objection to it—it would then only have been necessary to turn to the constitution, and ascertain to what cases, and from what tribunal, this right applies. But our objection is, that, by this section, powers are conferred on the Supreme Court, not authorized by the constitution, and alarming to the rights of the State courts, and to the sovereignty of the States.

The first argument which I would urge, (and to my mind it is perfectly conclusive,) to show that the constitution does not give the Supreme Court the right to review and decide upon the judgments of the State courts, is, that that power is not specified in the constitution itself. The powers of the Federal Government are divided into three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial. The powers assigned to each are specified and defined—and to none of the departments more particularly than to the judicial. Very extensive (and I will add alarming) powers are given to it; yet they are specifically enumerated. The agents, too, by whom these powers are to be administered, are pointed out—by “one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.”

Let it be remembered that, throughout the constitution, there is not the slightest connexion indicated between any of the departments of the Federal with similar departments of the State Governments. No such connexion was intended, and, least of all, a supervisory power over any departments of the State Governments, acting within the sphere of their retained sovereignty. Have gentlemen forgotten the proposition made in the federal convention to vest Congress with the power to negative the laws of the State Legislatures? And can there be a doubt that an effort to give the federal judiciary the power to revise and reverse the judgments of the State courts would have shared the same fate? Sir, the jealousy and apprehensions entertained by the friends of the rights of the States, at the powers proposed to be given to the General Government, are matters of history, and how well founded they were, let history answer.

But, sir, there is another reason, which is very satisfactory to me that this right of appeal from a State to the United States' court was not understood, at the formation of the constitution, to have been given; and that is, that, in the debates of the State conventions on the ratification of the constitution, there is no reference to this power. Had such been the understanding, the clause supposed to confer it could not have passed unnoticed. What, sir, a clause which has the tendency, not only to prostrate the dignity of State courts, but to humble the sovereignty of State Governments, at the foot of this august tribunal, not to have elicited even a passing remark! When every part of the constitution was so scrutinized, and almost every power proposed to be conferred so zealously resisted by those jealous advocates of State rights in the Virginia convention, can it be believed that this overshadowing, this omnipotent power, would have excited no apprehension? Sir, if the keen and eagle eye of Patrick Henry had but detected it lurking under those terms, “appellate jurisdiction”—had he imagined that it referred to appeals from State courts, he would have exposed and denounced it—and in that glowing and powerful eloquence which was so peculiarly his own, he would have warned his countrymen of “the chains that were forging for them.”

But, said Mr. F., I have some other evidence, of rather a more direct and positive character; and to this I particularly ask the attention of the gentlemen from New York. The convention of that State which ratified the federal constitution proposed a number of amendments, and among them was the following: "That the Congress shall not constitute, ordain, or establish any tribunals of inferior courts with any other than appellate jurisdiction, except such as may be necessary for the trial of causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas; and in all other cases to which the judicial power of the United States extends, and in which the Supreme Court of the United States has not original jurisdiction, the causes shall be heard, tried, and determined in some one of the State courts, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, or other proper tribunal, to be established for that purpose by the Congress, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make." Now, sir, can we have any doubt of the opinion entertained by this convention as to the appellate power conferred on the Supreme Court by the constitution? Will gentlemen believe that that convention of sages would have gravely proposed to amend the constitution so as to confer powers already granted? Sir, no man can believe it. They conceived, as the majority of the Judiciary committee now allege, that this constitution did not give this right of appeal; and, for the expression of this opinion, we have been denounced in unmeasured terms. Sir, gentlemen must pardon me when I tell them they have not examined this question; they have been alarmed by the clamor which was raised, and were afraid to suffer even a discussion of the subject, lest they too should be classed with the nullifiers, traitors, and disunionists.

[Here Mr. FOSTER's remarks were suspended, by the expiration of the hour allotted to the consideration of resolutions.]

On a subsequent morning, Mr. F. resumed his argument, by correcting a mistake which he had made when he previously addressed the House. In reference to the provision of removing certain cases from the State courts to the United States' circuit court, previous to any judgment being rendered, I stated, said Mr. F., that I believed this was a provision perfectly anomalous; that there was no precedent for it in England, nor in any of the States. I have since understood that in some of the States cases may be transferred from the court in which they were commenced to one of a higher grade. I make this correction, because I do not wish to found an argument on any croneous assumption of facts. There is, however, a wide difference between removing cases from one court to another of the same State, and a removal from a State court, clothed, by the constitution of its own State, with power to hear, and finally determine, the cause, to a court of the United States. Between the former, by the constitution of the State, there is a direct connexion; not so with the latter. And although it was competent to the framers of the constitution to have given this right of removing a case from the State to the United States' court, I cannot conceive that that right is fairly inferrible from the constitution as it now stands.

But if this right does exist, and if Congress may now, by law, provide for its exercise, it furnishes one of the strongest arguments against the right of appeal from the judgment of a State court. For if a party, on being sued in a State court, may remove the cause to a federal court, and does not choose to avail himself of his privilege, he cannot complain of the judgment which may be rendered; he has voluntarily submitted to the jurisdiction of the State court, and should, therefore, be bound to abide the decision. The plaintiff having selected the tribunal to adjudicate his rights, would have still less cause of complaint if that decision should be against him.

The disrespect shown to the dignity of State courts, by subjecting their judgments to revisal by the Supreme Court, is a matter of little importance to those who regard them as inferior or subordinate to the federal tribunals; but, sir, regarding, as I do, the State institutions, while acting within the sphere of the sovereignty retained by the States, as subordinate to no power whatever, I never can consent to see them thus degraded in rank, and shorn of their rights.

There are some other clauses of the constitution conferring jurisdiction on the Supreme Court, the meaning and extent of which I will take this occasion to examine, as they are intimately connected with the subject of this investigation. I am the more gratified at having the opportunity to do so, because it will enable me to enter into the defence of certain principles which have long been maintained by the State of which I am an unworthy representative; principles which she holds most sacred, and which she will not tamely yield. But I will not fatigue the House with an argument of my own. No, sir, I will not rely on my own feeble arm, when I have weapons so much more powerful and effective within my reach. Sir, when I present the recorded opinions and expositions of James Madison and John Marshall, I know they must command the respect of this House; and it is a source of no little pride and gratification, that most of the prominent principles for which Georgia has contended, in her controversies with the General Government, are amply supported by the opinions of these distinguished men.

The first clause of the constitution, to which I refer, is that which gives to the Supreme Court jurisdiction in "controversies between a State and citizens of another State." Now, let us hear the reason why this power was conferred. I give it in the words of Mr. Madison, and particularly invite the attention of gentlemen who place so much reliance on the exposition of the constitution made contemporaneously with its formation. I read from Mr. Madison's speech in the Virginia convention, in reply to gentlemen who were vehemently opposed to the ratification of the constitution: "Its (the federal court's) jurisdiction in controversies between a State and citizens of another State," says the gentleman, "is much objected to, and perhaps without reason. It is not in the power of individuals to call any State into court. The only operation it can have, is, that, if a State should wish to bring suit against a citizen, it must be brought before the federal court. It appears to me that this can have no operation but this, to give a citizen a right to be heard in the federal courts; and, if a State should condescend to be a party, this court may take cognizance of it."

What says Mr. Marshall on the same subject? "With respect to disputes between a State and citizens of another State, its (the federal court's) jurisdiction has been decreed with unusual vehemence. I hope no gentleman will think that a State will be called at the bar of the federal court. Is there no such case at present? Are there not many cases in which the Legislature of Virginia is a party? And yet the State is not sued. It is not rational to suppose that the sovereign power shall be dragged before a court. The intent is, to enable States to recover claims of individuals residing in other States. I contend this construction is warranted by the words. But, say they, (gentlemen who had objected to this power,) there will be partiality in it, if a State cannot be defendant—if an individual cannot proceed to obtain judgment against a State, though he may be sued by a State." What is Mr. Marshall's reply to this objection? "It is necessary to be so, and cannot be avoided. I see a difficulty in making a State defendant, which does not prevent its being made plaintiff." Sir, I make no comments on these expositions of federal court powers—they are too plain to require any.

The opinions and arguments from which these extracts have been read, were delivered in the year 1783. Who that heard them, Mr. Speaker, would have believed that, in less than five years, a suit would have been instituted in the Supreme Court of the United States, by an individual, against one of the States, and that the jurisdiction would have been maintained by the court? Yet, sir, this was done in several instances; and one of the States against which suit was thus brought, was Georgia! that State which seems doomed to be the subject of General Government experiments. And what course did Georgia pursue? Did she quietly submit to be "dragged before the court?" Did she, in the language of Mr. Madison, "condescend to be a party" to this suit? No, sir. She acted then as she has on a more recent occasion. She considered the summons "to the bar of the Federal (Supreme) Court" as an attack on her sovereignty; and she disregarded it, and resolved to protect herself against any judgment that might be rendered against her. And what was the consequence of her firmness on that occasion? Although, perhaps, censured and abused for a time, as usual, she very soon after had the satisfaction of seeing her principles recognised by her sister States, as was clearly indicated by an amendment to the constitution, expressly providing that "the judicial power of the United States should not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

The Judiciary.

But there is another branch of jurisdiction which is claimed for the Supreme Court, under the constitution, but more especially under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, and which has been, very recently, absolutely denied by the public authorities of the State of Georgia. And that is, the right of the Supreme Court, under its appellate power, to review and determine on the judgment of a State court in a criminal prosecution, in which the State is a party. Sir, the view taken of this subject by Mr. Madison, in the celebrated Virginia report of '99, is so clear and conclusive, that I cannot deny myself the pleasure of reading it to the House: "The expression 'cases in law and equity' (in the constitution) is manifestly confined to cases of a civil nature; and would exclude cases of criminal jurisdiction: criminal cases in law and equity would be a language unknown to the law."

"The succeeding paragraph of the same section," continues the report, "is in harmony" with this construction. It is in these words: "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases, (including cases in law and equity arising under the constitution,) the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as Congress shall make. This paragraph, by expressly giving an appellate jurisdiction in cases of law and equity arising under the constitution, to fact as well as to law, clearly excludes criminal cases, where the trial by jury is secured, because the fact in such cases is not a subject of appeal."

"Once more" (the report adds) "the amendment last added to the constitution deserves attention, as throwing light on this subject. The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign Power. As it will not be pretended that any criminal proceeding could take place against a State, the terms law or equity must be understood as appropriate to civil, in exclusion of criminal cases."

Such, sir, are the sentiments and reasoning of this great statesman on this point. What consideration they may be entitled to, is submitted to the judgment of the House. As, however, his opinions on other subjects are so much sought after of late, and so much admired, I trust they will not be without their weight of this.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have another authority, bearing so directly on this point, that it must not be passed over unnoticed—and to which the serious attention of the gentlemen from New York is again most specially invited. I have already stated that when the convention of that State ratified the federal constitution, they proposed several amendments, which they urged should be adopted. They also prefixed to their assent to the ratification a declaration of certain rights and principles which they conceived were not affected by the constitution, and then added: "Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said constitution," &c. "We, the said delegates, do assent to and ratify the said constitution." Now, sir, one of these "explanations consistent with the constitution" is in these words: "That the judicial power of the United States, in cases in which a State may be a party, does not extend to criminal prosecutions, or to authorize any suit by any person against a State." Mr. Speaker, it is a well established principle of the common law, as well as the plain dictate of common sense, that a contract is to be construed as understood by the parties to it at the time it was made. The constitution is a contract between the different States of this Union. New York was a party, and a very important party, to this contract; and she resolved to leave no uncertainty as to her understanding of it, or of the obligations she was about to assume. Sir, it would really seem as if the members of that convention looked forward with a prophetic eye to the disposition of this Government to acquire, by the aid of construction, powers not delegated to it, and that they determined to plant round it as many guards as possible against these dangerous encroachments. And when, among the distinguished names of which that convention was composed, we find those of Jay, Clinton, Hamilton, Morris, Livingston, and many others, the construction which they placed on the constitution is entitled to the highest respect.

There is only one more clause of the constitution, with which I intend to trouble the House; it is that which extends the power of the Supreme Court to "controversies between a State and foreign States." Let us inquire of Mr. Madison what is the intent and extent of this jurisdiction: "The next case (says this gentleman in the Virginia convention) provides for disputes between a foreign State and one of our States, should such a case ever arise; and between a citizen, and a foreign citizen, or subject. I do not conceive that any controversy can ever be decided in these courts, between an American and a foreign State, without the consent of the parties. If they consent, provision is here made."

To this opinion, I beg leave to add that of Mr. John Marshall, on the same occasion. In reply to Mr. George Mason, Mr. Marshall says—"He (Mr. Mason) objects to its (the federal court's) jurisdiction in controversies between a State and a foreign State. Suppose, says he, in such a suit a foreign State is cast, will she be bound by the decision? If a foreign State brought a suit against the commonwealth of Virginia, would she not be barred from the claim, if the federal judiciary thought it unjust? The previous consent of the parties is necessary."

Thus we see these two gentlemen concurring in the opinion, that to enable the Supreme Court to exercise this jurisdiction, the consent of the parties, the States, is indispensable.

To show more clearly the absurdity of this doctrine, that a foreign State may bring one of these States into the Supreme Court, permit me, Mr. Speaker, to present a single case, as an illustration. There has recently been a dispute between the State of Maine and the province of New Brunswick. Instead, then, of settling it by negotiation between the two Governments, suppose Great Britain had brought an action in the Supreme Court against Maine, for the disputed territory. Sir, it would have been the standing jest of the day; it would have been too ludicrous for grave judicial consideration. Yet, a people residing within the limits of the State of Georgia, who, some four or five years ago, declared themselves independent, have, as rumor informs us, instituted suit in the Supreme Court, as a foreign nation, against that State—and that, too, under the advice of distinguished counsel. That such a case will be sustained, I cannot believe. Georgia has not only given no consent to have the case adjudicated by the court, but she will not feel herself bound by any judgment that may be awarded.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the powers of the Supreme Court, particularly as specified in the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act, as being vast and alarming. I concur most sincerely with the opinion expressed by my worthy friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HUNTINGTON,] at the last session of Congress, that, “in comparison with the judiciary, all the other departments of this Government are weak and powerless.” But, sir, when the gentleman added, that it controlled even sovereignty itself, by pointing it to the clause which says “thus far shalt thou go, and no farther,” I confess I did not correctly understand the import of his language. Little, indeed, did I dream how soon we should have a demonstration of this omnipotence, and that my devoted State was, as usual, to be the subject.

Sir, I have already had occasion to speak of the repeated conflicts of the State of Georgia with this Government. She has, indeed, had her days of darkness and of trial—sometimes standing almost alone, and breasting the almost overwhelming torrent of public opinion. But she remained firm and unmoved; and when the storm has passed over, when the excitement has subsided, she has had the proud satisfaction to see her principles recognised, and to hear her course approved. She still acts upon the same principles—she still pursues the same straightforward course; and, in her present difficulties, she confidently anticipates the same result. She only carries into practical operation the doctrines so clearly laid down, and so ably maintained, by Madison and Marshall; these are the “burning and shining lights” which illuminate her path, and guide her course; and it is for an intelligent and impartial public to say whether, for thus acting, she should be placed under the ban, and devoted to destruction.

Mr. Speaker, it would be gross affectation if I were to speak of the distinguished individuals who adorn the bench of the Supreme Court in any other terms than those of the most profound respect. But the reverence which is so generally entertained for the characters of the judges excites some of the greatest apprehensions as to the dangers likely to grow out of the powers of the court. Sir, let us remember not only that these judges are fallible, but that they are not immortal. That splendid orb which has been so long the centre of this system—which in its meridian shone with such bright effulgence, and which preserves such mild and steady lustre in its evening hours, is fast verging to the horizon, and must soon set. Its distinguished secondaries, in the revolutions of years, must also finish their course—and who can foresee the character of their successors? With the same powers, and without the same purity of purpose to direct them, who can tell what mischiefs they may not commit? Against these dangers it is our duty to guard. We cannot too cautiously and securely provide against the exercise of arbitrary power. No policy is more unwise and unsafe, than that of confiding powers with reference to the individual by whom they are to be exercised—no matter how pure and elevated the character of that individual may be. Sir, it was for the purpose of providing against future danger, and with the hope of checking an evil which is constantly increasing, and which threatens the peace and harmony of our country—the interference of federal with State authorities—that the majority of the Judiciary committee were induced to recommend a repeal of that section of our judiciary act which confers upon your Supreme Court such unlimited powers.

As to the resolution immediately under consideration, I have only to say, in conclusion, that, as the majority and minority of the committee differed so widely in their views of the question presented to them, it is both right and proper that the people at large should see the reasoning by which they have arrived at conclusions so entirely opposite. After the imputations which have been cast upon the majority, we consider it a matter of strict justice that their views should be published, and let an unprejudiced world determine whether we have indeed been plotting treason in the very bosom of our national councils.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS.

The engrossed bill making further provision for the surviving officers and soldiers, militia, State troops, and volunteers, of the revolutionary service, was read a third time, and the question stated on its passage.

Mr. TREZVANT rose, and said he was aware of the great majority by which this bill had been ordered to be engrossed yesterday, and he knew he was presenting himself in an unenviable position by interposing any obstacles to its immediate passage; yet, contemplating the effects which it must produce upon the financial operations of the Government, he felt constrained, by a sense of duty, to throw himself, for a short time, upon the courtesy of the House. He said, that by the provisions of this bill, if it should become a law, we are about to place upon the roll of pensioners every individual, without regard to the character in which he might have served in the revolutionary war; no matter whether rich or poor, if his service was of six months' duration. Not content with the bountiful liberality already extended to the brave and gallant men who were engaged in most of the hard-fought battles in that eventful war, which terminated in establishing our independence, we are now called upon to adopt a measure that will embrace within the scope of its bounty all who survive, and which must necessarily increase the number of pensioners to an unknown extent, and create demands upon the treasury, that will absorb a large proportion of your current revenue. Is the list of pensioners not sufficiently swelled under the existing laws, that we must dispense with the prudent limitations imposed upon the bounty of the Government, and invite multitudes who are not claiming it as a right, or even asking it as a favor, to partake of a liberality almost without bounds, and certainly unprecedented?

At present, Mr. Speaker, a pension cannot be obtained unless the applicant is in necessitous circumstances; and he is held to strict proof of the time of service, which must be, at the least, nine months; and required to furnish, under oath, a schedule of his property. Notwithstanding these wise and salutary restrictions, intended to confine the benefits of your pension system to those who really stand in need of the assistance of their country, and to guard your treasury against frauds—not less than between eleven and twelve thousand are at this time in the enjoyment of your bounty, requiring, I think, an annual expenditure of between twelve and fifteen hundred thousand dollars. From this data a probable conjecture might be formed as to the effects of this bill, should it pass, in increasing the number of pensioners, and the annual expenditure to be made for the payment of their pensions.

Mr. T. said that he did not know what was the number of soldiers engaged in the revolutionary war. The number, however, must have been very great, if the militia, as well as those in the continental line, are included in the estimate. The war was waged for seven years, and was actively prosecuted from one extremity of the Union to the other. No part of the seaboard escaped its ravages, and the militia, in aid of the regular forces, were frequently called out in all the States, and but few performed a service for a shorter period than six months. It cannot be doubted that there are many thousands, scattered over all parts of the United States, who will be entitled to the benefits contemplated by this bill, and will avail themselves of its provisions. It is impossible to speak with absolute accuracy upon this subject, but the number of pensioners now on the roll furnishes a rule that will enable us to approximate sufficiently near the truth to induce gentlemen to hesitate before they proceed further in this ruinous policy.

At present it should be remembered, that, with the exception of those who were provided for in the act of 1828-29, none but the indigent, who have served continuously nine months in the continental line, are entitled to the benefits of the pension acts. The possession of more than three hundred dollars worth of property excludes the soldier from this bounty. With these restrictions, it has been stated that the number at present upon the pension list amounts to between eleven and twelve thousand. It cannot be reasonably supposed that one-third of the survivors of that band of patriots, who knew so well how to estimate the value of liberty, and encountered such fearful perils to secure its possession to themselves and their prosperity, have been so regardless of their comfort and independence as, after a lapse of fifty years, uninterruptedly devoted to the improvement of their fortunes, to be found at this day in the possession of less than three hundred dollars worth of property. Admit, however, that one-third of these men, either by misfortune or improvidence, have been reduced to this condition. Remove the restrictions at present imposed, and from the ranks of the continental line alone you will have a list of pensioners amounting to between thirty and thirty-six thousand. The relative proportion of militia and continental troops cannot be ascertained with precision; but the history of those times, and the recollection of those who witnessed the scenes of that period, and yet live, will bear me out in saying that the militia engaged in the revolutionary struggle, at different times from its commencement to its termination, greatly exceeded the number of regular or continental troops. If they were only equal in number, it is clearly shown that, by the passage of this bill, you will increase the list of pensioners from between eleven and twelve thousand, to between sixty and eighty thousand. With this view of the facts, an opinion may be hazarded, that, to maintain your pensioners, the sum required annually, instead of being, as at present, between twelve and fifteen hundred thousand dollars, will between six and ten millions of dollars. Admit, Mr. Speaker, that the smallest of the last mentioned sums will be required annually to meet the expenditures to be incurred by the adoption of this measure, where is it to come from? Your treasury may be in a healthful state. It is no doubt prepared to meet expected and ordinary demands, but it is not so redundant as to be able to meet one so unexpected, and of such an extraordinary character. Mr. Speaker, we have yet a heavy and a long standing debt hanging over us, which sound policy requires should be paid before this system of waste and extravagance should be indulged in. We should be just before we are generous. If this bill should become a law, how will this debt be discharged? It is evident that the sum which will be annually required to carry it into effect cannot be supplied from the current revenue, unless other appropriations necessary to the ordinary current expenses of the Government should be dispensed with, or you invade the sinking fund, long since established, and sacredly pledged to the payment of the interest and principal of the public debt. If you do not impose additional taxes or borrow money, this must be done; and, as a necessary consequence, the payment of the public debt will be postponed. We have been told by the Excutive that the revenue of the Government was equal to the payment of this debt as early as the year 1834, or 1835 at furthest. The people have been told so for the last two or three years, and they are most anxiously looking forward to this desirable period. They expect, then, to be relieved from that weight of taxes by which they have been so grievously oppressed, especially since the year 1828. In this country, as in all others, the people look to the degree of taxation they are exposed to, as one of the best evidences of the wisdom or folly, the goodness or badness, of the Government under which they live, and of those who administer its affairs. When their industry is least trammelled by unnecessary burdens, and they are left free to enjoy the fruits of their labor with the least possible interference on the part of the Government, they are not often inclined to complain of the acts of the Government; but under a state of taxation which is felt to be oppressive, and promises to be perpetual, they will complain, and their complaints must ultimately be respected. With a view to avert the evils he apprehended would flow from the bill if it passed in its present form, Mr. T. submitted the following motion:

“That the said bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to inquire and report to the House the amount which will probably be required annually to carry its provisions into effect, and the amount which probably would be annually required to carry the said bill into effect, provided its provisions were restricted to those only who are in such reduced circumstances in life as to stand in need of assistance of the country for support; and further to inquire and report whether the amount which may be required to carry the provisions of the said bill into effect can be drawn from the treasury without invading the sinking fund, and thereby postponing the payment of the public debt.”

Heretofore, said Mr. T., the policy of this Government had been to confine the benefits of the pension law to those who had been disabled in the military and naval service of the country, and to those who had served in the revolutionary war, and were reduced to a state of indigence and want. Now, it is proposed to go beyond this policy, and to lay the foundation of a splendid pension system. All who participated in the war of the revolution, no matter what their merits may be, are invited to come forward and throw themselves upon the charity and beneficence of the Government—a sumptuous banquet is to be spread, and the country is to be ransacked to gather together multitudes to riot and revel at the feast. It is not in human nature to resist an invitation so strongly appealing to its cupidity and avarice. All who remain, of the regular army or militia of the war of the revolution, will be quartered upon your treasury.

Mr. T. said that he knew that much had been said, in and out of the House, of the meritorious services of the revolutionary patriots, and of the debt of gratitude which the country owed them. No one was more ready than he was to award to them that meed of praise to which they were so richly entitled; and he entertained so exalted an opinion of the patriotism by which he trusted they were still animated, that he believed he should go as far as any of them desired, if he contributed in his station here to extend relief to such of them as really stood in need of assistance from their country. If, however, he should be mistaken in this opinion, as his justification, he would say, that it was a bad rule in legislation to surrender the dictates of the judgment, and follow the impulse of the feelings. Whenever it was done, the consequences invariably proved to be injurious to the people. Mr. T. said he had no inducement, nor did he feel any desire, to derogate from the well-earned fame of the men who fought and suffered to establish our independence, nor would he throw any obstacles in the way of any measure calculated and intended to afford the comforts necessary to their real wants; but he could not consent to give away millions to those who did not stand in need of it. The idea of men who were rolling in affluence and indulging in all the luxuries of civilized life being sustained and supported at the public expense, in a country and under a Government where we boast of equal rights, was to him odious in the extreme, and would be so considered by the people. He must beseech gentlemen again to weigh well the consequences of this measure. Sixty thousand pensioners to be maintained from your treasury by the annual expenditure of an amount that must arrest for some time the payment of the public debt, and fasten upon the people, for an indefinite period, a system of taxation under which, even now, they are justly restless and dissatisfied, must present a consideration that the prudent and discreet would not cast aside.

Mr. T. said that he had designedly confined the remarks which he had made upon this subject to those points to which, in support of his motion, he had felt it his duty chiefly to call the attention of the House; but, before he took leave of the subject, he would say that he felt opposed to the pensioning system, upon other grounds. He believed it was better calculated to demoralize the community than almost any other kind of legislation. It weakens those ties which, in all well regulated communities, should be sedulously cherished as the strongest ligaments which bind man to the performance of his social duties. The aged parent, who has a moral right to lean upon his offspring for support in the decline of life, will be told that that obligation no longer exists, as the Government has undertaken to provide for him. The brother will be denied the hospitality of a brother's roof, or a place at his board, and turned out of doors to live upon the charity of Government. Those affections, which constituted the chief enjoyment of life, will be put to hazard by the introduction of such an extended system of governmental charity. Mr. T. said that he regretted he had occupied so much time in presenting his views upon this subject to the House, especially as he was satisfied his efforts would be unsuccessful; yet he should have the consolation to know that he had attempted to discharge his duty to his constituents and to the country, and at the same time that he had obeyed the dictates of his own conscience in submitting what he had said.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, said he was in favor of doing something for the State troops, volunteers, and militia. These men had rendered services as important, had endured hardships as great, and suffered privations as distressing, as the regular soldiers. The time was, during the revolution, that every thing depended upon them; they were subject to daily alarms, and daily calls to resist the devastating progress of the enemy—they met these calls with alacrity, and a patriotism inferior to none—exposed their lives and shed their blood in defence of their country's freedom; and were they now to be forgotten? Was Congress to legislate for the benefit of the regular soldier only? Those in the regular service stipulated to serve for a sum certain, and most of them had been paid agreeably to the contract.

It would be recollected, he said, that most of those in the South, who took an active part in achieving the liberties of the country, belonged to the militia; but it made no difference with him to what section of country that class of soldiers belonged. They had rendered essential services: without them the war could not have been successfully carried on, and, but for their patriotic exertions, we might have been at this day groaning under the yoke of a foreign despot. They had never received their pay in any thing but a depreciated paper currency of nominal value. But few of them now remain, and a large portion of these were borne down by age and infirmities, and lingering out a miserable existence under the blighting influence of a cheerless poverty. Should these men now be told, in the evening of their days, that they were less patriotic, that their services were less valuable, and they less deserving, than the regular soldiers? Such an invidious distinction was unfeeling and cruel. Mr. T. said, we owe them a debt: we are their debtors, and they our creditors. Justice demands that we should pay them. By our acts of legislation, we had made provision for a class of officers and soldiers, to which class belong many who are in easy circumstances. [He alluded to the act of 1828, which provided for all those who enlisted for and served during the war, without reference to their pecuniary situation.] He could see no ground for distinction, nor could he discover any good reason for paying that class in preference to the militia. The distinction, he said, was odious and unjust. It evinced a partiality on the part of the Government, not warranted by the circumstances of the case. He had never been the friend of the pensioning system; but as it had been adopted, and would be kept up by the Government, he insisted that even-handed justice should be awarded to all. Would any gentleman say to him that such men as the immortal Sumpter and Marion, with their devoted compatriots, were less worthy or less deserving than those attached to the regular service? South Carolina held them in the most grateful remembrance. Their venerated names shed a lustre of glory upon that State, and their patriotic devotion adorned the pages of American history. Shall we, said he, suffer the brave followers of these brave men to pine in want and die in poverty, while we are awarding our bounty to those who are not more deserving? Justice was all that he desired; and, in giving his vote for paying the militia, he considered that he should act in strict conformity to her requirements. He had named Sumpter and Marion—he might add, Butler, Williams, Pickens, Hill, and a host of others, who rendered services unequalled in the history of the revolution. Could any American read the record of their patriotic deeds, and lay his hand upon his heart, and say, they were less deserving than those for whom provision has been made? He repeated that it was not only a debt of gratitude which we owed to these men; but we were under a pecuniary obligation to them, which had never been discharged. As the representative of honest constituents, willing to discharge their honest debts, he should venture to give his assent to paying these men.

It is but a few days, said Mr. T., since we voted a large amount as a donation to a distinguished individual of this country. He alluded to Mr. Monroe, late President of the United States. Why was that sum voted to him? Because his fame had been shed abroad, and the splendor of the gift was to make a flourish in the world. Will this Government be generous and refuse to be just? Shall the poor militia man be denied his honest due, and kept from his scanty pittance, while we lavish our thousands and tens of thousands upon those who have no legal claim upon us? Let the American people avoid the reproach which such a course of legislation would bring upon them. Justice was equally due to the high, the low, the rich, and the poor; and so long as he had a tongue to utter a sentence, he would advocate this principle.

Mr. T. said, you have expended money enough in your unconstitutional works of internal improvement—in the construction of your big and little roads, your canals, and your surveys, to have paid those poor men what was their due. In your anxiety to prosecute a splendid national scheme, and to dazzle the world with the glory of a great American system, you have forgotten the debts you owed, and the sufferings of those to whom they were due. Pursue this policy a little longer—lavish your money upon some who are not entitled to it—withhold it from others to whom it is due, and squander your treasure according to the policy of your misnamed American system, and your liberties are gone forever.

Appropriation Bills.

Mr. CARSON was against the bill, as at present advised, (having been detained from the House by indisposition yesterday, during the discussion,) and was in favor of the commitment, to ascertain, as near as practicable, what it would cost.

Mr. RICHARDSON said the session now drew very near to its close; there were many subjects of great importance yet to be acted on; and as, after the full discussion and the decisive vote of yesterday, further debate could answer no purpose, he felt it a duty to the House and the country to move the previous question; but he withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. VERPLANCK, on a promise that Mr. V. would renew it when he had made an explanation in reply to some of the statements of Mr. TREZVANT, which Mr. V. proceeded to do, giving it as his opinion, from the best data in possession of the committee, which he stated in detail, that the bill would require an additional expenditure of not more than from 800,000 to $1,000,000, and this rapidly decreasing, and soon, in the course of nature, to be entirely discontinued. He concluded, according to promise, with moving the previous question.

The motion was sustained; and the question being put on the passage of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 132, nays 52.

So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the several remaining appropriation bills.

The committee spent three hours in discussing various amendments to these bills, as they successively came under consideration, and on motions to fill blanks with particular sums, or to reduce appropriations. The following were the chief questions decided:

To the navy appropriation bill, Mr. DRAYTON moved an amendment to restore the pay and emoluments of the officers of the marine corps to what they had been prior to 1829, when they were reduced by the construction of the Fourth Auditor; and, after some opposition by Mr. WICKLIFFE, and remarks by Messrs. DRAYTON and McDUFFIE in its favor, the amendment was adopted.

In the military appropriation bill, Mr. DRAYTON moved to increase the appropriation for fortifications from 100,000 to $200,000. The motion was very strenuously opposed by Mr. YANCEY, and was negatived.

Mr. McDUFFIE made an unsuccessful motion to appropriate $2,000 for the purchase of medals to be distributed to Indian chiefs; and

Mr. BATES made an unsuccessful motion to insert an amendment directing that the Indian annuities be hereafter paid in the manner which had been pursued previously to the last year—the yeas being 53, nays 61.

Mr. VERPLANCK moved to insert an appropriation in the harbor bill (conformable to an existing law) of $50,000, for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved an amendment to appropriate an additional sum of $150,000, to be expended, under the direction of the present superintendent, in the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, from its mouth to Pittsburg, in removing the obstructions in the channels at the shoal places and ripples, and by the erection of wing dams, or such other means as, in the opinion of said superintendent, will best answer the purpose of deepening the channels of said river.

Some debate arose, in which Mr. CARSON opposed the appropriation. Messrs. WILDE and McDUFFIE objected to inserting it in the present bill, which was intended only to appropriate for objects already authorized by law; and Mr. WICKLIFFE defended it.

Mr. VINTON said that he would not, at that late hour, give his reasons at large upon the proposed amendment, but he would state, in a few words, the ground upon which he thought it ought to be adopted. The improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river was, in truth, nothing more than an extension of the canals of Ohio and Pennsylvania. These two States were incurring an expense of ten or fifteen millions of dollars; the one in opening a canal from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, and the other between Lake Erie and the Ohio river; thus opening a continued communication from Philadelphia to New Orleans by the Pennsylvania canal, and from New York to New Orleans through the Erie and Ohio canal. Owing to certain shoals in the Ohio river, its navigation was almost wholly suspended for about two months every autumn; and that, too, at the very best season of the year for business on these canals. The loss of business on this account must be very great. It is of little consequence that the Ohio canal enters the Ohio river, unless the produce of the interior can descend to New Orleans, or other place of destination. So of the Pennsylvania canal; it is in vain for that State to think of participating to any considerable extent in the trade of the Western country at that season of the year, unless the navigation of the Ohio is opened to Pittsburg, so that produce may ascend and merchandise descend the river, on their way to and from Philadelphia. The making of these canals, which will now be finished in a year or two, renders it of vast importance to keep the navigation of that river always open while business can be done upon them. We have a report lying upon the table, showing that the shoals in the river can be deepened at a very moderate expense. The improvement of its navigation properly belongs to the General Government. And he hoped, considering the vast expense the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio were incurring in opening avenues of trade to the Ohio, that the comparatively small sum of $150,000 would not be denied in aid of their great efforts.

Mr. DENNY said, as I come from the borders of the Ohio, I may be permitted to say a word or two on this subject. It is one of great importance to the Western country. The Ohio river may with great propriety be considered a great national highway; it forms the boundary between several of the States; it is the great channel of their commerce, and, to some portions, the only outlet for their trade; and, in my opinion, is as deserving of the attention of the Government as any portion of the seaboard. Much has been done to facilitate our commercial intercourse along the Atlantic; large sums of money have been expended for improvements in the bays, clearing the harbors, opening channels, and removing obstructions to navigation, along our extensive seacoast, wherever the tide flows, from north to south. But, sir, it seems to me that some gentlemen are seized with a kind of hydrophobia so soon as we leave the salt and propose improvements in the fresh water region. I am willing with them to vote millions for the improvement and protection of our harbors and seaports, because it is for the benefit of the commerce of our country. The whole Union is benefited by such expenditures, because the whole Union has an interest in the commerce of every port; and certainly to facilitate our internal commercial communication, particularly among the great and flourishing Western States, is equally worthy our attention, in a national point of view. I can perceive no difference between this commerce and our coasting trade, which enjoys so largely the favorable consideration of the Government.

To the Western States, the Ohio is the most important channel of their intercourse; and it is true, as remarked by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CARSON,] they will be immediately benefited by the proposed appropriation. But, sir, the advantages to be derived from the improvements under this appropriation will not be felt exclusively in those States; the whole nation will experience the beneficial effects in the additional facilities afforded to commerce; and this is the great basis upon which the advocates of internal improvement rest their cause. Clearing away the obstructions from the harbor of one of our towns on the seacoast, is for the immediate benefit of the town; it gives security to the trade, and promotes its prosperity, and the commerce is increased and protected; the work is not, therefore, to be considered merely a local matter. No, sir, commerce is a national object; we all participate in its benefits, and have an interest in its prosperity.

It is well known that, at this late period of the session, with a mass of business before us, it would be impossible to pass a bill through this House in the usual mode. I cannot perceive any weight in the objections made to this proposition; it violates no rule of this House. What principle of legislation does it outrage? None, sir. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DODDRIDGE also made a few remarks in favor of the amendment; after which,

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to—yeas 79.

On motion of Mr. LETCHER, an appropriation was inserted of $15,000 for making a road in Arkansas.

After an ineffectual attempt by Mr. DODDRIDGE to get up the Cumberland road bill, (it being near 4 o'clock,)

The committee rose, reported the amendments, and The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

INLAND PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburg, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places; which was twice read, and Mr. C. moved that it be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. McDUFFIE opposed the motion, because it was a subject which belonged to the revenue, and ought to have been before the Committee of Ways and Means. It, moreover, was a novel principle—one involving a great expenditure, in the number of custom-house officers which would have to be appointed; and if the principle were adopted, every large town in the Union situated on a river would be entitled to the same privilege. He moved the reference of the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. PETTIS defended the bill against the objections urged, and argued to show its necessity to the convenience of the large and thriving commercial places comprised in the bill. Before the question was taken, the hour elapsed.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The several appropriation bills, which yesterday passed through the Committee of the Whole, were taken up, and the several amendments agreed to by the House.

Mr. DRAYTON renewed his amendment, proposed yesterday in Committee of the Whole, for the appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars, instead of one hundred thousand dollars, for the armaments of fortifications. He supported his proposition at length, referring, in the course of his argument, to the defenceless condition of many of the fortifications on the seacoast. Should the vast continent of Europe, he remarked, be involved in the flame of war which at present there were too many reasons for apprehending, the United States might, and in all probability would, be drawn into the vortex. Should a contest ensue, (and, considering the combustion which at present prevailed amongst the great Powers of the old world, who would say that it was not daily expected?) would not the consequences be of so tremendous a nature, as to require the utmost caution on our part to avoid being involved in it, in the first instance; and, in the next place, if we should unfortunately become entangled in the complex web of European politics, to be prepared with the necessary means of extricating ourselves from the entanglement? Surely so; and the only means of enabling us to do so, in the event of such a disastrous occurrence, would be to prepare for war in time of peace; at least so far as to provide for the arming of those fortifications upon which alone the nation could rely for the security of its seaboard. The defence of the coast of the country was, it would be admitted by all, necessary for the preservation of public liberty; and how could the coast be defended, without the fortifications being put in an efficient state?

Mr. D. referred next to the expression of Mr. Canning, in the British Parliament, as to the probable results of the next war in Europe. That able statesman, that eloquent orator, that accomplished man, said, a few years ago, that the war which might next occur would probably be a war of opinion—a war of liberal principles against despotic Governments—in the contest of which, the victors would be, in the end, the vanquished. The clouds which lowered at present over Europe threatened to involve all civilized countries in the storm which it was apparent was gathering. No portion of it could be exempt; and how, then, could the United States keep aloof in such a contest? Great Britain owed its existence to its naval strength; it had declared that its power depended on its maritime supremacy; and how, asked Mr. D., could that supremacy be sustained, should a war ensue, but by the renewed exercise on her part of the system of impressment?

After some further remarks on this subject, as connected with the rejection of a former treaty by President Jefferson, on account of its not containing a provision against the impressment of American seamen, and some observations on the inadequacy of the present means of national defence in the fortifications on the seaboard, Mr. D. concluded.

Mr. McDUFFIE trusted that, if a war should unhappily occur in Europe, this country would adopt the system which was called in England that of non-interference. God forbid, said he, that the settled policy of the United States should be so entirely changed, as to lead to the entanglement of this nation with the politics of the other hemisphere! Let us finish the fortifications which we have begun to construct. This is all that the bill provides, no more; and, let me ask, of what use are the shells of these buildings, erected at a great expense for the purposes of national defence, unless they are finished and properly armed?

Mr. HOFFMAN opposed the amendment, conceiving the navy perfectly competent for the purposes of defending the coast. The power and strength of our navy were, it would be borne in mind, very different from their condition ten or fifteen years ago; and besides, he, for his own part, if he might be permitted to express an opinion, saw no prospect that we should be engaged in a war with Great Britain.

Mr. YANCEY, of Kentucky, said he had not expected, after the vote of yesterday rejecting the appropriation of an additional hundred thousand dollars for fortifications on the seaboard, that there would have been a proposition to-day to reinstate the item in the bill, and he regretted that it was made. I, said he, am a plain farmer, and represent constituents, a majority of whom are farmers, and, of course, make their living in that highly laudable mode, by the sweat of their brow; and when I address them, and am amongst them, I advocate frugality and economy in the public expenditure, in order that labor may be lightly burdened. Although I have to encounter eloquent lawyers here, sir, yet I do and will fearlessly advocate the same principles, and make every practicable exertion that the bread which labor has earned shall not be taken from its mouth to support exorbitant and extravagant appropriations. Sir, the poor laboring men, who are, in fact, the very main pillars of society, ought not to be burdened with these exorbitant appropriations; and little do they think, when they are bedewing the earth with the sweat of their brow, and when night comes, and they go to bed, they are so fatigued with their daily labor to support their families that they frequently cannot sleep—I say, sir, little do they think that such profuse and lavish appropriations of money are made, as frequently are; and I should consider myself unworthy of their confidence, if I did not boldly and fearlessly exert my best faculties here to keep off the oppressive hand of taxation from them and their families. They are that to society that a main spring is to a gun lock; and I am resolved to let them see that I am not less their advocate here than at home. Sir, I will look to the influence, the salutary maxims, policy, and advice of the illustrious Jefferson, who was in favor of the sacred preservation of the public faith, and the honest performance of our duties, of frugality and economy in our public expenditure. Sir, I most cordially unite with that great and patriotic sage, and hope that we shall be frugal and economical in our public expenditures, and not imitate the magnificent pomp, splendor, and profusion of Eastern monarchs and potentates; but that we shall zealously and ardently endeavor to realize our professions, and bring the ship of State back to its republican and Jeffersonian principles; that we shall thoroughly cleanse the Augean stable, and get back to the good old whig principles of '76, and the promotion of the equal interest and inalienable rights of man. And, sir, I regret to see some of those gentlemen, who are such strong advocates of this appropriation, opposing an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for clearing out obstructions and otherwise improving the navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers—those two great streams which traverse such a vast extent of country in the great valley of the Mississippi, and on which the surplus produce of one of the greatest countries on earth is wafted to New Orleans, the grand emporium of the West.

Sir, I most cheerfully unite with the honorable and patriotic gentleman of South Carolina, in every proper defence of the country, and would meet at the beach the enemy that should dare to pollute our republican soil with his tyrannical and unhallowed feet. I would dispute every inch of ground, burn every blade of grass, and expire in the last ditch, before I would see the foot of an invader trampling in triumph upon my native land. Yes, if he did enter my country as a foe, I hope it is not a useless vaunt to say that it should be over my lifeless corpse. Let us, I say, teach our sons—let us urge upon our friends and fellow-citizens, the brave boys of the mountains, and of every other section of our beloved country, to exert their patriotism, and bravely defend the land in which they live. In that case—I mean in the event of our being attacked—we can, I doubt not, successfully resist the combined attacks of a world of despots. If we are frugal, virtuous, and united as with the bonds of indissoluble union, as I trust we are, and ever shall be, and put our faith in the great omnipotent God of battles, we may expect to be free and happy, and to transmit to our latest posterity, pure and uncontaminated, the equal and inherent rights of freemen, with which we are so eminently blessed. And if we do, sir, act and unite on these principles of virtue, economy, and frugality, and trust in the great sovereign Arbiter of the universe, we shall stand as a pillar of fire amidst a world of benighted despotism, lighting the path of unborn millions to the temple of liberty.

Mr. WILDE argued that, however the country might be indifferent to the contests of Europe, however indisposed the Government might be to engage in those contests, yet, from the very nature of things, it was impossible to avoid an involvement in them. He said, after some further remarks, that he was therefore in favor of the proposition, conceiving it to be absolutely necessary for the defence of the seacoast, and the security of our military and naval forces.

The amendment was lost by yeas and nays—yeas 69, nays 90.

INDIAN MEDALS.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to insert an appropriation of $3,000 for the purchase of medals, to be distributed amongst Indian chiefs.

Mr. VANCE said the object was a proper one, as it was well known that such presents to the Indians were very useful, and had been always customary. He could not forbear, however, reminding those gentlemen who now saw the expediency of the measure so clearly, that an expenditure under the late administration of one-third of the sum now proposed, filled about a page of the famous report of the Committee on Retrenchment, in setting forth its enormity.

The appropriation was agreed to; yeas 85, nays not counted.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The bill making appropriations for improving the navigation of rivers, removing obstructions from the mouths of rivers and harbors, &c. next coming up,

Mr. LEA wished to know the sense of the House on this measure. He wished to know what was meant by this sort of external internal improvement. He wished to know how high up a river it was considered constitutional to go without coming in conflict with the objectionable principle, and how far the House could carry a distinction which he himself could not see or approve. He could see no difference between appropriations for harbors and the mouths of rivers, and appropriations for the improvement of the interior of the country. He therefore asked for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of this bill.

Mr. CARSON said he felt that on the subject of internal improvement it was perfectly useless to say a word. The bill proposed various objects of expenditure for harbors, &c. What evidence was there of their necessity—not to speak of their constitutionality, that he would not mention; it is scoffed at; we have no constitution—it is dead and gone. But he knew of no evidence that the improvements were needed, admitting their legality. He went through all the items, to show that many of them were unworthy of legislation, and some of them contemptible. He protested against them, and said that the items for his own State should not seduce him to vote for the bill. Nothing, however, which he could say, he was aware, would have any influence on the House; he therefore called on his friend from Kentucky, [Mr. YANCEY,] to make a speech against it.

Messrs. IRVIN and WHITTLESEY defended the appropriation in reference to the waters of Lake Erie, showing their importance to the commerce of the West, the great extent of the commerce of the lake, the deficiency of natural harbors on it, and the necessity of forming them, &c.

Mr. SILL, of Pennsylvania, said, the principal objections he had heard against the passage of this bill, appeared to be directed against the appropriations for improving the navigation and opening the harbors on the lakes. I, said Mr. S., have had an opportunity of witnessing the improvements already made in that navigation, by means of former appropriations, and can truly state, not only as my own opinion, but that of others, who have examined them, that no part of the public money has been more judiciously and beneficially expended.

These appropriations are objected to because, as it is said, the objects to which they are to be applied are not of a national character, and, therefore, that the National Government cannot, with propriety, appropriate money for their improvement. Some particular object of improvement is selected and adverted to, for instance, the removal of a sand bar from the mouth of a certain creek or river, which falls into Lake Erie, with a view to the improvement or construction of a harbor upon the shore of that lake; and it is said that such improvement cannot be of general or national importance, because such stream or river is, of itself, so obscure and unimportant, that even its name has scarcely before been heard of. Gentlemen seem to consider that the character of an improvement of this kind depends on that of the particular spot where it is contemplated to be made, without taking into view the importance of the general object which each particular improvement is calculated to advance.

Internal Improvements.

[H. OF R.]

It appears to me that this view of the subject is not a correct one. In estimating the character and importance of any work of public improvement, we should consider the general design and object intended to be effected, and not confine our views to the particular objects of an appropriation, which is frequently only the means of effecting some great national improvement, or a part of some plan of general and public utility. The removal of a sand bar at the mouth of a river, or the shore of Lake Erie, considered solely with reference to the importance of the particular place where such improvement is to be effected, may appear to be a local and unimportant object; but when it is considered as a means of opening or forming a harbor, whose benefits are extended to the thousands of our fellow-citizens whose lives and property are exposed on those waters, its general and national character at once become apparent.

No one doubts that the Atlantic seaboard is an object of general and national importance. The propriety of affording all reasonable facilities to its commerce and navigation, by the improvement of harbors, the removal of sand bars, and the erection of beacons, buoys, and light-houses, I believe, is not disputed. Now, I would ask, why is an improvement of this kind, when made along the seaboard, considered to be of national character and importance? It is not on account of the local importance of the particular point where such an improvement may be made, but because it is connected with, and constitutes a part of, that great national object, the facility and security of the commerce and navigation of the Atlantic coast. It is true that both those objects, that is, those of general utility and local importance, may happen to be combined in the same rule. An improvement of the harbor of a great commercial city, for instance, that of New York, would present a case of this kind. But suppose an extent of barren and desert coast, without inhabitants, and destitute of any objects to attract attention, except the dangers and shipwrecks which awaited those who sailed along or approached its shores, might not the national interests require some improvements to be made, even in such a spot as this? And if the removal of a sand bar would afford an improvement materially promoting the security of our commerce, would it not be proper for this Government to effect it? Such an object would be strictly national; not by reason of any importance in itself, but by its connexion with that great national object, the security and facility of navigation and commerce, it partakes of that character, and becomes itself an object of national concern.

The same principles apply to the improvements on our great Northwestern lakes. No one, I presume, will profess to doubt that the commerce and navigation of the great chain of lakes, extending along our Northwestern borders, and forming a connected navigation of more than one thousand miles, is, of itself, an object of great national importance. They may be called, with much propriety, the Mediterranean of America. Those inland seas afford a great highway for the commerce and navigation of a very important portion of the people of these United States. The citizens of the northwestern parts of New York and Pennsylvania, probably one-half of the State of Ohio, the whole territory of Michigan, the northern parts of Indiana and Illinois, to say nothing of the almost illimitable regions bordering on the upper lakes, and extending far towards the Mississippi, are dependent on the navigation of these waters for the transportation of their produce to a market, the importation of all their supplies of foreign merchandisc, and, in short, for all their commercial intercourse and transactions. Nor are the benefits of this inland navigation confined to those who inhabit the interior of our country. The intercourse thus opened is equally beneficial to the commercial and manufacturing interests of the Atlantic States.

The commerce of Lake Erie is rapidly increasing, and already of great importance and amount. Previous to the late war, its commerce was of small amount. Probably eight or ten small vessels were sufficient for all the transportation that was then required. During the war, that commerce was entirely broken up and destroyed. Some of the vessels were captured by the enemy, the remainder were purchased by our Government, and fitted for the purposes of naval warfare. But with the return of peace, the settlement and improvement of that country rapidly advanced, and with it the trade and commerce of the lakes. The completion of the New York canal constituted a new era in the trade of that country. It gave to those lakes the character and advantages of an inland sea, with a navigable outlet to the main ocean, and afforded the means of transportation to the seaboard, for the agricultural products of the vast and fertile regions bordering on and communicating with their waters. There are now nine steamboats, and seventy or eighty vessels, which during seven or eight months of the year are employed in an active commerce on Lake Erie. The number of entries at the custom-house at Buffalo, up to the 30th of September of the past season, was six hundred and thirty-seven. Should we add to this the probable number of entries during the remainder of the season, the aggregate number for the whole season would probably exceed eight hundred. The number of arrivals and departures at and from the port of Presque Isle, during the same period, was three hundred and sixty-six; the probable number during the remainder of the season would probably increase the total amount to upwards of five hundred. The quantity of merchandise transported to Buffalo on the New York canal, up to the 30th of September of the past year, and shipped on the lake from that port, amounted to fifteen thousand tons. The two remaining months of navigation are the most busy season of trade; and, should we include the probable quantity shipped during that period, it is believed that the total amount would not be less than twenty-five thousand tons.

It should be borne in mind that the whole of this vast amount consists of merchandise the produce and manufacture of our own and foreign countries, for the supply of the northwestern sections of the United States. A great proportion of the country between the lakes and the Ohio, including sections of five States, and the whole of the Territory of Michigan, receive their supplies by this route.

In the last annual message of the President, the propriety of making appropriations for increasing the facility, and promoting the security of commerce, is admitted. Our revenue, it is stated, arises principally from the collection of duties imposed on foreign merchandise. These duties increase the price of the article, and are ultimately drawn from the pockets of the consumer. Appropriations for the improvement of our commercial intercourse are paid out of the same fund. These improvements, by facilitating the means of transportation, cheapen its price, and thus effect a reduction in the price of the article. The burden and the benefit of these operations are, therefore, reciprocal; and it is but reasonable that a part of the money thus received should be expended for the benefit of those from whom it is collected.

Internal Improvements.

[H. or R.]

Do not the same arguments apply with equal force to the interior, as well as to the foreign commerce of our country? The duties imposed on foreign merchandise are paid by the consumer, who resides in the most interior and remote part of the country, as well as by the inhabitant of the Atlantic seaboard. Has he not a right to expect that some part of that money will be expended for his benefit, as well as for the accommodation of those who inhabit the seacoast?

I have not ascertained the exact amount of the export trade of Lake Erie during the past year. I have seen a partial statement of its amount, which proves it to be of great extent; and should it be estimated at fifteen thousand tons, which is probably below the actual amount, it would swell the aggregate annual amount of that trade to forty thousand tons.

I might add that this amount has greatly increased during the past year, in consequence of the partial completion of the Ohio canal. And when that great work, opening an avenue through the whole of that great State, and forming a communication between the lakes and the Ohio, shall be completed; when the vast and fertile regions on the shores of these lakes shall be converted from a wilderness into fruitful fields, who can estimate the vast amount of produce which shall be floated towards a market on the waters of Lake Erie?

Is not this an object of national importance? Is not the protection and security of the commerce of those great inland seas deserving of the attention and care of the National Government? Is not its prosperity important to the strength, the security, and resources of the nation? If, then, this general object is one of national importance, every particular improvement made for this general object participates of the same character, and itself becomes national; provided that such improvement is necessary, and judiciously selected for the promotion of the general design.

I will add a word respecting the particular character of the improvements contemplated in this bill. They are such as, by a comparatively small expenditure, to produce a great amount of public benefit. Although, previous to the commencement of the improvements made by this Government, there was not a port or haven for the distance of near three hundred miles on the south shore of Lake Erie, which a vessel could enter in a time of danger, it has not been necessary to incur the expense of the entire construction of harbors. There were several natural harbors formed by bays and the mouths of rivers; but, in almost every instance, their entrance was so obstructed by sand bars as to destroy their utility. All that was required for the completion of safe and commodious harbors, was the removal of the sand bars by which their entrance was obstructed. The first appropriation for these objects was made in the year 1824. The plan of improvement then proposed was considered as an experiment, the success of which might be doubtful. But it has been attended with entire success; and the same plan, under the direction of the same skilful and experienced engineer, has been successfully adopted in all the improvements which have been commenced in those waters.

The necessity and importance of these improvements may readily be conceived by those who were acquainted with the navigation of those waters before they were commenced. The situation of vessels then navigating the lake was peculiarly dangerous. Sailing on a narrow sea, subject to storms as violent and sudden as those which are experienced in the Atlantic Ocean, without a light to direct their course, or a harbor to afford protection, they were exposed to be driven from one extremity of the lake to the other, or to be shipwrecked on the coast. The consequence was a frequent loss and destruction, not only of the property, but of the lives of those who were employed in that navigation. The improvements already effected have been attended with the most beneficial results. I have often heard the opinion expressed by those who are most capable of forming an opinion, that, without taking into view the present advantages of those improvements, an annual saving of property has been effected to an amount larger than that of the appropriations which have been expended. One fact of itself is sufficient to show their importance. It is stated that, in consequence of those improvements, a reduction in the premium of insurance on that commerce, to the amount of fifty per cent., has been effected.

The remarks I have made tend to show the importance of those improvements, with respect to the commerce of that country. Much might be said to show that they are of great national importance for the defence of the country in time of war. I shall, however, content myself with mentioning one fact, which presents this consideration to the House more forcibly than any language of mine could do.

The victory of Commodore Perry, on Lake Erie, is familiar to us all; but the difficulties and dangers which attended its achievement, may not be equally so. The squadron commanded by that gallant officer was constructed in the harbor of Erie. The waters of that harbor are of sufficient depth for vessels of any burden, but its entrance was obstructed by a sand bar, which could not be passed by the vessels composing that squadron, without removing all their guns and munitions of war, and even then not without much difficulty and delay. During this time, the British fleet had the undisputed possession of Lake Erie, and the entire command of the entrance of that harbor. They were cruising along the coast, were watching the progress of our fleet, almost daily made their appearance off the bar, and occasionally threw their shot into the harbor. Under these circumstances, the danger of the American fleet in crossing the bar was a subject of much anxiety and apprehension. Every vessel would necessarily be exposed, in a dismantled and defenceless state, to the fire of the whole British squadron, and no one could foresee how its destructive effects could either be guarded against or resisted. But, as it would appear, almost by a Providential interposition, the very day that Commodore Perry commenced his operations for passing the bar, the British squadron left that coast and sailed to the Canadian shore, and, by unfavorable winds, and perhaps other causes, were prevented from returning for a period of seven or eight days. By the most unremitting exertions, continued night and day during this interval, the greater part of the American squadron were removed over the bar, the guns were remounted, and the ships, although not completely fitted for sea, were moored along the shore, and prepared for action. When the British squadron returned, and saw the change in the position of our forces, they did not think it prudent to offer battle, but sailed to Malden for a reinforcement. As soon as Commodore Perry could prepare his squadron for a cruise, he sailed in quest of the enemy. They were now met, and I need not mention the result. It forms one of the most brilliant pages in the history of our country.

These facts require no comment. They clearly show, that, for want of a single improvement of the kind contemplated by this bill, the whole American squadron was exposed to imminent danger of destruction, which might have turned the whole course of the Northwestern campaign, caused an expenditure of additional millions, and been attended with consequences disastrous beyond the power of calculation.

Mr. McDUFFIE begged the friends of the bill not to consume the time of the House in making speeches against an opposition so untenable that it could not certainly gain thirty votes. The bill embraced no new objects; it embraced such only as former appropriations authorized, or standing laws required; and every item had been examined and approved by a committee. He hoped, therefore, that the debate would be left entirely to the enemies of the bill.

Mr. CARSON replied, and reiterated his objections to the bill, on the score of expediency and principle.

Mr. DRAYTON said that most of the items were proper, but there were some which he deemed unconstitutional. He could not vote for the bill.

The question was then taken on the third reading of the bill, and carried by the following vote:

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The engrossed bill making additional appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors, and removing obstructions at the mouths of certain rivers, being read the third time,

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, rose, and said the liberties of my country are by this bill put up for sale. I for one will not be bribed to vote for it.

Mr. BARRINGER said he was very sorry to hear such language from his colleague. The liberties of the country put up to sale! How put up to sale, asked Mr. B.? It is an imputation on the House—not only on this House, but on every Congress from the foundation of the Government, and every Executive from the commencement to the present. This bill, Mr. B. said, presented no question of internal improvement, as that question is understood by Southern gentlemen generally.

He had voted on these appropriations heretofore; they were for objects annually provided for by Congress, and this was the first time that he had found out that they put up to sale the liberties of his country. This was a strange declaration—that in a bill of the most usual and customary character—to promote the commerce and revenue of the country—which had been regularly provided for every year, without any body dreaming that it was a violation of the constitution—to hear it proclaimed now that it was selling the liberties of the country! If that is the case, where, he asked, was the vigilance of his colleague on former occasions, when similar appropriations had received his vote? The principle, Mr. B. said, had never been denied, that where the commerce of the country could be facilitated or increased, and the revenue derived therefrom was received exclusively by the General Government, that it was within the province of the Government to make the improvement; and this was strictly and peculiarly the case with harbors, and the mouths of rivers, where obstructions impeded or endangered the navigation. This was a species of improvement which it had never been contended devolved on the States themselves; they had been executed by the General Government from the beginning of the Government; at least such had been the action of Congress ever since he had been here, and the action, he believed, of those who had gone before us. It was for his colleague to exercise his own judgment for himself on this subject and all others; but, in mercy, Mr. B. said, he hoped his colleague would permit him to exercise the same right, without the imputation of selling the liberties of his country.

The SPEAKER checked Mr. B. He did not understand Mr. C. as imputing such a design to members, but only as speaking of the effect of the bill.

Mr. CARSON hoped the Speaker would permit his colleague to proceed, and cast every thing on him that he desired. He knew his motive.

Mr. BARRINGER resumed. He wished only to vindicate himself, not to cast any thing on his colleague. North Carolina had petitioned for the improvement of Roanoke inlet. This object was in no way different from the objects in this bill. North Carolina had petitioned Congress for the improvement of Ocracoke and the Cape Fear, and all her delegation had supported the application. It had been frequently before the House, and none of them had discovered that it was unconstitutional; and now, because these objects are embraced in this bill, are we who vote for it to be charged with being bought up? He had voted for such a bill every year when these objects were not included, and he should have voted for it now, if they had been excluded. Was he to vote against what was right, because he could not obtain what he conceived just, or vote against the bill, because the objects which his own State had at heart were included, lest he might be charged with being bought up? He protested against such imputations.

Mr. CARSON said that he was very glad that his colleague had let off some matter which he had been pregnant with for some—[The SPEAKER here interposed, and said that the gentleman's colleague had disclaimed any reflection upon the gentleman's motives.] I understood him to do so, said Mr. C., and I too disclaim any intention to reflect upon the motives of other gentlemen. My colleague says that I charge him with being bought: that was the purport of his speech. Sir, I made no such charge. I am willing to say that every member who votes for this bill believes that he is right. But I believe that they are wrong, and that those who do vote for it, whatever is their motive, are selling the liberties of their country. In ancient times the Roman leaders bought up the liberties of the people with the spoils of the conquered provinces; and this policy of internal improvement, and our high-handed tariff, are the means with which the liberties of this people are to be bought up. My colleague says he will not defend the constitutionality of the appropriations proposed by this bill, and well he may say so, for he cannot defend it. The constitution has been placed in the hands of empirics—of political quacks, who have given it a construction whereby it is swallowing up the liberties of the country; and, when they are gone, where are we to look for liberty? Where, sir, I repeat, are we to look for it? Almighty God may have ordained that liberty shall exist only in one hemisphere at a time. If so, the genius of liberty may have taken her flight from among us—she may have followed Lafayette across the waters—and whilst they have liberty in France, we may have tyranny here. I must believe, sir, if our liberties are saved, that it can be only by the interposition of the individual States; and, sir, I look to old Virginia, as the nucleus around which the States are to rally to resist the usurpations of the General Government. I look to her sons—to her Patrick Henrys (such men as he, who dared to declare that resistance of oppression was not treason)—I look to her Madison, to her Monroe, to you, sir, (the Speaker:) gentlemen may laugh, sir, but I look to such men; not to men bought up by appropriations and by the hope of office, but to men of high and elevated feelings and stern integrity, to save my country. If such men do not rouse themselves to action, our liberty is gone. Mr. C. concluded with saying, that perhaps he had spoken with too much warmth on this occasion; that he was sick, and had no intention to come here to-day; but that he had been sent for, and brought from his bed by a call of the House. He knew it was in vain to oppose the passage of this bill, and perhaps there was no use in a man's throwing himself into the breach, and receiving in his breast the daggers of all who were in favor of it. He attacked the system, not the motives of gentlemen: but he solemnly believed, if this sort of legislation was persisted in, our liberties were gone; and that nothing but the action of the States could save them.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, said, that, although, for several years past, he had voted for internal improvements, and had seen no reason to change his opinion or his course in that particular, yet he should vote against the bill, because of its partiality and gross injustice. That he was the more determined upon that course, from the arguments which have been urged in favor of its passage by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. BARRINGER.] For his part, Mr. B. said, he could not see why the mouth of a river should be improved by the appropriations of the public money, more than its bed; nor why a measure of this description, coming from the Committee of Ways and Means, was not as much a measure of internal improvement, as if it had come from the Committee on Roads and Canals. Suppose the appropriation proposed by this bill, (so far as Ohio is concerned,) had been reported by the Committee on Internal Improvements in a separate bill, would not the gentleman from North Carolina have gone against that measure? Has he not invariably gone against such appropriations? What, then, shall we see, if we, from the interior, act upon the principles which govern his vote in favor of the bill? Why, sir, that there is to be a system of appropriations for bays and harbors, and the mouths of rivers and creeks; in short, a system of improvements for the tide water, to the total exclusion of the whole interior.

Shall I, as a representative of one of the districts in the interior, join in a crusade against that section of the country from whence I come? I cannot, I will not give my countenance to a measure so partial and unjust as that which is now under consideration. It is, therefore, sir, that I am obliged to turn my back against this bill, after having for eight years voted for what I thought was a system which would at least extend above the tide water. I beg of gentlemen to look to the provisions of this bill: the State of Ohio is the only State west of the Alleghany for which the smallest provision is made, and, in tender mercy to that State, the appropriations are limited to the mouths of the streams to be improved. When it shall be in order for me to call up the bill now on your table, to connect the waters of the Tennessee and Coosa rivers, will the gentleman from North Carolina, and others, come out and say that that is constitutional? No, sir; they would not admit its constitutionality, because it is above the mouth, and not immediately connected with foreign commerce. Yes, sir, I might exhaust my strength here in vain, in showing the importance of this connexion; I should not be so fortunate as to get the vote of the gentleman from North Carolina and others, who limit the constitution to salt water improvements. If the proposition for such appropriation came from the Committee of Ways and Means, then, indeed, I possibly might get their votes; but not if it came from the Committee on Internal Improvements. He said that he was for improving the means of domestic as well as foreign intercourse and commerce. If the exclusive system proposed by this bill is to be persevered in, the people whom he represented would derive no benefit whatever from the expenditure of the public money. He believed this to be as much an internal improvement bill as any bill of that nature introduced at the present session. Of its constitutionality he had no doubt; but he denied the expediency of thus limiting and partially carrying the principle into effect. Once for all, I can assure the friends of a judicious system of internal improvements, that, whenever measures shall come before the House, looking alike to the West and the East, and promising to advance the great interests of the country, they should find his vote as it always had been. In self-defence, said Mr. B., the interior must finally come to this course. They will be compelled to unite in resisting a system of appropriations which promises nothing to their constituents, and would cause the operations of the Federal Government to be felt only in its burdens and exactions. He said that he hoped he was understood by the House, as some surprise had been manifested by friends around him, at his opposition to this bill when last before the House.

Mr. BARRINGER again rose. It had been his practice, he said, to vote for what he deemed just and expedient, no matter by what committee the measure was reported. In regard to the question before the House, he said, his rule was this: that, if he found the object connected with the commerce of the nation, and calculated to benefit that commerce, he deemed the object legitimate, and he gave it his support. For instance, the mouth of the Mississippi, one of the items of this bill, was important to the commerce of all the great rivers which flow into it, and he could not hesitate to support the appropriation; and if gentlemen would point out any objects not leading to some port, and calculated to facilitate the commerce of the country, he would agree to strike it out. On the lakes he knew there were ports, and these were necessary to the great and growing commerce of those waters, and he was as ready to support legitimate objects in the West as in the East. He would not condescend to inquire what part of the country the object was to benefit, so it was proper. If it came from the gentleman's [Mr. BLAIR's] committee, (the Committee on Internal Improvements,) he would support it just as soon as if it came from any other. He would leave it to that gentleman to say how he could now oppose measures which he had formerly supported, because he thought the conduct of others improper or inconsistent. For himself, Mr. B. said, seeing nothing in this bill variant from what he had always supported, he should give it his vote.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, believing that further debate would not change a single vote, moved the previous question.

The motion was sustained, and the question being put on the passage of the bill, it was carried by the following vote: YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Armstrong, Arnold, Bailey, Noyes Barber, Barringer, Bartley, Bates, Baylor, Beckman, Booke, Boon, Brown, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Cambreleng, Chandler, Childs, Chilton, Clark, Coleman, Condict, Cooper, Coulter, Cowles, Crane, Crawford, BEAUMARCHAIS' CLAIM.

The SPEAKER, proceeding to the orders of the day, called, as first on the docket, the bill to adjust and settle the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais.

Mr. ARCHER moved that the House go into committee on this bill, stating that if it did so, an amendment would be offered to give the subject a direction different from the action of this House; but the motion was lost, only 24 rising for it.

RICHARD W. MEADE'S CLAIM.

The bill providing for this claim being next called, Mr. ARCHER said the magnitude of the claim was such that he should not call up this bill at this late period of the session; and it was passed by.

The House spent the remainder of the day in considering and passing a great number of private bills.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

INDIAN QUESTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, on Monday last, to instruct the Committee on Indian Affairs to report a bill making further provision for executing the laws of the United States on the subject of intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, also, for the faithful observance of the treaties between the United States and the said tribes.

Mr. EVERETT resumed the floor, and addressed the House nearly two hours in continuation and conclusion of the argument which he commenced when the subject was first under consideration, (as given in last Monday's report.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, then rose, and said, when this subject was so elaborately discussed at the last session of Congress, and particularly when so large a share of that discussion was borne by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] and his friends, he had hoped it would never again be agitated in this House. When the proposition of the honorable gentleman was offered, he confessed he felt an excitement which would then have rendered him incapable of discussing it with becoming self-respect, or what was due from him to this House.

In his calmer reflections, he had determined to bring alone to its consideration the dictates of his understanding and his judgment, whatever of passion might heretofore have been mingled with it.

Imputing no motives to any member of this House, where such imputation is wholly inadmissible, he must say, that if, in the former discussions, here and elsewhere, he had thought he had discovered a political humanity regulating the movements of the opposition, he could see nothing in the present aspect of affairs in the slightest degree to change that opinion—a political humanity which, to say the most of it, is like that charitable knighterrantry which, overlooking the object at its feet, seeks for it among the antipodes.

If the half that has been said here and elsewhere should be believed, it would be sufficient, in speaking of an individual, to embody all that is infamous in calling him a Georgian. And for what purpose was all this outcry against the State of Georgia? It arises from the same principles which would have inflicted a consolidated Government on this country in 1787, whose advocates said of Mr. Jefferson, in 1807, that he could not be kicked into a war; which would have driven out Mr. Madison in 1814, for declaring and prosecuting that war; and which would drive out General Jackson now, because he defeated their hopes at New Orleans, and because he refuses to consider a constitution of limited powers a charter of unlimited powers. The party possessing these principles has changed its name, but not its principles. The national republicans of 1831 are the true successors of the ultra federalists of thirty years ago; and those who would drive General Jackson from the administration of the Government, do not differ from those who passed the sedition law of 1798. This party, which has, so far as names are concerned, shown the same facility of change as theameleon, now seeks, as it has sought ever since its hopes were disappointed in the federal convention, to arrive at its object through the instrumentality of the Supreme Court. But more of this subject hereafter.

In rising to address the House on the present occasion, illy prepared, by indifferent health and other public duties, to follow the gentleman from Massachusetts over the whole ground he had chosen to occupy, he should content himself with offering a few brief and desultory observations to the consideration of the House. Nor would he have risen, but for the peculiar relation which he bore to this question. Pending the discussion of it at the last session of Congress, under the most urgent importunity of his friends, he had forborne, at a critical period of the debate, from pressing himself into it, believing that its further protraction would probably lead to the defeat of the bill, in the provisions of which Georgia had a particular, as the country at large had a deep and general interest.

Although he had ever since held in his possession a document most distinctly proving the influence of this motive on his conduct at that period, yet such motive could not be generally known to his constituents, as the document alluded to had not been made public. But, as the day is at hand when his representative character will cease, he was not willing to stand unjustified before those he had represented to the best of his ability for the last six years. In the discussion of this question, on which so wide a difference of opinion existed between the honorable gentleman and himself, it is necessary to recur to the history of this country, to ascertain whether the Federal Government has confined itself to the pale of the constitution, or that Georgia has overleaped the barriers of her rightful sovereignty. In discussing this branch of the subject, he should not inquire whether this continent, at the time of its discovery, was considered as a part of St. Peter's patrimony, nor how it might then have been regarded by papal bulls in favor of certain discoverers. Nor should he inquire into the quaint phrases which may or may not be found in any of the charters granted to the colonists by which it was settled. It had been said on a former occasion, that the rights of discovery set up by Europeans related solely to the effect of those rights on each other. In part this is true, and in part it is not true. That those rights were relative to the discoverers, as regards the question of boundary, is admitted; but it is asserted, without the fear of contradiction, that they were positive, were absolute in their relation to the original inhabitants of this continent. As it regarded those inhabitants, the nations of Europe which planted colonies here considered their occupancy permissive merely. Nor can any other principle of national law be produced on this subject; nor is it necessary to inquire into the justice of such a principle. If it be unjust, and shall be so decided, then the millions who have descended from the original colonists, with all who have been added by later emigration, must take refuge on the eastern shores of the Atlantic.

If this right of discovery does not avail Georgia, it is of as little avail to any other State in this Union. But, to say no more of it, we find ourselves placed under the operation of this principle, and it is too late to talk of changing it. But it might be asked how he arrived at the conclusion that such a principle had been adopted by the discovering European nations which planted colonies on this continent. He would answer, in the history of all. Nor would he shelter himself under the enormities practised by Spain on the aborigines of Mexico, South America, and the West India islands. Great Britain acted on the same principles in granting charters to her North American colonies. From the earliest of those charters to that granted to Georgia in 1732, this principle runs throughout; nor had he observed, upon an examination of a number of them, that any peculiarity existed, except that, by charter, the exclusive right is secured to Rhode Island, "upon just cause, to invade and destroy the native Indians, or other enemies of the said colony." Nor should he complain that Rhode Island chose still to live under that charter, nor inquire why so poor a remnant of the once powerful tribe of Narragansett has escaped from former wars, and the no less destructive vices of civilized life, operating on an inferior and degraded caste.

The original charters of the King of England granted to the colonies all the lands included within certain points on the Atlantic coast, extended by lines due west to the Pacific. Nor in this particular was the charter of Georgia less extensive than the rest.

It originally granted to her the seacoast from the mouth of Savannah to the mouth of the Altamaha river; thence, up those streams, to their headmost branches, respectively; and thence, due west, to the Pacific Ocean. At the close of the war of 1757, which war was terminated by the treaty of Paris in 1763, Great Britain acquired the Canadas and the Floridas. In settling the boundaries of the Floridas in 1763, the British King extended them to the mouth of St. Mary's river; thence, up that river, to its source; thence, by a direct line, to the junction of Chatahoochie and Flint rivers, and up the Chatahoochie to the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and due west to the Mississippi. In the following year, by royal commission to Governor Wright, the southern boundary of Georgia was extended, so as to correspond with the northern boundaries of Florida, as defined by the proclamation of 1763—the Mississippi being made the western boundary of the British colonies, in conformity to the stipulations of the treaty of Paris. But, so far as he had been able to inform himself, the principle of sovereignty over the whole country was distinctly to be traced in the commissions to the colonial Governors. Having thus shown that Great Britain claimed sovereignty over all the country within her colonies, he would inquire how this matter stood at the commencement of the revolution, and how far the powers of the States have been circumscribed, either by the terms of the articles of confederation, or the constitution which now binds them together. The declaration of independence, the magna charta of American liberty, was adopted on the 4th day of July, 1776, and its recognition by Great Britain, in 1783, has relation to that period.

Then, by the acknowledgment of our independence, and the time to which that acknowledgment related, we arrive at the conclusion, that, so soon as it was declared by Congress, every right and power previously possessed by Great Britain over the colonies devolved immediately upon the respective States, not upon the States as confederated, because the articles of confederation were not adopted until some years afterwards. He would not take the trouble to state the time of their adoption, as it was only necessary for his argument to show that they did not exist until after the declaration of independence. He thought he had now clearly shown that, on the 4th of July, 1776, the respective States entered into the possession and enjoyment of all the rights which Great Britain had previously exercised within them as colonies, and that those rights included every inch of soil, and all the sovereignty which any State can exercise. Nor should he deem it important to present this view of the subject, if it had not been said that the treaty of 1783 passed the sovereignty previously possessed by Great Britain over the colonies to the confederation, and not to the respective States. In addition to the argument he had presented to show that the sovereignty of the States passed to them respectively, it might be sufficient to add, that questions of boundary between them (and such have arisen in numerous instances) have been uniformly settled by reference to the letter and spirit of their respective charters. But further light might be shed upon this subject by consulting the various instructions which were issued to the American commissioners, under which the treaty of 1783 was negotiated, as well as the instructions given at different periods for negotiating with Spain on the subject of boundaries. In the various instructions thus given to the commissioners in 1779 and '80, and reiterated in 1781, it will be found that the confederation proceeded on the principle of regulating the boundaries on the basis of the various colonial charters, in which the southern boundary contended for is the identical one set forth in the commission to Governor Wright, in 1764. And here it might not be improper to add, that the definitive treaty of peace with Great Britain, in 1783, pursues the instructions on the question of boundaries without variation. Nor do the instructions to treat with Spain, in 1780, depart from the same principle.

Since the adoption of the federal constitution, in 1792, the same rule was adopted by Mr. Jefferson in relation to the southern boundary, which resulted in the provisions of the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real on that subject. Nor might it be improper for him to add, that the same principle enters into the discussion of the yet unsettled question of our eastern boundary.

But he was aware that a pretence was set up during the revolution, that the unsettled land within the respective States was acquired as the common property of the confederation, and that various attempts were made to induce Congress to act on that principle. He believed that he had sufficiently shown that directly the contrary was the fact, and that the States respectively acquired it before the articles of confederation were brought into existence. He well knew that the States were earnestly called on for cessions of land, but he was not aware that any of value had ever been made, except by Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia.

But, after much discussion as to the right of the confederation, a clause was inserted in the ninth article, on the 15th of November, 1777, providing that "no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States." But the subject is further illustrated by the resolution of the 16th of September, 1776, for providing bounty lands for the soldiers who might enlist in the continental army. That resolution says: "Such lands to be provided by the United States, and whatever expense shall be necessary to procure such lands, the said expense shall be paid and borne by the States, in the same proportion as the other expenses of the war." Now, if these waste lands had been considered the property of the confederation, a direct appropriation of them would have been made, particularly as the object of bestowing them in bounty would have derived considerable support from a desirable designation of them. But, for the purpose of further enforcing his view of the subject, he would refer the House to an act passed by the Legislature of Georgia on the 1st day of February, 1788, proposing a cession of a large portion of her western lands; a cession which he exceedingly rejoiced had not been accepted by the Federal Government, as, by it the western limit of the State would have been drawn within the northernmost point of the thirty-third degree of north latitude. But he would refer more particularly to the conditions proposed by Georgia, and the reasons of their rejection by the confederated Government of the Union. The proposition of Georgia, after describing the country offered for cession, states the following conditions: 1st. "That the United States in Congress assembled shall guaranty to the citizens of the said territory a republican form of Government, subject" only to such change as shall take place in the federal constitution of the United States. 2dly. That the navigation of all the rivers included in the said cession shall be equally free to all the citizens of the United States; nor shall any tonnage on vessels, nor any duties whatever, be laid on any goods, wares, or merchandise that may pass up and down the said waters, unless for the mere benefit of the United States. 3dly. That the sum of $171,428 45-90, which has been expended in quieting the minds of the Indians, and resisting their hostilities, shall be allowed as a charge against the United States, and be admitted in payment of the specie requisition of that State's quotas that have been or may be required by the United States. 4thly. That, in all cases where the State may require defence, the expenses arising thereon shall be allowed as a charge against the United States, agreeably to the articles of confederation. And, 5thly. That Congress shall guaranty and secure all the remaining territorial rights of the State, as pointed out and expressed by the definitive treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, the convention between the said State and the State of South Carolina, entered into the 28th day of April, 1787, and the clause of an act of the said State of Georgia, describing the boundaries thereof, passed the 17th of February, 1783."

But what was the answer of the committee to these propositions—an answer in which Congress acquiesced? Not that the territory in question belongs already to us; not that all the vacant land in any of the States was acquired by the common blood and treasure, and is therefore the common property of the Union; but, "The committee, having fully considered the subject referred to them, are of opinion that the cession offered by the State of Georgia cannot be accepted on the terms proposed. 1st. Because it appears highly probable that, on running the boundary line between that State and the adjoining State or States, a claim to a large tract of country, extending to the Mississippi, and lying between the tract proposed to be ceded and that lately ceded by South Carolina, will be retained by the said State of Georgia; and, therefore, the land which the State now offers to cede must be too far removed from any other lands hitherto ceded to the Union, to be of any immediate advantage to it. 2d. Because there appears to be due from the State of Georgia, on specie requisitions, but a small part of the sum mentioned in the third proviso or condition before recited; and it is improper, in this case, to allow a charge against the specie requisitions of Congress which may hereafter be made, especially as said State stands charged to the United States for very considerable sums of money loaned. And, 3d. Because the fifth proviso or condition before recited contains a special guaranty of territorial rights, and such a guaranty as has not been made by Congress to any State, and which, considering the spirit and meaning of the confederation, must be unnecessary or improper. But the committee are of opinion that the first, second, and fourth provisos before recited, and also the third, with some variations, may be admitted; and that, should the said State extend the bounds of her cession, and vary the terms thereof, as hereinafter mentioned, Congress may accept the same; whereupon, they submit the following resolutions:

"That the cession of claims to western territory, offered by the State of Georgia, cannot be accepted on the terms contained in her act passed the 1st of February last.

"That, in case the said State shall authorize her delegates in Congress to make a cession of all her territorial claims to lands west of the river Appalachicola, or west of a meridian line running through or near the point where that river intersects the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and shall omit the last proviso in her said act, and shall so far vary the proviso respecting the sum of $171,428 45-90, expended in quieting and resisting the Indians, as that the said State shall have credit in the specie requisitions of Congress to the amount of her specie quota on the past requisitions, and for the residue in her account with the United States for moneys loaned, Congress will accept the cession."

It appeared strange to his mind, that any one could doubt, after an examination of this report, the absolute right of the States to all the unlocated territories within their limits. It might be asked why it was unnecessary or improper to require of Congress a guaranty of the remaining territory. To this it was a sufficient answer to say, that the committee must have based the refusal on the clause of the sixth article of confederation, which he had already quoted, namely, "that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States." Nor is it unimportant to state that the identical land now occupied by the Cherokees within the limits of Georgia, is a portion of the territory which the committee of Congress stated would be retained by that State, if the terms of cession proposed by her should be adopted.

But the doctrine contended for is further sustained by the fact, that the cession previously made by Virginia of her northwestern territory was coupled with a reservation of the land between the Scioto and Miami, for satisfying bounty warrants issued, and to be issued, to the officers and soldiers of the State line in the revolutionary army. Nor was the cession afterwards made by North Carolina, now constituting the State of Tennessee, uncoupled with conditions of a similar character. And the State of Connecticut, relying on her territorial rights, as secured by charter, derived, at a much later period, a considerable sum from her reserve west of the Ohio. Having brought these facts and arguments to the consideration of the House, he hoped we should not again hear of the right of the United States to the unlocated land in the respective States, as a common fund for paying the debts and defraying the expenses of the Union, on the ground that they were acquired in the revolutionary war as the common property of the confederation. He knew very well that Maryland, New Jersey, and Rhode Island were the most strenuous advocates of the right of the Union to land thus situated; but, notwithstanding they exerted themselves to procure the incorporation of such a principle into the articles of confederation as a prerequisite to their ratification of them, they finally ratified without it. But it might be proper for him to state that the two latter

States, in the instructions which they gave to their delegates in Congress, distinctly disclaimed for the Union any jurisdiction over such lands. Well, then, might it excite surprise, that, at this late day, they should be among the foremost to insist on such jurisdiction.

He thought he had now fully answered the objection, that the waste lands were acquired as the common fund of the Union, and that the declaration or recognition of American independence regarded these States solely in their confederate, and not in their individual character.

But, in further illustration of the doctrine which he maintained, he might have adverted to the jurisdiction exercised by nearly all the colonies over the Indian tribes within their respective limits.

He might have spoken of laws enacted by one, giving a premium for Indian scalps, and for the rearing of dogs to hunt them down, which he believed the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts could not deny had been done by his own State within the period of her colonial existence. He might have spoken of their being transported by another colony beyond seas, and sold for slaves. How another had restrained their liberty, by forbidding their going from home after a certain hour at night, without a pass or permit from a white man, under the penalty of corporal punishment. Of the act passed by Pennsylvania in 1743, adding for criminal jurisdiction all the wild country of that colony to the county of Philadelphia; and how that act, as he had recently understood, on the highest authority, had been enforced upon an Indian the following year, for manslaughter committed in a remote corner of the country thus annexed to that county. He might have adverted to the jurisdiction exercised within a few years past upon an Indian within the limits of New York; but if the facts and principles presented by him be correct, and he did not doubt it, it could not be necessary to go into such particulars. He should not refer to them in this cursory manner for the purpose of inquiring into their propriety or impropriety. He would leave that to be settled by the consciences of those who had presumed to question the conduct of Georgia for the execution of a Cherokee Indian for the murder of another Cherokee Indian. He would not be understood as referring to them for the purpose of examining the comparative cruelty of Georgia and other States, as, among the wise and good, he had too much confidence in the belief that blood will not be considered as sticking to her skirts for the execution of a murderer.

But, since it has suited the convenience of politicians of a certain order to rail against Georgia, we have been stunned by the cry of violations of the treaty-making power. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire what is that power, and wherein has it been violated? And, before proceeding further with the subject, it is necessary to state that this power was nearly the same under the confederation that it is under the constitution since adopted; and to ascertain its extent and meaning in relation to Indians, it becomes necessary to inquire in what manner it was exercised, if exercised at all, in our intercourse with them. But it would be quite as convenient to state the treaty-making power, and the power regulating our intercourse with the Indian tribes, under the articles of confederation. In the ninth article, among various other powers, it is provided that "the United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive power of entering into treaties and alliances." This is coupled with a proviso protecting the commercial power of the States as it then existed. It is further provided in the same article, that "the United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all the affairs of the Indian tribes, not members of any of the States; provided the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated." Let us, then, consider, first, what are the legislative rights of a State.

They consist in the power of making and enforcing laws over all and every description of persons within her limits. If this be true, and how it can be denied he could not understand, it necessarily follows that every Indian tribe resident within a State is a member of the State, within the meaning of the first clause conferring the power relative to Indians, and in this sense he believed it had been acted on in a great majority of the old thirteen States, and should have been so acted on in all.

So much, then, for the present, as respects the power of the confederation to "regulate trade and all affairs with the Indians." But to return to the treaty-making power, and its reference to Indians, as we find it interpreted by the acts of the confederation. We find in the journal of their proceedings various compacts or agreements with Indians, which are not now, and never have been, treaties. He might be asked why he made the assertion. To which he would answer, that while all the treaties with foreign nations, even that concluded with the kingdom or empire of Morocco, were solemnly ratified according to the provisions of the articles of confederation, no such solemnity was ever conferred upon a compact or agreement made with an Indian tribe, during that whole period. In what light, then, must we view these compacts; and under what specific power must Congress have considered them to have been made? Surely, under the power to regulate trade and manage the affairs with the Indian tribes. But if a correct definition of the legislative rights of States had been laid down by him, it follows, incontestibly, that the treaty of Hopewell, so called, upon which the changes have been rung from one end of the Union to the other, violated the legislative rights of the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia. Congress, too, seems to have been sensible of this; for, in the proclamation issued by them in the year 1788, for enforcing it, they close with the proviso, "that nothing contained in this proclamation shall be considered as affecting the territorial claims of North Carolina." Nor can it be asserted that Georgia stood quietly by while these things were transacting. So early as the 11th of February, 1786, the House of Representatives, having taken into consideration the "pretended treaty," as they called it, and called it justly, entered into at Hopewell with the Cherokees in 1785, and the attempt to enter into a treaty at Galphinton with the Creeks about the same period, determined that, in doing so, the "commissioners did attempt to exercise powers that are not delegated by the respective States to the United States in Congress assembled." After setting forth the rights and privileges of the States, they resolve "that all and every act and thing done, or intended to be done, within the limits of this State, by the said commissioners, inconsistent with the beforementioned rights and privileges, shall be, and the same are hereby, declared null and void."

But, before proceeding further, it would be proper for him to state that the course which Congress pursued relative to the agreements or contracts called Indian treaties, shows most manifestly that they considered such contracts as falling within the power to regulate trade and affairs with the Indian tribes, and not within the treaty-making power. And if his definition of the legislative power of a State was correct, and he did not fear contradiction, Congress had, by the terms of such contracts with tribes living within any of the States, violated those "legislative rights" they intended to be secured and defended by the articles of confederation. But his opinions might derive additional confirmation by referring to the second article, which provides, "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

He had shown that Congress never considered itself authorized to make treaties with Indians residing within the limits of a State, for they never treated their contracts with them as such. He thought it was equally clear that they had no power whatsoever over them, in that or any other way, inasmuch as such power not only was not expressly delegated, but was expressly reserved by the clause in the ninth article, which provides that the power to regulate trade and manage affairs with the Indian tribes shall not extend to such as are members of a State; but further, and "that the legislative right of a State within its own limits be not infringed or violated." Surely it could not be necessary for him to recapitulate his arguments, to show that the charters defined the limits of the respective States, and that their legislative rights extended over all persons within those limits. But he was aware that it might be objected, that, by the provisions of the federal constitution, the powers of this Government had been enlarged. He was very much mistaken if he could not show by the most legitimate arguments; that, with respect to Indians, they had not been thus enlarged. The provisions of the constitution resorted to by the adversaries of Georgia, who are alike the opponents of the present administration of the Federal Government, are the treaty-making power and the commercial power. At least, he was not aware that such rights were claimed for the Indians, except under the operation of these two powers. Perhaps he might say they are claimed singly and alone under the treaty-making power. But let us see what are these provisions of the constitution. In the eighth section of the first article, power is conferred on Congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." And in the second section of the second article, which defines the power of the President, it is provided, that "he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." In the second section of the first article, it is provided, in the clause relating to the ratio of representation, that it shall include "the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed," &c.—applying the treaty-making power to Indian tribes within a State in the light in which he had considered them; and it was utterly impossible to consider them as falling within its operation; for in this particular he considered the tenth article of the amendments equally as broad as the second article of confederation which he had quoted. He knew an elaborate argument had been made to show that the absence of the word "expressly" from that amendment went to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government. But he did not believe any man, not desirous to gain power by every practicable contrivance, would rely upon such an interpretation. By a fair rule of construction, that term in the second article of confederation was as applicable to the second as the first member of the sentence; and its absence from the amendment applies equally to the second as to the first member of that amendment. If he should be asked by what rule of construction he arrived at this conclusion, he would answer, if the amendment contained the word expressly in the first member of it, it would be understood as belonging equally to the second. Thus, "the powers not (expressly) delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor (expressly) prohibited by it to the States," &c. Thus, if the absence of the term enlarges the first member of the amendment, it operates an equal enlargement of the second; and this shows, that, so far as the amendment is concerned, it places the constitution precisely on the footing of the second article of confederation as to the power conferred on the Government by either. If he had shown (and he thought he had done so) that the treaty-making power did not apply to Indians within a State, either under the confederation or the present constitution, neither can the power contended for be derived from the clause of the constitution which confers the commercial power. The same clause which relates to the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, also prescribes by whom it shall be regulated among the States, and with the Indian tribes. In the view which he had presented, it would be obvious that a provision respecting Indians would not have been necessary, and he had no doubt would not have been adopted, if there had not been such tribes residing beyond the limits of the States. But whether his opinion be correct or not, the advocates of Indian rights cannot shelter themselves under this power, without subverting the rights of the States, and converting this confederation into a consolidated Government. For if the terms of the grant give to the Federal Government exclusive jurisdiction over the Indians, they give jurisdiction equally exclusive over the States; for they are precisely of the same import in relation to each. But it may not be improper to refer to the operation of the power, not only the power but the right of the States, in making up their representative numbers, to include Indians who are taxed; for the exclusion of Indians not taxed is a clear inclusion of those who are taxed. He did not know that any Indians, in any one of the States, had been taxed previous to the formation of the constitution, or even since; but it conveys an undoubted right so to tax them. If this high sovereign power of taxation may be exercised over them, in what particular, then, can they be exempted from any and every act of sovereignty which a State may rightfully exercise over her white inhabitants? The gentleman from Massachusetts had laid great stress on the obligation of treaties with the Indians. He did not intend to say that they were without obligation in some form upon this Government. What he meant to say, was, that no treaty with the Indians, or others, can convey away the soil, or trammel the constitutional sovereignty of a State, both which consequences would follow that gentleman's interpretation of them.

Georgia had not acquiesced in what she considered the usurpations of the Federal Government, as growing out of its contracts with Indian tribes. He had already adverted to the protest, in 1787, against the treaties of Hopewell and Galphinton, and would now call the attention of the House to a similar, but more elaborate and detailed protest, adopted on the 9th of February, 1797, against the treaties before mentioned, and all others since made with the different tribes, including the treaty of Colerain, concluded with the Creek Indians in the summer of 1796.

Although this remonstrance did not prevent the ratification of the treaty of Colerain, it led to the adoption of a proviso, to which he would refer. It provides that the treaty should not "affect any claim of the State of Georgia to the right of pre-emption in the land therein set apart for military or trading posts, or to give to the United States, without the consent of the said State, any right to the soil, or to the exclusive legislation over the same, or any other right than that of establishing trading posts within the Indian territory mentioned in those articles, as long as the frontier of Georgia may require those establishments." From that period until the compact of 1802, there seems to have been no other exercise of power by the United States with the Indians in Georgia, nor protest on her part against it. By that compact, Georgia ceded a large portion of her territory, and the United States ceded to her all "claim to soil and jurisdiction" within the limits which the State then reserved for her own use.

But he did not place the title of Georgia on the terms of that compact. It stood on higher ground. It was derived from the declaration of independence, as he had already demonstrated. He had referred to the compact, to meet objections which might arise in the mind of any gentleman who might not agree with him in placing her title on the ground assumed by him.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts accuses Georgia of violating the intercourse law of 1802, and the President of countenancing its infraction by her. By that law, it is distinctly provided that Indian communities, surrounded by a white population, shall be excluded from its operation. Why was this done, if the States, respectively, within which they resided, had not, and did not exercise jurisdiction over them? It was impossible to arrive at any other conclusion. But it was of some importance to compare the dates of that law with the date of the compact of 1802. The law was passed on the 30th of March, and the compact was entered into on the 24th of April following. If, then, in any view of the subject, Congress had the power to except certain Indian communities from the operation of the law, was it not equally fair, by surrendering all claim to soil and sovereignty within certain limits to Georgia, that the Indians within those limits should be excluded from the operation of the law? The gentleman has objected to the compact with Georgia, as unconstitutional. Does he forget that new States may be formed out of parts of those already existing, provided they give their consent? And does he not know that such consent is not only given by Georgia, but given in the form of a requisition on the Federal Government? But, perhaps, the gentleman considers the compact fair enough in whatever the General Government gains by it, and only unfair as its provisions may operate favorably to Georgia. The gentleman from Massachusetts has told us that the Cherokee Government was adopted on the suggestion made to their chiefs by Mr. Jefferson, in 1808 or '9; but does he not remember that no State can be formed within the limits of another but by its consent? But suppose it be conceded that the Cherokee is a foreign Government existing within the limits of Georgia, what consequence would follow? That the Federal Government would be bound to remove it. What is there to restrain such a Government to the republican form? And yet every one knows that the constitution guaranties to every State a republican form of Government. Then can any other exist within the limits of a State? Most certainly not.

Mr. H. said it was entirely unnecessary for him to go into a detail of the various recommendations of successive Presidents on this subject. It was well known that Mr. Jefferson looked to the ultimate location of the Indians west of the Mississippi. If he was not greatly mistaken, that entered as a motive into the purchase of Louisiana. He believed there might now be found an act in the statute book, passed during the administration of Mr. Jefferson, looking to that object. The recommendation of Mr. Monroe, and the course of Mr. Adams on this subject, must be known to every one. The act of the last session, commonly called the Indian bill, was but in conformity, so far as it concerned the Cherokees, with a treaty made with the western portion of that tribe by Mr. Adams, in May, 1828. Mr. H. said he knew that treaty looked to the emigration of the Cherokees, and he also knew that appropriations for that object then had the support of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, and his friends now acting with him, in opposition to a policy which can, in no sense, be considered in any other light but extending and carrying out the policy of Mr. Adams. The gentleman from Massachusetts chooses to find fault with the country to which it is proposed to remove the Cherokee Indians. Mr. H. said, for his part, he had received the most satisfactory information on that subject. His information was derived from one of the most intelligent red men he had ever seen, a man belonging to the Cherokees of the West. But it could only be necessary to refer gentlemen to the provisions in favor of the intruders on Loveley's purchase, a part of the territory ceded by the treaty of 1828 to the Cherokees, to show that it was any thing but unproductive and undesirable. If he recollected the terms of the law on the subject, it gave to each head of a family of intruders a pre-emption to half a section of land as an equivalent for the inconvenience of removing from the country on which he had intruded. But the honorable gentleman finds fault with the Governor of Georgia for notifying the Cherokees and others within the territory claimed by them within the limits of the State, that the laws of Georgia would be or were extended over that territory, on and after the 1st day of June, 1830.

He would not enter into any inquiries about the proclamations then issued. He would only say he had no doubt they were issued with the best intentions towards the parties concerned. Nor has he been sparing of his censure upon the President of the United States and the Governor of Georgia, for the manner in which they have treated intruders on the gold lands lying within that State, and claimed by the Cherokee Indians. If he understood the gentleman, he represented the President and the Governor as alone solicitous to prevent the Cherokees from digging gold. If he was correct in this understanding, he could tell the honorable gentleman that he was greatly mistaken. The instructions of the Governor to the agent sent by him to the Cherokee nation last summer, and the manner of their execution, go to show that it was intended to remove the gold diggers of every character and description whatsoever. More than this, so far as the citizens of Georgia were concerned in that business, it was a well known fact, that they, in a formal manner, expressed their readiness to abandon it, provided the white men from other States, and the Indians, should be restrained from digging gold. Their view of the subject was a rational and correct one. While they, after being warned of the consequences, neither desired to embarrass the Government of Georgia, nor this Government, they said this precious metal is the common property of Georgia. We are her citizens, and why should not we have part of it, while the citizens of other States and the Indians are dividing it among them? We know that it has been solemnly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, that Georgia has a freehold right to all the land occupied by Indians within her limits. Nor is it unreasonable, whatever possessory right may be held by another, that the owner of the freehold should prevent the commission of waste by any other person.

Mr. H. said he could not suppose it necessary to state to the honorable gentleman the principles which govern freehold right. The gentleman has seen fit to arraign, with much censure, the law of Georgia which extends to a Cherokee the right to absolve himself from an obligation entered into with a white man, while no such option is extended to the white man. And is it possible that the honorable gentleman will not understand the intention of that law? Does he not see in it the same benevolent purpose which dictates a similar principle in relation to infants? It is impossible to give any other construction to the intention of the Legislature of Georgia.

But the honorable gentleman has not permitted the conduct of Georgia to pass without severe reprehension for passing an act at the last session of her Legislature, for the survey of the lands occupied by the Cherokees within her limits. To enforce his pathetic appeal, he had read, with much emphasis, an extract from a letter published in one of the newspapers of Augusta, in Georgia. Mr. H. regretted that the honorable gentleman had not favored us with the name of the writer of that letter. A knowledge of that name might enable him to unravel the motive with which it had been written. Although he had an opinion who did write that letter, yet he would not impute motives to the supposed author upon suspicion only. He, too, could read extracts from letters having responsible names—not printed and anonymous—letters from men well known, and of high respectability, in Georgia—letters going to show that in the proposed survey and occupancy of the wild lands in the Cherokee country, so called, it was not intended to molest the occupants. Indeed, the very section of the law which had been read by the honorable gentleman shows, most conclusively, no other intention. Nor was it designed only to afford a feigned protection to themselves, their families, and such improvements as, according to the former opinions of Mr. J. Q. Adams, could give an Indian title. He referred from memory to an anniversary oration delivered by that gentleman, some years ago, in commemoration of the landing of the pilgrims at Plymouth. Then is there one rule for estimating Indian title when it conflicts with the interest of the pilgrims or their descendants, and another rule for Georgia? But, he said, he well knew at least one prominent motive which governed some of the members of the Legislature of Georgia, who made most strenuous exertions for the immediate survey and occupancy of the wild lands in the Cherokee country. He knew this, because they were of the number of his particular friends.

Indeed, it is a motive which would then have operated, and would now operate, on his own mind, if he was a member of that Legislature. It was that the laws of Georgia might operate on the Cherokee Indians; not with a desire to coerce their removal, but as they were under the rightful jurisdiction of the State, that jurisdiction might be exercised over them. The honorable gentleman asks, if a citizen from another State should go to sojourn at Savannah, would a law of Georgia be tolerated, which required of him to take an oath of allegiance to her? And yet, the gentleman says, it is equally unjust to require such an oath of a citizen who may reside among the Cherokee Indians. Cannot the gentleman see a marked difference in the two cases? Savannah being a community acknowledging the Government of Georgia, such a law would be unreasonable in relation to her. But not so in the Cherokee country; there an independent Government is pretended to be set up, in defiance of the authority of Georgia. And is it wonderful that she should require white men who go there to take an oath of allegiance to her? Most certainly not. But of all the objections taken by the honorable gentleman, it is, perhaps, most unfortunate for him that he should have selected the case of Tassels for the theme of his eloquence—Tassels, who, nobody denies, was guilty of murder on a man of his own tribe! But the high offence of Georgia, in the opinion of the gentleman, consists in her disobedience to the citation of the Chief Justice of the United States. Let us examine into the power of that officer to issue and enforce that precept. But, before doing so, he would take leave to call the attention of the honorable gentleman to the course pursued by Massachusetts in 1793, before the eleventh amendment to the constitution had been adopted, and when the judicial power of the United States was as broad as originally laid down in the second section of the third article of that instrument, and this under circumstances far less strong in her favor. Does the gentleman recollect that at that period the Supreme Court decided that it had jurisdiction of a cause brought before it by an individual against the State of Massachusetts? And does he not know that it was considered of sufficient importance by Governor Hancock—John Hancock, once President of Congress—to require him to convene the Legislature? And does not the gentleman recollect the principles laid down by that distinguished man, as it regards the right of a people to examine and to change their form of government? But Mr. Hancock's opinions may be better understood by referring to the language of his message to the Legislature, in September, 1793. After adverting to the cause of complaint, he says: "The idea that it is dangerous to examine systems of government, and to compare the effects of their administration with the principles on which they are raised, is inadmissible among a free people. If the people are capable of practising on a free government, they are able, without disorders or convulsions, to examine, alter, and amend the systems which they have ordained. And it is of great consequence to the freedom of a nation to review its civil constitution, and to compare the practice under it with the principles upon which it depends. The tendency of every measure, and the effect of every precedent, ought to be scrupulously attended to and critically examined. This is the business of the Representatives of the people, and can never be by them confided to any other persons.

"The great object presented to us by our political situation, is the support of the General Government, the giving force and efficacy to its functions, without destroying the powers which the people intended to vest and to reserve in the State Governments.

"A consolidation of all the States into one Government would at once endanger the nation as a republic, and eventually divide the States united, or eradicate the principles which we have contended for.

"It is much less hazardous to prevent the establishment of a dangerous precedent, than to attempt an abolition of it after it has obtained a place in a civil institution."

How different the opinions and conduct of that high-souled patriot from those who, at this day, consider the Union endangered by a proposition to repeal a single section of a law! When it is recollected that Governor Hancock survived but a few weeks after this message was written, it requires no stretch of imagination to consider it his political testament, containing the most solemn warnings to coming generations. He was not so fortunate as to have laid his hand upon the proceedings of the Legislature, in consequence of the message to which he had adverted. Within a few weeks after it was written, Governor Hancock ceased to live, and the executive functions devolved on the venerable patriot Samuel Adams, as Lieutenant Governor. Nor had he been able to refer to a communication subsequently made by Governor Adams to the Governors of the other States; but there could be little difficulty in arriving at its import, and the character of the legislative proceedings to which it referred, by a moment's attention to the proceedings of the House of Representatives of Georgia, under date of the 12th of December, 1793. That the subject might be the better understood, he would refer to them.

"A communication from his Excellency Governor Adams, of the State of Massachusetts, which was ordered to lie on the table, being taken under consideration, a motion was made by Mr. Watkins that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this House do highly approve of the measures taken by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, in the case of an attempt to compel the Executive of that State, by mandatory process, to answer to a suit instituted by an individual in the Supreme Court of the United States; that the Governor do answer the communication of Governor Adams on that subject, expressing the great objects which stimulated similar exertions, on the part of this State, to guard her retained sovereignty; and that this State has, and will at all times maintain and support such sovereignty against every infraction of her most sacred rights."

This resolution passed the House. But it might be proper for him to state some facts and references connected with the case referred to in the resolution, in which a similar attempt had been made to enforce the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, at the suit of an individual against the State of Georgia.

This was the case of Chisholm, executor of Farquhar, against the State of Georgia. And here he would refer to a section of a bill which passed the House of Representatives of Georgia on the 21st of December, 1793. The section reads:

"And be it further enacted, That any federal marshal, or any other person, levying, or attempting to levy, on the territory of this State, or any part thereof, or on the treasury, or any other property belonging to the said State, or on the property of the Governor or Attorney General, or any of the people thereof, under and by virtue of any execution, or other compulsory process,

Indian Question.

‘issuing out of or by authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, or any other court having jurisdiction under their authority, or which may at any period hereafter, under the constitution of the United States as it now stands, be constituted, for or in behalf of the said beforementioned Alexander Chisholm, executor of Robert Parquhar, or for or in behalf of any other person or persons whatever, for the payment or recovery of any debt, or pretended debt, or claim, against the said State of Georgia, shall be, and he or they attempting to levy, as aforesaid, are hereby declared to be guilty of felony, and shall suffer death, without benefit of clergy, by being hanged.’

This bill also passed the House. Upon any fair interpretation, no one can deny that Massachusetts and Georgia made common cause in resisting the power thus assumed over them by the Supreme Court. It might be an interesting subject of inquiry why they differ so widely in the case of Tassels. But comment was unnecessary.

If, he said, there was so much excitement produced then by the attempt of the Supreme Court to exercise this power over the States, (for the eleventh article of the amendments was not adopted by Congress until the following winter, and doubtless adopted in consequence of that excitement,) why should it be wondered at that Georgia should resist the attempt to exercise the same power, when the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court has been since so much narrowed by the ratification of that amendment? But General Washington was then at the head of the Federal Government—a man not likely to be moved from the discharge of his duty; and yet history does not record (or, if it does, he is ignorant of it) any evidence of his having considered the proceedings of Massachusetts rebellious or traitorous, or treated them accordingly. Nor has the same history dared to cast a shade upon the pure patriotism of John Hancock and Samuel Adams, or branded the name of either with rebel or traitor, in consequence of this transaction. But it has been admitted that there was no power to enforce the citation in the case of Tassels, that citation not operating as a supersedeas of the judgment against him. How idle, then, to accuse Georgia of resisting the authority of the Supreme Court, when the respiting power of her Governor, exercised in favor of the condemned murderer, could alone have given efficacy to the summons of the Chief Justice.

But a sense of self-respect would not permit him, whatever might be his feelings, to make any further comment on the citation, as it regarded the propriety or impropriety of the proceeding on the part of the high functionary by whom it was issued. As it respected the powers now possessed by the Supreme Court, and on other subjects connected with that tribunal, he had well settled opinions, which time and other circumstances might afford him a more proper opportunity to express. He thought that he had shown that in no particular had the State of Georgia gone further in resisting the citation in the case of Tassels, than both she and Massachusetts had done in 1793.

But he had a further reply to offer to some of the remarks of the honorable gentleman on the subject of the Cherokee murderer.

It was well known that, in a case involving the criminal jurisdiction over the country occupied by the Cherokees, as early as the spring of 1830, upon the arraignment at Hall superior court of certain Cherokees for the violation of the laws of Georgia, a plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed, solemnly argued, and the plea as solemnly overruled by the court.

In the month of September, of the same year, Tassels was arraigned for trial. But what was the course pursued by the court on that occasion? Was the accused denied the benefit of the plea to the jurisdiction of the court, which had been solemnly overruled at the preceding term? No. The plea was permitted to be filed, and, instead of proceeding to immediate argument, overruling the plea again, and trial of the accused, the judge adjourned the court for several weeks, to allow counsel to be heard before the convention of judges at Milledgeville. The plea was there elaborately re-argued by the counsel for the Indian, and overruled by the unanimous decision of the judges. Does this look like bloodthirstiness on the part of Georgia towards the Cherokee Indians? Most certainly it shows the contrary.

The decision pronounced by the convention of judges had been published in a number of newspapers, how many he could not say; but this he could say, that he had not yet met with any attempt to overturn it in any of the papers which had fallen under his observation. Nor did he believe it could be overturned. That opinion proceeded upon the ground that the Cherokees were not an independent people; and among the arguments presented by it, the court had properly adverted to the course pursued by the Federal Government towards the Indians in support of their position. They showed most conclusively that the commercial power had never been exercised towards them in the most usual manner of exercising it towards “foreign, sovereign, independent nations.” Nor was the difference less striking in all the wars which this Government had carried on against them.

Every one knows that Congress alone has the power to declare war. But can a single declaration of war against an Indian tribe be found upon the statute book?

What does this prove, if it does not prove most incontestably that, however, in its intercourse with the Indians, the Federal Government has occasionally interfered with the rightful powers of the States, it has never considered the Indian tribes as sovereign and independent States?

He said he might have adverted to various opinions of distinguished men in support of the doctrines he had presented to the consideration of the House, but he preferred relying on constitutional principles to the opinion of any man or set of men whatsoever. There were many points embraced by the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, to which he had not adverted. But, for his part, he did not consider it necessary.

He thought he had sufficiently shown that the jurisdiction claimed by Georgia over the Cherokee Indians was her unalienated and unalienable right; and having that right, as he thought he had sufficiently shown, if, in its exercise, it had been or should be necessary, it was within her constitutional competency to settle her white population on the wild lands in the country inhabited by them.

But let it not be understood that, in any thing he had uttered, he had admitted the right of this Government to interfere with the constitutional right of Georgia to govern the people, and to dispose of the lands within her limits. In the exercise of those rights, he trusted she always would exercise as she had heretofore exercised them, with a just regard to what was due her own character.

In presenting these observations, he hoped he had not overstepped the pledge he had given at the outset. As he had refrained from going into a detailed defence of Georgia against the various accusations of the gentleman from Massachusetts, so he had abstained from an elaborate attempt to defend the present administration of the Federal Government. But it must not be considered that he had declined doing so from any apprehended difficulty of such a task. But he was aware that he should be followed by friends who would more than supply any thing and every thing which he had omitted.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, next addressed the House, and stated upon proofs which, as he observed, were satisfactory to him, that the great majority of the Cherokees were in the most squalid and miserable condition; no further advance in civilization, or in the arts of social life, than their ancestors of a century ago. It was not the red men who were benefited under the present system, but some twenty or thirty whites who had insinuated themselves into the confidence of the Indians, and who, together with the half-breeds, controlled the whole tribe, and acquired wealth at the expense of those for whose welfare so many philanthropic wishes were expressed in the House. He deplored the revilings and denunciations that had occurred during the discussions of this question, and deprecated the spirit of bigotry in which they had their origin. The people of Georgia would rather suffer military execution than recede from their expressed determination to sustain their laws; and would those who, from party feeling, pressed this measure forward at the awful risk of producing a civil war, persist in a course which, while it encroached upon the honor of the President, and the spirit of the constitution, placed the country upon the brink of an intestine commotion? After some further remarks, Mr. B., who was in a state of exhaustion from the effects of ill health, at the request of his friends, suspended his remarks until the subject should again come up.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

FOREIGN COINS.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, from the committee appointed on the 23d December "to inquire into the expediency of providing that dollars of the New American Governments, and five franc pieces, shall be a legal tender in the payment of all debts and demands; and, also, whether any additional regulations are necessary to the recoinage of foreign silver coin at the mint," made a long and detailed report, accompanied by a bill regulating the value of foreign silver coins within the United States. The bill and report were committed.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the Senate concerning the gold coins of the United States, also made a long and detailed report thereon, accompanied with an amendment to the said bill; which report and bill were also committed.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, three thousand additional copies of these reports were directed to be printed for the use of the members of the House.

COMMERCE ON THE LAKES.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was recommitted the bill to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the Northern and Northwestern frontier of the United States, reported the same with an amendment, which was concurred in by the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, after some explanatory remarks, moved that the bill be ordered to a third reading.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. HUNTINGTON, as the bill contained a number of complex provisions, desired time to examine it.

The bill was further explained and its expediency advocated by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, HOFFMAN, and SWIFT; when (with the consent of Messrs. DAVIS and HUNTINGTON) it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. CARSON, it was Resolved, That two hundred additional copies of the report of the select committee on the establishment of assay offices in the gold region of the South, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN GOODS.

The engrossed bill "for the relief of certain importers of foreign merchandise," was read a third time, and put on its passage.

Mr. HUNTINGTON observed that the bill, in his opinion, required amendment, and suggested, that instead of moving its recommitment, he would submit to the House an amendment to it in the form of a proviso, which, by unanimous consent, he would move should be now received, and incorporated into the bill. Mr. H. then briefly explained the object of the bill, and of the proviso to it which he proposed, and was as follows:

"Provided, also, That no person shall be entitled to the relief authorized to be given by this act, who, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, by himself, or his agents, factors, or correspondents, could have complied with the provisions of the said third section of said act; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall require and receive satisfactory evidence from every person claiming the benefits of this act, that such diligence has been used, and that he has acted bona fide, and without any intent to violate or evade the provisions of said third section, before he shall grant the relief herein provided."

The House unanimously consented to the course suggested by Mr. H.; and the bill, with the proviso proposed by Mr. H., was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The bill for the relief of the sureties of Amos Edwards was read the third time, and the consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

RELIEF OF LAND PURCHASERS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, supplementary to an act of the 31st March, 1830, for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, and for the suppression of fraudulent practices at the public sales of the lands of the United States.

When this bill was last under consideration, Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, moved to strike out the second section. This motion again came up for consideration; when

A long debate ensued, in which Messrs. WICKLIFFE, HUNT, TEST, LEWIS, VINTON, McDUFFIE, and GRENNELL, participated. In the course of the debate,

Mr. HUNT moved to amend the said second section; which motion being agreed to,

Mr. IRVIN withdrew his motion to strike out the section.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time to-morrow.

WESTERN ARMORY.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill authorizing the President of the United States to select a site for the erection of an armory on the Western waters.

Mr. CHILTON was very much in favor of an armory on the Western waters, but he could not vote for this bill. It gave too much discretion and patronage to the Executive; and, if the bill were to pass, he had reason to fear that the armory would not be located in the situation where, in his opinion, it ought to be.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, said that he would support the bill as reported by the Military committee, not because it was what it should have been, but because it was the best that could be had under existing circumstances. Sir, said he, I found this proposition before the House, eight years ago, when I came into Congress, and it has been a subject of controversy ever since. I have, myself, said he, taken such part in this controversy, as perfectly to satisfy my mind that this House will never agree upon its location. I appeal to such members as have been here, and witnessed the progress of this thing—can they believe that another effort would be less fruitless than those which have been witnessed? The alternative now presented is to take this bill, and trust to the discretion of the Executive, or deprive the West of this necessary improvement yet a little longer. I have, said Mr. B., been astonished to hear the objection to this bill, that it conferred patronage on the President. What patronage? That of discharging an irrevocable duty, in the discharge of which he must displease some forty or fifty neighborhoods, in giving preference to one. As a friend to the President, were I to cast about for patronage, and the means of seeking popularity, this should be the last expedient with me. I know, said he, the fearless independence of the President, and I am from necessity obliged, in this case, by my vote, to cast upon him that responsibility from which he will not shrink, and this fruitless conflict will be brought to a close; and I could not but be surprised to hear the other day, when this subject was before the House, an opinion expressed as to the inutility of such establishment. Sir, he could forget, in a few short years, the scenes of the last war, and particularly the difficulties in arming the soldiery, would require a herald to notify him of his being mortal. I perceive that the part of the country in which I reside was not singular, and less provided than all others. Such was the melancholy fact there, that, to sustain the cause of the country, and put into the hands of destitute soldiers the implements of war, press gangs were sent abroad to invade the family sanctuary, and by the law of force was the owner deprived of his arms. And now, in these piping times of peace, we are to be told that there is no necessity for such establishment. Sir, I am admonished at this stage of the session, and with the press of business before us, that I cannot better evince my friendship to this measure, than by withholding further debate. I must, however, indulge, before I take my seat, in the liberty of saying that, were I not admonished that it would tend to defeat the measure, I would prefer eliciting from the House some expression of opinion, that necessarily would have its influence on the future location of this armory; I am firmly convinced of the justice and policy of giving to it a location on such Western water as would supersede in future the erection of a Southern armory; the location would throw it on a tributary stream of the Tennessee river, and within the district which I have the honor to represent. Were it now proper to present the considerations for such location, I feel very confident that I could show to this House reasons which must outweigh any others, and, as regarded as any one site, would be sufficient to ensure success, even in this House; but I am very sure they would not be sufficient to convince the House, when some thirty or forty others were brought into competition, and the members interested in each to be judges between them. I must, therefore, insist upon the passage of the bill as a dictate of necessity, and entreat its friends not to destroy it by provoking discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, also adverted to the vain attempts of Congress, for sixteen years past, to get the object through in any different mode, and urged the passage of the bill as it was, or all hope of getting an armory might be given up. Congress would never agree on the site.

Mr. VANCE deemed the subject so well understood, that no further argument could promote it; and he entreated all who were friendly to the bill to content themselves with voting, lest delay might do what the opponents of the bill sought to do by argument.

Mr. DENNY argued that Congress was competent to decide on the location of the site, and that there was no necessity for leaving it to the discretion of the President. He adverted to the history of the subject, to show why Congress had not agreed heretofore, and referred to the various surveys made. He was adverse to placing so troublesome and needless a responsibility on the President; and proposed at once to settle the question, as he thought it ought to be settled, by moving to strike out the clause authorizing the President to "select a site for a national armory upon the Western waters, and for that purpose to cause such surveys to be made as he may deem necessary," and insert the following: "A national armory upon the land belonging to the United States near Pittsburg, or upon any other site which he may select in its vicinity; or, if water power shall be preferred, then to select a site for the said armory, at the falls of Big Beaver, in Pennsylvania."

The previous question was then moved by Mr. STANDEFER, and was seconded by a majority of members present.

The previous question was then put, and carried in the affirmative, by which Mr. DENNY's amendment was set aside.

And the main question being put, that is, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" it was carried by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Arnold, Baylor, John Blair, Boon, Brodhead, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Clay, Coleman, Coulter, Craig, Crawford, Creighton, John Davis, Denny, Desha, De Witt, Doddridge, Draper, Drayton, Duncan, Findlay, Finch, Ford, Fry, Gaither, Gilmore, Green, Gurley, Hemphill, Hinds, Hubbard, Hunt, Ihrie, Thomas Irwin, William W. INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

The House then took up the bill for the relief of certain insolvent debtors of the United States.

Mr. BUCHANAN said, that when the House some days since, upon his motion, had kindly consented to take this bill up out of its order, he had then declared he should occupy but a very short time in its discussion. He said he would now redeem that pledge; and as time had become still more precious, and the close of the session was so near at hand, he would content himself with a very brief exposition of the nature of the bill. Should any gentleman, however, desire a further explanation upon any point, he would hold himself ready to give it.

This bill, said Mr. B., contains but a single principle. It merely enables the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with such debtors of the United States as were insolvent on the 1st day of January last, and confers upon him the same power of releasing those debtors which every individual possesses. All such debtors of the United States are embraced within the provisions of this bill; except the principals in official bonds, and those who have actually received public money, and not paid it over, or accounted for it according to law.

At present, the Executive Government of the United States possesses no power, in any case, no matter what may be the circumstances, to compromise with its debtors, and accept a part of the demand instead of the whole. The man who has become insolvent, should he be a debtor of the United States in a sum which he is unable to pay, is, under existing laws, placed in a state of helplessness and hopeless despair. His individual creditors, convinced of his honesty, may be willing to release him; his friends may be willing to furnish him the means of recommencing business; but this is all in vain, whilst the debt due the United States hangs like a millstone around his neck. From this there is no escape. Justice, relentless justice, untempered by mercy, is now our only rule of conduct towards our insolvent debtors.

Even if our policy were purely selfish, and we acted from no higher motives than a regard for dollars and cents, we ought to pass this bill. From the examinations which I have made, and the information I have collected upon this subject, I entertain no doubt but that this bill, should it become a law, will bring at least one million of dollars into your treasury, not one cent of which can ever find its way there unless some measure of this nature shall be adopted. There are now in this country many, very many, honest and enterprising merchants, who, although they have become insolvent, retain the highest character among their friends, and in the society of which they are members. In a great number of instances their insolvency cannot be attributed even to negligence or want of skill, but has been wholly the effect of causes which they could neither foresee nor control. Some instances of this character have come to my knowledge, which would be well calculated to enlist the feelings of this House in favor of the bill. There is now an insolvent merchant in the city of Philadelphia, whom this bill would relieve, who has paid into the Treasury of the United States between three and four millions of dollars in duties. His insolvency was, in a great degree, I think I might say solely, occasioned by the passage of a bill through the Senate, in 1826, to reduce the duties on tea. The reputation of this gentleman, both as a man and as a merchant, stands as high as it ever did in his most prosperous days; and should the power be conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise with him for the debt which he owes the Government, his friends will immediately furnish him the means of recommencing business. He will have no difficulty in compromising with his individual creditors. This is but one instance out of many of a similar character, which have come to my knowledge.

Suffer me to advert to another case by way of illustration. A merchant in the city of New York has become insolvent. He is indebted to the Government in a very large sum of money, one dollar of which he is not able to pay. The father of this merchant, anxious to obtain a release for his son, and enable him again to go into business, has actually offered to transfer to the United States property estimated to be worth between four and five hundred thousand dollars, provided his son shall be discharged from the debt. This offer could not be accepted by the President for want of power; and thus the United States, should this bill be negatived, will lose, in a single case, nearly half a million of dollars.

There are many similar cases in which the friends and the relatives of insolvent debtors will come forward and enable them to pay the Government a part of its debt, in consideration of obtaining a release for the whole. Mr. B. said he expressed his own opinion merely when he stated that the passage of the bill would bring at least a million of dollars into the treasury: there were others, with better means of judging than himself, who believed the sum would greatly exceed that amount.

But, sir, said Mr. B., much higher motives than those of a pecuniary character enter into the consideration of this question. There are many honest and enterprising men in this country, having families dependent upon their exertions, who will be left utterly without hope, should this measure be defeated. All their creditors, except ourselves, are willing to compromise with them. Shall we then continue to be inexorable?—shall we alone have no mercy, even although mercy be our best policy?—shall we, merely for the sake of oppressing our debtors, deprive ourselves of more than a million of dollars?

By the passage of this bill you will restore many of our best citizens to usefulness. Men who have long been prostrated in the dust by the weight of debts which has been continually pressing upon them, will again spring into fresh and vigorous action the moment this pressure is removed. Hundreds and thousands are now looking anxiously towards you for relief, and regard the adoption of this measure as their only remaining hope on this side of the grave. Why will you not afford these men relief? Why will you not suffer them by their enterprise and industry to add to the wealth and prosperity of the country, when you can grant them this boon, not only without injury, but with positive benefit to your treasury? But I must be brief, and will pursue this branch of the subject no further.

This bill is entirely retrospective in its nature, and can have no effect upon future cases of insolvency. Its relief will, in almost every case, be confined to men who are now notoriously insolvent. There is, therefore, much less danger of fraud upon the Government, than if it applied to future cases. But this consideration has not prevented the Judiciary committee from guarding the bill with the utmost care, and rendering it impossible, so far as they could, that a fraudulent debtor should take advantage of its provisions. In the performance of this task, they have been much assisted by the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, and, Mr. B. said, he would venture to assert, there was greater danger that the bill instead of being too lax was too rigorous in its provisions. He said he would not, at present, remark upon any of its details.

Mr. WILLIAMS briefly submitted his objections to the bill. It was to a certain extent a bankrupt bill, and moreover placed too great a power in the hands of the Treasury Department. He was in favor of referring the cases in the first instance to judicial investigation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, made a few earnest remarks in support of the bill.

Mr. WAYNE combatted the objections of Mr. WILLIAMS, in an argument of some length, and urged with zeal the policy of the bill.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said, that after the full explanation which had been given of the details of the bill, and of the reasons evincing the propriety of its passage, by the chairman of the committee who reported it, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] he would not consume the time of the House in repeating arguments which had been urged with so much ability. He had risen principally to reply to an objection which had been made to the bill by his friend from North Carolina, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Before, however, adverting to this objection, he would, in relation to the general merits of the measure under consideration, remark, that he considered the passage of the bill would be the performance of an act equitably, if not in justice, due to the public debtors embraced by its provisions, while, at the same time, it would be instrumental in causing a portion of the debts now due the United States, to be paid, which would otherwise be lost to the Government. This would be obvious, when the House should consider, as it would, that many of the public debtors, both principals and sureties, by misfortune, and from causes not within their control, have become entirely insolvent; that they sustain irreproachable characters for integrity and industry; and that while pressed with the weight of their obligations to the Government, and without the means of removing it, they are alike without the ability and the motive necessary to enable or induce them again to commence business. So long as an authority to compromise with them is withheld; so long as their persons are subjected to imprisonment, and they held responsible for the debts until they shall have paid them in full, and this, too, when they have not the means of discharging any part of them—the industry, labor, and enterprise of this valuable class of our citizens are lost to the country. From this situation, so distressing to the debtors, without any corresponding benefit to the Government, this bill relieves them. It enables them to obtain the assistance of friends, through whose kindness and generosity they can make offers of compromise, pay their debts in part, and be discharged from the residue; and thus, while the treasury is benefited, the individual debtors are enabled once more to engage in the business of the world, free from the pressure of debt, and stimulated to active exertion by the consciousness that the fruits of their industry will be their own. The bill has been drawn up with great care, to secure the Government against attempted fraud; and if it be obnoxious to any objection, it arises perhaps from what might be thought to be the severity of some of its provisions upon the debtors. If, however, it be carried into execution in the spirit of its various enactments, as it no doubt will be, a highly meritorious class of our citizens will be raised from a state, now of hopeless depression, to one offering inducements to renewed exertions in useful employments; and a portion of the claims against them, which are now of no value, by reason of the poverty of the debtors, will be paid by the liberality of their friends. Thus much, Mr. H. observed, he was unwilling to omit saying, in regard to the beneficial consequences which would result, both to the debtors and to the United States, should the bill become a law.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] had urged, as an objection to the bill, (if he understood him correctly,) that the power proposed to be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury should be given to the courts of the United States; and that the facts to be proved, on which alone relief is to be granted, should be ascertained through the intervention of a court and jury. In answer to this objection, Mr. H. said that it was difficult to see why all the necessary facts could not be ascertained by the commissioners to be appointed in the manner provided by the bill, with as much security to the Government against fraud, as by any other tribunal. They would be equally competent, vigilant, and trustworthy. Their proceedings will be public, and their means of detecting fraud as ample as can be devised; and the House would perceive that the power to afford the relief authorized by the bill to be given, could not be vested in any court, for the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to compromise the debts of the applicants, on such terms as, under all the circumstances attending each particular case, he may deem equitable to the debtor and just to the Government. Neither a court of law nor of equity could execute such a discretionary power. It must be vested in some executive officer, and in no one with as much propriety as in the officer at the head of the Treasury Department. Mr. H. said he would conclude by expressing the hope that a bill which had in view the twofold object of awarding both justice and equity to an unfortunate and meritorious class of public debtors, and of enabling the Government to realize a portion of debts due to it, now wholly uncollectable, would receive the support of every member of the House.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, also replied to Mr. WILLIAMS, and advocated the bill.

Mr. SEMMES moved to limit the operation of the bill to two years; but, at the suggestion of Mr. ELLSWORTH, who doubted whether all the cases would be closed within that time, the motion was varied to three years, and thus was agreed to.

An appropriation of $3,000, to defray the expenses of the act, was inserted, on motion of Mr. BUCHANAN; and

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MR. RHIND'S ARABIAN HORSES.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit herewith to Congress a letter from Mr. Rhind, stating the circumstances under which he received the four Arabian horses that were brought by him to the United States from Turkey. This letter will enable Congress to decide what ought to be done with them.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The following is a copy of Mr. Rhind's letter.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10, 1830.

SIR: I think it proper to state the circumstances under which I became possessed of the Arabian horses landed from the vessel in which I reached the United States from Turkey.

Finding, during my residence at Constantinople, that our Turkish friends were far behind us in many improvements, I suggested to the ministers several which were of great use to them; and, after closing the business of the negotiation, much of my time was occupied in giving them draughts, schemes, and elucidations. The Sultan, I understood, took great interest in these suggestions, and many inquiries were made of me, by his request, to all of which I afforded the best explanation in my power.

It being customary at that court for the person who negotiates a treaty to remain there until the ratifications are exchanged, or, by express assent of the Porte, to leave a person in his place, I was, therefore, under the necessity of appointing Mr. Narvoni to that station, and presented him in that capacity to the Reis Effendi.

I shortly thereafter took final leave of the Turkish ministers.

Finding that no vessel would leave Turkey for the United States prior to the 1st of September, I determined, instead of remaining idle at Constantinople, to proceed to Odessa, a voyage of three days, and make the necessary arrangements there for the reception of our vessels; having accomplished this, I returned to Constantinople on my way to Smyrna, where I was to embark.

On reaching the capital, I had several interviews and communications with my former Turkish friends, and suggested other improvements in their system, very gratifying to them.

Being informed by the Reis Effendi that permission would be granted me to export one or more Arabian horses, and conceiving that, whilst it would be a personal object to myself, it would also be a benefit to our country, if I succeeded in conveying one to the United States, I visited the studs of many of the nobility, in order to select some, and was on the eve of closing for the purchase of two, when, the circumstance coming to the knowledge of the Sultan, he, on the 31st of August, directed four horses to be sent me in his name. Although this was evidently not intended as a present to me in my official capacity, since the ministers were aware I could not accept them as such, still the gift was one that could not be returned without giving offence. Being well informed that to refuse them would be considered an insult to the Sultan, and would doubtless be attended with injury to the interests of the United States, Mr. Navoni, as well as others, assured me that I must take them away from Constantinople, if I should cut their throats and throw them overboard the next day. I was consequently obliged to take them, and relinquish the purchase of those I had selected. I immediately had the four horses appraised, by competent judges, on the spot, and took them with me to Smyrna.

Having no funds of the United States, or the means of raising them, to pay for their expenses and passage to America, I shipped them as a commercial adventure, in the name of, and for account of, the owners of the vessel in which they came, and from whom I had secured an individual credit on London previous to leaving the United States. The horses are consequently in their possession; but, if the United States have a claim for their value, I presume those gentlemen will pay it over, should they sell for more than the expenses attending them, which, of course, are very considerable.

So far as regards myself, I am ready to transfer to the United States any right, title, or interest I may have in them, should it be required.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

To the PRESIDENT of the U. S.

The subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23.

OHIO RIVER.

Mr. LETCHER, from the Committee on Internal Improvements, to which was referred the memorials from inhabitants of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Missouri, praying for an appropriation for such an improvement of the Ohio river as will render the same navigable, at all seasons, as high up as Pittsburg, for small steamboats, made a favorable report; which was read, and laid on the table.

THE JUDICIARY.

The resolution then came up proposing to print 6,000 additional copies of the judiciary reports.

Mr. FOSTER resumed his remarks, and occupied the small residue of the hour. That having expired, he stated that he should conclude, in fifteen minutes more, all that he had to say on the subject, if the House would indulge him; but the House refused to suspend the rule.

WESTERN ARMORY.

The engrossed bill for the erection of a national armory on the Western waters was read the third time; and being on its passage,

Mr. LEA moved to commit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to amend the same so as that the armory should be located "as near the southeastern part of the Union as an eligible site can be had."

Mr. LEA rose, and said he could not consent for this bill to be put on its final passage in this House without yet making an effort to remedy its imperfections. The pressure of amendments, and the previous question, yesterday, cut off the opportunity for such a proposition; and, Mr. L. said, he voted for the bill then, not so much because he approved of its present form, as from the hope of having another opportunity of improving it. As the bill now stands, the President would have a range of discretion in selecting a site for this contemplated armory on the Western waters, almost from the Northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. To delegate such a discretion to the Executive is derogatory of ourselves, a dereliction of our own duty, an abandonment of our own business, and transferring it to the hands of another. If this power, in the hands of the President, would be patronage, he ought not to have it—if responsibility, it should not be thrown from ourselves on him. In both respects, the transfer would be unjust and unwise. When such a principle is involved, we are not to inquire what particular individual fills the Executive chair, and sacrifice that principle to personal confidence, or, perhaps, to the hope of some very contingent local advantage. Mr. L. supposed that no one would consider him as objecting from want of confidence in the present Executive, who might be regarded as eminently qualified for such a business. No! he was not disposed to transfer such a power to any man, at any time, unless some great emergency should seem to require it; and more especially would he avoid it in the present conjuncture. But what can be the necessity for such a course at any time? We all admit the propriety of supplying the country with arms, and that an armory on the Western waters would greatly conduce to that desirable result, and a majority, no doubt, are in favor of the abstract proposition, that it is proper to have some such establishment. What, then, is the difficulty? Why, forsooth, that there are so many sites for this establishment, that all the wisdom of Congress cannot make a selection of any particular one; and we are gravely told that we must delegate authority to the President because we cannot agree among ourselves. Here is a practical lesson, which ought to be well studied by the people of this country. If many armories were required, no doubt we could get them all through by some means; but one only is much more difficult to establish than many. And is this confession to be thus made public by a Congress which professes a perfect capacity for adjusting all the difficulties in the great business of internal improvement? How to discriminate between what is or is not national? How to apply a just scale of preference in selecting objects? and then find the practical locations among various contending routes? Our knowledge of the various interests and topography of the whole country is so perfect, that we know how to regulate even the roads and canals all over it; but we are utterly unable to indicate in which end of the Union we desire a national armory. It must be on "the Western waters," somewhere between the Northern lakes and the Southern gulf.

Mr. L. said it might not be expected of Congress to designate the precise spot for the armory, but certainly we ought to be able to tell in what quarter of the Union we desire to have it. There are two already: one in the North, at Springfield, Massachusetts, the other near the centre, at Harper's ferry; and cannot we determine on the propriety of placing the third as far towards the other end of the Union as it can be conveniently located? Or must we leave it to Executive direction, of which we can speak only with uncertainty, but which might place it far north on the Western waters, for example, at Pittsburg, which seems disposed to arrogate superior pretensions on this subject, and thus give three armories in one end of the Union, and leave the other entirely destitute?

Mr. L. said he did not expect the co-operation of those representing rival positions of the West, for his experience had taught him how futile it was, in general, to expect liberality, or even justice, against such local, interested influences. He did not pretend himself to be entirely exempted from them; and, although no site in his district might be competing for this armory, yet his constituents, and the neighboring country, did not doubt that public policy required the location in that quarter somewhere. And considering it as, perhaps, the only work for public defence which they could hope to have located among them, they took a lively interest in the subject, and their pretensions were such as to justify pressing them earnestly and confidently on the consideration of Congress. Mr. L. said his brethren of the West could not suppose that he took any pleasure in this collision. It seemed to be the unavoidable consequence of local interests, and those who are free from such influences ought to make an impartial decision. He called on gentlemen from every quarter having no local interest in the matter, to settle the difference among those who have, with enlarged views and liberal principles.

Mr. L. said he did not intend to discuss the comparative advantages of any of the particular sites in question. He did not expect Congress to do more than to circumscribe the range of selection within reasonable bounds. His proposition was one of practical character, avoiding the inconveniences of being either too general or too particular. He would support it by a few prominent considerations, which he conceived to be perfectly unanswerable.

District Affairs.—Public Documents.

[H. OF R.]

If equality of distribution be desirable, let gentlemen look on a map of the United States with a view to this object, and see where our two armories are now located, and they cannot fail to perceive the evident propriety of locating the third one as now proposed, which would be on some branch of the Tennessee river.

By thus locating it, both the South and the West would be better accommodated than either could from any other location; and one such armory would answer both these parts of the Union better than two situated any where else. This statement may appear bold in the estimation of those who have not examined the subject, but investigation will show its literal correctness. As to the South, in the first place, from Virginia to Louisiana, the streams hasten from the high lands to the Atlantic or the Gulf, affording but little community of inland navigation among any of the States; but it is remarkable that the waters of the Tennessee, on the other side of the high lands, in making a course corresponding, in some degree, to the coast, are almost united with all the principal rivers of the South, and affording a ready facility, to be continually improved, of throwing arms into all the South. Moreover, the price of making arms on the Tennessee waters would be less than in the South, by more than the difference of transportation. Gentlemen of the South are sensible of these things, and are understood to acquiesce in the proposition before us, being without any expectation of an armory among themselves. But, in supplying the South, the Tennessee must stand without any rival in the West, inasmuch as it completely intervenes between the South and any other Western stream. Other advantages for the Southern supply will appear in favor of the Tennessee, while examining its superiority for supplying the West, which now comes in order.

On all the Western waters, there is no great difference in the prices of labor and of provisions. The Tennessee country is nowhere surpassed, if anywhere equalled, in variety and extent of water power. It abounds in minerals of many kinds, but especially in iron ore, from which iron is now sold cheaper, perhaps, than in any other part of the Union. Stone coal is found in different places, but has not yet been much used, on account of the abundance of other fuel. Pittsburg is, in part, supplied with iron from some parts of the State of Tennessee, and not those where iron is cheapest—a fact of itself conclusive as to the principal items of the calculation. How stands the comparison as to navigation? The Tennessee unites with the Ohio, not far above the mouth of the latter. If it be desirable to have arms on the Ohio, either to be retained there, or to be sent to any other part of the Mississippi waters, they can be taken down the Tennessee into the Ohio, at all seasons of the year. The navigation of the Tennessee will no doubt be greatly improved; yet there may always be difficulty, at some seasons, in ascending the river, and thus approaching the Southern States; but the downward navigation may always be relied on, in case of emergency, even at lowest water. One other circumstance, if other things were equal, ought to be conclusive. The Tennessee is so far south as not to be obstructed by ice, like the Ohio and more Northern rivers. At critical periods, the lower Mississippi, and also the Southeast, might be supplied with arms from the Tennessee river, while the upper Ohio would be locked in ice. Add to these considerations, that an armory on the Tennessee waters would have perfect security from any public enemy, and would be situated most conveniently for that population which must always be relied on to aid in defending the Southern Atlantic and Gulf frontier.

Mr. L. said he would not consume time by presenting other considerations, or by enlarging on these. But he would again call on the disinterested portions of the House to settle this controversy, when they have the opportunity of doing so, in a spirit of equality and justice, and so as to promote economy, by making one armory answer the purposes of two, and, by that means, also, accommodating two portions of the Union, instead of one, and each of them better than by any other locations.

Let us, at the same time, show that we have some capacity for transacting our own business, and not confess an incapacity, and transfer our powers to another.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved to amend Mr. LEA's motion, by striking out the location there proposed, and inserting "to submit to this House the place which he (the President) may select, for the final ratification of Congress."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, replied to Mr. LEA; and several others rising to speak,

Mr. VANCE observed that he would have been willing for the bill to pass; though, in its present shape, he was rather indifferent about it. He did not, however, think it of sufficient importance to consume the remainder of the session, to the exclusion of all other business; and he, therefore, moved that it be laid on the table.

The motion prevailed, and the bill was ordered to lie on the table, (tantamount to rejection,) yeas 98, nays 56.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, then moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of enabling him to move to take up the bill respecting the silk culture; but the motion requiring two-thirds, was lost.

DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

The House proceeded to consider the bill to provide for the appointment of commissioners to digest, prepare, and report to Congress, at the next session thereof, a code of statute laws, civil and criminal, for the District of Columbia.

Some debate arose on the expediency of this bill, in which it was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS and BUCHANAN, and was advocated by Messrs. MERCER and DODDRIDGE; and, after an unsuccessful motion to lay it on the table,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—76 to 72.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Library, reported a bill making provision for a subscription to a compilation of congressional documents, [from the commencement of the Government to the burning of the capitol, in 1814—proposed to be compiled and printed by Gales & Seaton;] which being twice read,

Mr. EVERETT, referring to the expediency, indeed, necessity of the work, moved that it be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. LEA moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. EVERETT opposed the motion, as commitment, at this stage of the session, would be tantamount to a rejection of the bill.

The motion was negatived—61 to 74.

Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. HOFFMAN made some remarks in opposition to the bill.

Mr. LEA then moved that the bill be laid on the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were taken, and being 86 to 86, the SPEAKER voted in the affirmative, and the bill was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The engrossed bill to provide for the appointment of commissioners to prepare a code of laws for the District of Columbia, was read the third time, and the question on its passage was taken by yeas and nays, and being yeas 76, nays 96, the bill was rejected.

Internal Improvements.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for carrying on certain roads and works of internal improvement, and providing for surveys.

Some debate arose on an objection by Mr. CARSON to the appropriation of five thousand dollars for a military road in the State of Maine—in which Mr. C. opposed it, and Messrs. VERPLANCK and ANDERSON supported it; and the appropriation was finally agreed to.

Mr. PETTIS moved to amend the item for improving the Ohio and Missouri rivers, by inserting "Missouri," and adding at the end,

"And the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause to be expended a part of the said sum of fifty thousand dollars in removing obstructions to the navigation of the Missouri river, within the limits of the State of Missouri, in the same manner as is provided in the second section of the act of 24th May, 1824, for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi, if it be ascertained that the obstructions to the navigation of the Missouri are of equal or greater importance than those remaining to be removed from the Ohio and Mississippi rivers." Mr. P. earnestly supported his amendment, but it was negatived.

On the item of fifty thousand dollars for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, a long debate took place. It was opposed by Mr. ARCHER at some length, on principle, as well as on the inexpediency and inutility of the particular appropriation. From the nature of the river, the obstructions could not be permanently removed, and he wished to know how long these appropriations would be necessary. The appropriation was advocated by Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. CROCKETT—by the latter gentleman repeatedly; and Messrs. VERPLANCK and GILMORE participated in the defence of the item. It was eventually agreed to.

On the item of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the improvement of the Ohio coming up for concurrence,

Mr. LEA objected to the bill on the ground of its comprising so many heterogeneous objects; and moved to recommit the bill, for the purpose of having the analogous appropriations classed in separate bills. He said it was difficult to say what committee should be selected to make this assortment. Sir, said he, this dish is a sort of French cookery, which requires almost a chemical process to distinguish the original elements of which it is composed. Where did it come from? Originally from the Committee of Ways and Means; but some ingredients have been added to it since. And what is it now? A mixture of more variety, probably, for the aggregate amount of it, than was ever before presented to this House—not a variety of items so much as of principle. One class consists of improvements in territories, about which there is not much, but some, diversity of opinion. Another class exhibits what is called a military road in the State of Maine, having a different division of advocates and opponents. A third class consists of a general appropriation for surveys of national character, involving all that farrago of political metaphysics with which we are accosted at every turn, which every body professes to understand, and nobody can explain; which answers certain purposes in theory, but vanishes in practice. A fourth class seeks the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, by removing what are called "partial and temporary impediments" to navigation; and this is to be done under an alleged distinction between improvements for foreign commerce and other internal improvements; and thus the constitution would seem to be stamped on a sheet of elastic gum, to be extended as circumstances may require. But I am yet at a loss to know how far it may be extended, or of what magnitude may be the objects of this power; de-minimis, before they shall rise into importance enough to belong to that other grade of nationality. This can clear away small obstructions, sand bars, and anti-national snags; that can remove mountains. The fifth and last class is an example of our highest potency, and goes for a thorough improvement of the Ohio river as far up as Pittsburg.

Mr. Speaker, can you tell me what committee is most entitled to this bill? That of Ways and Means, it seems to me, is among the last that ought to have any thing to do with it. What have we? Territorial works; military road; national surveys; commercial obstructions; great national improvements! Sir, I move that it go to the Committee on Internal Improvements, with instructions to report separate bills for these various classes of objects. How are we to vote on this compound? It is unjust to compel members to do so. No two of these classes, submitted separately, could get the same vote in this House. It is not the case of many items, all resting on the same principle; and even there it is wrong to have an extensive combination; but all these classes depend on different principles, in the estimation of some gentlemen here; and must they swallow poison, or not eat at all?

Mr. Speaker, these combinations are unfavorable to the correctness and the purity of our Legislature. Human frailty ought not to be thus tempted to do what is wrong, rather than forego some particular advantage. I speak on acknowledged principles; and, taking to myself what I impute to others, I repeat the idea, that the practice of such combinations is alarmingly dangerous to the purity of our actions here. Who willingly trusts himself in such a case, forfeits, in some degree, the confidence of others.

On this motion, and the item of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, considerable debate ensued, in which Messrs. LEA, ARCHER, VERPLANCK, CARSON, and SUTHERLAND joined.

Mr. CROCKETT said he was opposed to the motion to recommit, for several reasons. First, the object of the motion was to destroy the passage of the bill. It was late in the session, and, if recommitted, the bill could not be acted upon at the present session.

We expected to hear the doctrines advanced by that gentleman; we heard his sentiments a year ago upon the principle. For his own part, Mr. C. said, he had always supported the system of internal improvements, and, as he expected to be consistent, he should continue to support that system upon principle, at least until he was better informed than at present. Although, said Mr. C., our great man, at the head of the nation, has changed his course, I will not change mine. I would rather be politically dead than hypocritically immortalized. The more I become acquainted with the great value of the improvements in question, the more I am satisfied of their utility in a national point of view. I presume the improvement of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers is as much a work of national importance as any improvement in the country. At the commencement of that work it may have been slighted by the managers, but I am persuaded that no man acquainted with the mode now pursued can doubt the expediency of continuing it.

The gentleman from Virginia asks how long this appropriation is to be continued? I answer, as long as the Mississippi runs. What is money compared with the lives of the people engaged upon that river; or the appropriation compared with the amount of property which floats upon it? Sir, the produce of thirteen States finds its market by means of these rivers.

Those State rights gentlemen who are opposed to appropriations by the General Government for purposes of internal improvement, may think that the navigation of those rivers ought to be improved by the States. I should like to know what State is to take charge of the Mississippi, and to clear the obstructions of that river. Sir, I do hope the question will be taken, that we shall adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, and pass the bill.

My colleague [Mr. POLK] says he hopes the appropriation for the surveys will be stricken out—I hope it will not. He says he has been a supporter of the present administration, and that he still supports it. I was also a supporter of this administration after it came into power, and until the Chief Magistrate changed the principles which he professed before his election. When he quitted those principles, I quit him. I am yet a Jackson man in principles, but not in name. The name is nothing. I support those principles, but not men. I shall insist upon it that I am still a Jackson man, but General Jackson is not; he has become a Van Buren man. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail.

The motion to recommit was lost—yeas 62, nays 107.

Mr. POLK then moved to strike out the appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars for surveys, and argued at some length against the appropriation. Mr. BUCHANAN and Mr. CROCKETT advocated the appropriation, and the question being taken on striking it out, it was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Allen, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Barnwell, James Blair, Bockee, Bouldin, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carson, Chandler, Claiborne, Clay, Coke, Conner, Craig, Crocheron, Davenport, Desha, De Witt, Draper, Drayton, Earll, Findlay, Foster, Fry, Gaither, Gordon, Hall, Halsey, Holland, Hoffman, Cave Johnson, Perkins King, Lea, Lent, Lewis, Loyall, Lumpkin, Magee, Thos. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and

The House adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

THE JUDICIARY.

The House took up the resolution of Mr. C. P. WHITE, proposing to print six thousand additional copies of the reports pro and con of the Judiciary committee, on the propriety of repealing the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act of 1789.

Mr. FOSTER resumed the floor in favor of the repeal, and spoke half an hour in conclusion of his remarks; when

Mr. EVANS, of Maine, rose, and observed that it could now no longer be said that those who coincided with the report of the majority of the committee, had not had full opportunity for discussing the question and advocating their views. He would, therefore, now move the previous question; which being seconded,

Mr. PETTIS asked for the yeas and nays; but they were refused.

Mr. STERIGERE moved that the resolution lie on the table. Negatived.

The previous question was then carried, and the question being put on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 140, nays 32.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

On motion of Mr. EVERETT, of Mass., the rule was suspended, (two-thirds concurring,) for the purpose of taking up the bill laid on the table yesterday, to authorize a subscription to Gales and Seaton's compilation of the documents of Congress prior to the burning of the capitol; and the bill was then taken up—94 to 76.

Mr. WICKLIFFE opposed the bill, and Mr. CHILTON advocated it.

Mr. CONDUCT then moved the previous question, and the motion was seconded, and carried by yeas and nays—87 to 82.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved a call of the House, but the motion was negatived.

The question was then put on engrossing the bill for a third reading, and carried by yeas and nays—93 to 92.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House then went into committee, Mr. POLK in the chair, on sundry appropriation bills. The first taken up was the bill for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to insert an appropriation of eighty thousand dollars for carrying into effect the Choctaw treaty recently ratified by the Senate. He moved the amendment by direction of the Committee of Ways and Means, and not because he felt any necessity for it himself.

Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, said he regretted not to see the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs in his place. In this dark sea he thought the House had a right to know from the pilot by what course, or what star, it was sailing. If the Indians are the citizens of the States, and subject to the jurisdiction of the States, as contended for, he would thank any disciple of the school of strict construction, or of any other, to show the authority of this Government to purchase their land, to remove or educate them as proposed. Mr. B. said some of his constituents wished to sell their lands, and would be very thankful if the Government would buy them out and aid in their removal. If the Indians are in fact independent nations or tribes, as he supposed they were, then no difficulty appears in the case; but if they are citizens of the States, and subject to the jurisdiction of the States, he saw no power in the Government to interfere. The policy seems to be, to consider them as independent for all purposes beneficial to us, and as citizens for all purposes prejudicial to them. He hoped some one of the committee would favor the House with their views upon this obscure subject, that its course might be uniform.

Mr. LUMPKIN said that he did not intend at that late hour (being 10 o'clock P. M.) to make an Indian speech. No, sir, said Mr. L., I have more respect for myself, and for the House, than to consume a moment of time, that may not be demanded in reply to the gentleman who had preceded him in this debate.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who proposed this amendment, had informed the House that the sum specified was necessary to meet the stipulations contained in the Choctaw treaty.

We, said Mr. L., not only have the gentleman's word for it, but the President of the United States has sent the treaty itself to the House, that every gentleman may examine it for himself; and he who will take the trouble to do so, will not only find that the gross sum of eighty thousand dollars is required, but he will see the guardian care of true friendship manifested to these sons of the forest, in the various items which make that gross amount.

He will see provisions made for schools, churches, the mechanic arts, and for furnishing these people with cattle, to graze and roam and multiply in the beautiful natural meadows of their new Western home.

Sir, said Mr. L., I must express some surprise, with all my respect for the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. McDUFFIE,] at the view which he has taken of this subject. He tells you that he proposed this amendment, rather as a performance of a duty which devolved on him from the position which he occupies as a member of this House, than from a belief that the appropriation is necessary to carry the treaty into effect.

He has arrived at the conclusion that the bill of the last session providing for the emigration of the Indians affords to the Executive the necessary funds to comply with the stipulations of the Choctaw treaty, and consequently that the appropriation of eighty thousand dollars is unnecessary. Mr. L. said he must beg leave to differ with the honorable gentleman; he [Mr. L.] concurred with the President of the United States, in the construction which he had placed upon the Indian bill of the last session. Nothing in that bill could be found to authorize the building of school-houses, churches, and the purchase of cattle, (and other items contained in the treaty,) for the Indians who might emigrate from the east to the west of the Mississippi.

The President of the United States, and his political friends who coincide in his views on the subject of Indian emigration, are not only the professed friends of the red man, but they are friends in reality; they are disposed to prove their faith by their works; they not only wish to remove the Indians from the States, but they are anxiously disposed to better their condition, and, if possible, elevate their character, and add to the comfort and welfare of these perishing remnants of the aboriginal race of this vast continent. Every consideration of justice, magnanimity, and enlightened policy, connected with the present and future history of our republic, demands at our hands a liberal policy towards the Indians. On subjects relating to the disbursement of public money to promote the interest of the Indians, we should not hesitate to be liberal. In the present case every expenditure contemplated will not only be reimbursed to the treasury, from the proceeds of the lands acquired from the Choctaws, but a very considerable surplus will arise from that source. The friends of emigration stand pre-eminent in liberality to the Indians. The enemies of this policy, prodigal in public expenditures generally, are great economists touching all appropriations relating to the comfort, improvement, and prosperity of the Indians.

But, if the destiny of heaven does not forbid it, President Jackson, and his friends who co-operate with him, will evince to the world, that, notwithstanding the obstacles thrown in their way by their opponents, they have been successfully engaged in a work founded in wisdom, benevolence, and christian philanthropy. Mr. L. said he would now call upon his Massachusetts opponents, [Messrs. BATES and EVERETT,] as well as all their co-workers, to prove the sincerity of their professed friendship to the Indians, by their votes. The case presented, said Mr. L., is simply this: will you leave the Indians in their new Western homes—naked and destitute? Or will you provide for their comfort, instruction, and benefit, according to the stipulations of the treaty?

The President and his friends have a thousand times been falsely accused of entertaining unkind and oppressive views towards the Indians, as disregarding their interest, and only desiring their removal, from selfish and immoral considerations.

Now, sir, said Mr. L., if President Jackson and the Georgians were not the true friends and benefactors of the Indians, they would be entirely indifferent upon the subject of this appropriation. The provisions of the Indian bill of the last session provides all the requisite means for the removal of the Indians. But, by the late treaty with the Choctaws, further stipulations have been entered into, highly important to the interest of the Indians. The Senate have ratified that treaty. The appropriation of the money is now asked of this House—and with astonishment we see the whole of the political missionaries place themselves in the most hostile attitude to the interest of their red brethren and beloved allies, the Indians, who have so often been pathetically wept over by their pretended friends in different sections of this Union.

Since the commencement of the present session of Congress, have we not seen the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts assuming the prerogative of sitting in judgment upon heathen affairs in general. They have modestly denounced General Jackson and Georgia. They have instructed their Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence to rectify the supposed wrongs of the President and Georgia, which they have been deemed guilty of, in what the Legislature of Massachusetts considers violations of Indian rights and sovereignty. Their Representatives here [Messrs. BATES and EVERETT] have faithfully obeyed their instructions. And how have they done it? By making speeches on matters and things in general, relating to Indian affairs? By attempting to wrest from the President of the United States his official prerogative and discretion in the mode of the payment of Indian annuities, and making him subservient to the power of President Ross and his Northern allies? By withholding the means of complying with treaty stipulations? And by endeavoring to provoke Georgia and her public functionaries to acts of indiscretion? The plan of our opponents, said Mr. L., is obvious. With all their professions of devotion to the interest of the Indians, their conduct proves they care nothing about them, further than to use them as a pretext to irritate, agitate, and goad on the South to acts of indiscretion. To weaken the bonds of the Union, by causing the Southern States to commit hasty acts of imprudence, that may palliate or plead an apology for the designs and measures of the North, in days that have gone by. I trust that my beloved South will not be hurried on to any act of indiscretion. That we may not suffer our affections to be alienated from the people of any portion of this Union by the various provocations of those who are engaged in the unholy works of discord and distraction. I have neither time nor disposition, said Mr. L., to notice all the absurdities of our opponents. I must draw to a close, by admonishing our opponents to cast the beam out of their own eye, before they attempt to meddle with the mote in the eye of others.

Sir, said Mr. L., the people of Massachusetts, having long since destroyed and consumed their own Indians, in their own way, without molestation from any body, I would advise them not to interfere longer with the Southern States in the efforts which they are making to save their Indians.

Georgia understands her constitutional rights, and she will preserve them. "No new State shall be formed out of any part of any State, or parts of States, of this Union, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as the Congress of the United States."

Congress has no constitutional power to prejudice the claims of any State of this Union to its territorial rights of jurisdiction. Moreover, it is the imperative constitutional duty of the United States to protect each and every State of the Union, not only from invasion, but from domestic violence. Again: The enumeration, in the constitution, of certain rights "shall not be construed to deny or disparage others, retained by the people." Ninth amendment of the constitution.

Again, tenth amendment of the constitution: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or the people."

Eleventh amendment: "The jurisdictional power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against any of the United States, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

Sir, said Mr. L., my State is amply and fully sustained in all her acts, deeds, and doctrines upon the various Indian subjects—by the plain letter and obvious spirit of the constitution of the United States—and I have taken a solemn oath to support that instrument.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, desired to know whether the treaty was before the House. It was unprecedented to vote an appropriation to carry a treaty into effect before the President communicated a copy of it to the House. No such communication, he was informed, had been made, and he was, therefore, opposed to the amendment.

Mr. DWIGHT was not solicitous about the amendment, but he stated that his object was embraced in the general appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars last year: but that appropriation had not been touched; it remained in the treasury, and would go to the surplus fund, and it was necessary to make a new appropriation for this object, if it was to be effected.

Mr. McDUFFIE observed he was indifferent about the fate of the amendment in committee. He had offered it now, that he might be able to offer it in the House when a copy of the treaty should be received.

The amendment was then rejected without a count.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The committee took up the bill making appropriations for certain harbors, and providing for certain surveys.

Mr. LEA moved to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river from five hundred to five thousand dollars, and to include the branches of that river; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAWKINS, of New York, moved an appropriation of five thousand dollars for removing the bar from the mouth of Black river, on Lake Ontario; which amendment Mr. HOWARD opposed, and Mr. HAWKINS explained and earnestly advocated, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, moved an appropriation of five thousand dollars to remove certain shoals below Washington, in North Carolina; but avowed that he could not vote for it himself, yet hoped that those who had no constitutional scruples on the subject of such appropriations would agree to it. The amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. SWIFT, an appropriation of five hundred dollars was inserted for deepening the channel between Hero, on Lake Champlain.

Messrs. BOONE, RICHARDSON, and LECOMPTE made unsuccessful attempts to get appropriations for particular objects.

The committee next took up, in succession, the lighthouse bill, and the bill making an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars for a custom-house in the city of New York; which having gone through,

The committee rose, and reported all the bills to the House; and then

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

LIVE OAK IN FLORIDA.

Mr. HOFFMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, of the 7th of January, upon the subject of live oak timber in Florida, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to provide for the punishment of offences in cutting, destroying, or removing live oak and other timber, or trees reserved for naval purposes; which bill having been twice read, Mr. H. moved that it be ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. WILDE had the preservation of this invaluable timber much at heart, and doubted the expediency of the course recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, in relation to it. He hoped this bill was not in accordance with the suggestion of the Secretary, and that it was not the precursor of an intention to abandon the artificial cultivation and protection of the live oak timber.

Mr. HOFFMAN replied distinctly that it was not; but that it was the intention of the Government to continue the protection and cultivation of the timber.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DUTY ON SUGAR.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, on the 11th January last, to reduce the duty on sugar.

Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, rose, and addressed the House as follows:

He said it appeared to him that the situation in which he was placed was a very unfortunate one; and misfortune would sometimes impel a man to do what he would otherwise abstain from.

An interest of vital importance to the people of the State from whence I come, said Mr. W.—and, I think, no less important to the people who abide in every other State—has been directly assaulted. The gentleman who had the honor of leading the van in that attack, has made a number of statements, and has ushered them to the world in the semblance of facts. I, however, am unable to accredit them in that capacity. But, at all events, they are asseverations made, or purporting to be made, on the floor of Congress, and they ought either to be admitted if found to be correct, or contravened if a doubt be raised as to their accuracy. The honorable mover had a right to say what he did, and to say it at the time he did. It was a franchise belonging to him, as the introducer of the measure. After he had concluded his oration, and had been supported by a speech from another quarter, the duty fell to me—though many other gentlemen would have been infinitely more competent to the task—to make some reply, if any were required; not, however, to answer at that time, because the finger of the dial was just approaching the point which must bid the altercation terminate for that day. The circumstance has been so stated in the newspapers; and the people where we live must be looking, with some curiosity, to see whether we have thought it worth while to denegate, or have quietly made up our minds to acquiesce in those facts of the gentleman's invention, in which they must think, with ourselves, that he is blest with a most wonderful facility. It does seem hard that such a sequence of rhapsodies should be suffered to go abroad through the country, with the avowed object for which they were emitted, without any opportunity being afforded to examine their infallibility at the source from whence they emanated. Yet here have we been met, and precluded by the rule of the House which sets apart but one hour a day for the consideration of the subject, together with a great variety of other things which constantly supersede and take precedence over it.

I have been waiting in perfect resignation for the natural order; yet, during all this period of expectation, but one opportunity has presented itself, and that was, on one morning, the poor space of something less than five minutes by the clock; and even then the House was not ready for the discussion. But if we had been ready, and had been furnished with the documents for which we were waiting, and which were deemed indispensable, and without which, of a surety, I could not have proceeded with any kind of propriety, it would have been but a mockery to take up a subject of so much magnitude, to be then laid aside to make room for other matters of minor consequence.

Duty on Sugar.

The resolution has at last come up in its regular turn: and what portion of time is now allotted to it? Why, sir, a considerable portion of the hour is already flown, and its remaining moments are fast ebbing during the allusion. There are but four days after this remaining of this session, and, even of these four, one is assigned to the consideration of petitions; and if we continue to adhere rigidly to the hour rule, I see no chance worth talking about, for any response from our side of the House.

The subject-matter of the resolution, like all matters of political economy, is complex in its nature, involving a great multiplicity of topics, which, indeed, I have no pretension to be able to suggest, much less to treat in a fitting manner. Yet it would be gratifying to me, in the attempt which it is my duty to make, to have some little more latitude than the rule allows. I am aware that it requires some effort of boldness to ask any departure from rule, at this late hour of the session, when so much important matter is pressing: on the time and attention of Congress; and it is with entire deference to the views and feelings of every gentleman, that I make the request, which nothing but a strong sense of duty prompts me to: it is for a brief suspension of the rule.

[The question on suspending the rule for an hour was put, and carried by a majority of more than two-thirds. Mr. W. then continued:]

I am sorry, very sorry, said Mr. W., that a conjuncture should have presented itself, to make it needful for any one from the country where I live to say any thing that may at all connect itself with this much vexed subject of protecting duties. Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the tariff policy; whether its operation has been a beneficial one, as I think it has, to the nation at large, or an injurious one, as some wiser men than I am seem to opine—in short, whether it has proved a national blessing or a national curse—as its apologists and its revilers alternately contend—We (I speak in the name of those who send me) have beguiled ourselves with the belief that the duty contemplated by this resolution was, from its very nature, and from all its concomitant circumstances, entirely foreign to that long agitated controversy.

Looking back for its origin to a former century—coeval almost, in its existence, with the very Government under which we live—having grown up, as it has, with the growth of the country, and interwoven itself, as it must have done, with all its political economy, as well as with the individual and domestic economy of every man and every woman in it—claiming no identity in point of date with either of the far-famed tariff acts of 1824 or 1828, which have become so offensive to the sensibilities of gentlemen, and against which alone their professed hostilities have been hitherto directed; transcendently lucrative, valuable, and important, as we know the interest which has grown up under it to be to all, and less so to ourselves than to the people of every other portion and fractional subdivision of this nation—deeply imbued with all these impressions, we have been so far the victims of credulity, as to hope that the elements of that strife might rage and fret themselves to death, without ever reaching us, in the seclusion of our distant, peaceful, unobtrusive agricultural pursuits.

The uniform course of the State, through its representation on the floor, has been such, one would think, as to mitigate, if any thing could assuage, that reckless zeal, which would now press onward, regardless of consequences, to the utter annihilation of the little doubtful prosperity we have enjoyed; which would fain break down even unto the very dykes of the Mississippi, and turn the old flood loose, to revel once more over an extent of fertile country, which nothing but a century of unparalleled labor and privation has succeeded in reclaiming from its once superincumbent waste of water; and has transformed it into a bright and busy mart, where the active and the enterprising of the fellow-citizens of every gentleman on this floor daily and hourly resort, to garner up and carry home stores of hoarded wealth, in return for the various products, whether of agriculture or manufacture, of the several countries where they reside.

To dry up these sources of national and individual wealth, and to convert our shores, now decked with costly manufacturing establishments, into idle solitudes, is the object. It must be the patriotic wish of gentlemen; and if it be not the object, then let me tell them, it inevitably would be the effect of the measure, supposing it carried into fulfillment. I speak it in the utmost seriousness, when I declare my belief, in which I am confirmed by the opinion of every intelligent man where I live, that if you abolish this duty, you make the banks of the Mississippi a wilderness; and, so far as my individual option goes, I would rather you did your work thoroughly than by halves. Gentlemen may talk about modification, from the gratuitous supposition that men who are doing so astonishingly, may well bear a reduction. They may romance as much as they please about eight or ten hogsheds to the acre, or to the hand, whichever way they choose to have it: I say, that if you touch the duty, by that fatal contact you in all probability sink fifty millions of the nation's capital, and transfer at once to the foreigner the five or six millions which its employment now produces to the people of the United States, and in which they all, full nigh, come in for equal shares. And, rather than have you lay a violating hand on any part of the ark of our covenant, I would invite you to do at once the ultimatum of your destructiveness, and strike every vestige of it from the page of your statute book.

I made some allusion to the line of conduct held by the State in relation to these matters. Sir, whether our course be characterized by wisdom or by folly, I do not stand here to discuss. But there is one fact I may be permitted to remind gentlemen of, which is this—that those said tariff laws, be they right or wrong, against which they are pleased to take so much umbrage, are in no wise indebted to us for their being: it was no auxiliary hand of ours that helped to call them into existence. Look back through the records of our parliamentary proceeding, and, if I be not mightily mistaken, you will invariably find the voices of our representation on the negative side of all questions for the increase of duties, with the sole exception, perhaps, of the act of 1816, whereby the duty now in question was created, and for which I have heard it stated, sometimes tauntingly, that some of them were induced to vote. And what of that? Why, sir, in so doing, they acted conjunctly, and moved hand in hand, with all the principal members and coryphæi of these very States who now, forsooth, find it meet to ring the alarm bells—at what? At a most important national interest, now grown hoary, and, one would almost think, prescriptive, by time, and which was deemed by their best public men, in 1816, to be an object deserving their utmost solicitude and regard; an interest, too, which has since produced to gentlemen, and to every man who has had a hand in sending them here, benefits more substantial and material than any thing their law makers of that day could have anticipated—ay, far transcending all they could have dreamed, in their moments of warmest aspiration for the future success and prosperity of their country.

But, sir, I am running forward of what I was going to say in reference to the conduct of the State touching these said tariff questions. Returning to that point, I say, that throughout the whole course of our national legislative history, up to the act of 1828 inclusively, whatever little weight our representation may have had in the councils of the country, has always, or generally, gone in opposition to proposals for the increase of duties. And how do we, their successors, now act? Why, we, in pursuance of the dictates of our own mind, and in compliance with the expressed legislative will of—I will not say our country—but I say that, in obedience to our own judgments, and to the expressed opinion of the Legislature of our State, we now freely give our votes for the maintenance of enactments which our predecessors may not, perhaps, have supported on their passage. Nor am I at all aware that the fact implies any fickleness of purpose, or any vacillation of sentiment or policy. I apprehend you would find us as slow now, as you found them then, in yielding our assent to any projected scheme of augmentation, however useful or expedient we might deem it. This, however, is but surmise of mine, and on that point, of course, we must beg leave to reserve to ourselves the right of decision. But, sir, to impose duties is one thing, and to take off duties is another and an awfully different thing. It is one thing to hold out your inducements to industry and capital, and it is another and a very distinct thing, “by one fell swoop” of your legislative besom, to sweep from the face of the earth millions of industry and capital, which, by your national faith, tacitly plighted—unless you are ready to repudiate all idea of faith in a Government like ours—by your nation’s faith pledged, and religiously observed, too, for a tract of time—say twenty-seven years, for such is about the period of its application to us—you have called forth and lured into the fair field of honest enterprise and successful competition.

These are, in part, the motives on which our conduct proceeds; and I challenge the casuistry of gentlemen on this floor, and I invite the sober sense and equitable feeling of the American people, wherever found, to gainsay them if they can. Yes, I would appeal from the bickering jealousies of this heated, inflammatory atmosphere, to the hearts and to the heads of the people of the United States, and to none quicker than to those who live in Georgia and Virginia.

But, sir, the motives I have mentioned do not constitute our sole and only spring of conduct. While we acknowledge some regard for the interests of persons dwelling in other portions of the country, from the conviction that their prosperity is our prosperity; while we are even so unfashionable as to own some deference for that precept of the moral law which forbids us wantonly to destroy or to injure our fellows, we have other more immediate, palpable, and material governing considerations.

When those much abused tariff acts were in the chrysalis state, we did not precisely understand how they were to operate. They were represented to us in the light of “experiments.” The system cognomened “American,” seemed likely to lead us on “through new scenes of untrod being,” and, as was natural to men on the verge of an important step, we paused to soliloquize. But, sir, the experiment has since been tried before our eyes; and we think we have witnessed its success. We have seen it realize, or tending rapidly to realize, almost all that was predicted of it, at the time, by its friends, and consequently falsify, or rather agreeably disappoint, the sinister vaticinations of its foes. Its immediate effect, with us, has been to give us almost every article of primary necessity of a much better quality, and at an infinitely reduced price. By quickening internal commerce, and awakening into exercise the latent capabilities of American ingenuity, it has developed to the nation new sources of wealth, strength, and prosperity, to which it was before a stranger. By opening new markets, and creating new demands, and by promoting a rapid interchange of commodities between different sections, it has multiplied industry and employment, and has thus brought an increased ratio of virtue and happiness to the great mass of the people.

It is not my intention, nor is this the proper time, to go into any elaborate enumeration of particulars, yet I must be allowed, as connected with this subject, merely to cite one or two items by way of illustration. I will take, for instance, the article of cotton bagging, which is one of those things on which we of—where do we live? I hear persons talk of a hither and a further West—so also, in appearance, must we duplicate the other cardinal points—on which we of the further Australia are taxed and oppressed, if taxation and oppression there be in it, to the full extent as much as our neighbors of the South are. Well, sir, this necessary article, which, before the tariff of ’28, cost us twenty-six or twenty-seven cents a yard from Europe, we now get from our American tax-masters for sixteen or seventeen cents. There is a clear fall of ten cents in the yard.

Iron, of which we consume so much, more, perhaps, than any two of the States, which enters so immensely into the process of manipulation and manufacture of sugar, and which also is one of those things against which the ejaculations in our neighborhood are so loud and enduring. Well, sir, this indispensable convenience has fallen in as great, or a greater, proportion than the cotton bagging. Evaporating kettles, of a much better metal, which offer an infinitely more effectual resistance to the intense heat of our furnaces, we now get of domestic cast, for twenty-five or thirty-five per cent. less than we paid for them before the tariff of ’28. Sugar mills, I mean mills with the large iron cylinders, for expression, and steam engines, now cost us about one-half what we paid for them three or four years ago. And, sir, not only do we get these things, but we get them abundantly. Whilom, and the supply was extremely precarious, owing to the three thousand miles of ocean that flowed between us and the countries from whence we derived them: now, assortments of the implements from the Atlantic seaboard and from the Western States are cumulated at every village and hamlet along our coast, to be obtained by the farmer on the most advantageous and accommodating terms.

But, sir, this is not all. While we are drudging at the mill, or watching by the midnight oil the ebullition of the kettle, we must have raiment; accordingly, there are the domestic cottons for clothing to ourselves and laborers, which cost us something more than zero. Coarse woolen cloths have been constantly declining in price, and improving in texture, for the last four or five years: and yet the most important considerations remain still untold. By consuming, as we do, the productions of all the other States, they are enabled to become the purchasers of our sugars—and the raw material of our cotton generally finds its best price in the American market; a market which is exclusively our own, in which we, the cotton-growers of the United States, are the monopolists, or rather the monovendists, where neither the Pacha of Egypt, with his hundred thousand serfs, nor the starving rice-eating millions of India, are permitted to interfere, and compete, and knock down to the dust the value of our staple.

Now, if this be taxation and oppression, then I say, taxation and oppression for me: only let us define the terms, in order to understand each other, and avoid confusion of ideas. I see no insuperable objection, if gentlemen insist on it, why the nomenclature of things should not be changed, provided only that those who use the vocabulary would mutually agree on the mutation.

I have thought it might not be improper to offer a few general observations on the system of which the object looked to by this resolution forms a part. I will now endeavor, under favor of the House, to narrow in the circle of my remarks, so as to make them more immediately applicable to the subject under consideration.

The culture of the sugar cane in Louisiana appears to me to present three principal aspects under which it deserves to be considered. The first relates to the extraordinary profits supposed to be realized by those who are engaged in it. This I regard as a topic of most perfect futility, yet it is one which it has pleased gentlemen to start for the want of a better. The second applies to the influence it has had on the supply and the price of the article to the whole people of the United States. The third, and most important, involves the inquiry as to the extensive market it has created for the productions of every State in the Union. I will endeavor, if I have time, to say something on each of these separate heads.

In approaching the subject of our supposed inordinate profits, it seems to me not inopportune to notice, at once, some of the statistics for which we are indebted to the lubrications of the gentleman from Georgia. I would not think of following him through all the minutiae of the lore with which he has thought fit to store his memory or his tablets for the occasion, but would merely advert, hastily, to such things as appear to me useful to the end of the inquiry. In undertaking this task, my vocation must be a mixture of pleasure and of pain; pleasure, in having it in my power to agree with the gentleman in some respects; pain, in being compelled to differ from any of the dogmas of his belief on this or any other subject, as indeed the points on which our opinions are irreconcilably discrepant are chiefly such as he chooses to derive from gratuitous inference, or, what is far worse, from the tongue or trumpet of that abominable terrific of nations, that lying plague—common rumor. What are the precise data we gather from him? Why, he informs us that, in 1803, the condiment sold in Philadelphia for twelve and a half cents a pound. That I do not deny. I know that about that time, both before and after, it frequently sold for that much, and oftentimes for much more. He says that, in after years, the price declined in Europe, and here in the United States. I know that, too; and there, I contend, our influence began to be felt. He has ascertained that the price of it at New Orleans now ranges from five to five and a half cents—take the average, or price current, five and a quarter cents—and that the quantity produced there is estimated for the past year at one hundred thousand hogsheds, equal to one hundred millions of pounds. My information in this respect does not differ materially from that of the gentleman; and I say it is a splendid result, and is, of itself, quite sufficient to enlist in its behalf the intelligent sympathies of the people of this country, and even to propitiate the most sordid, selfish feeling—if such alone must govern Americans—of every one.

The gentleman also says that sugar has been bought in the West Indies, during the last year, at four cents a pound; and I am willing, for the present, to put the argument on that ground, reserving the point for some future consideration.

I will here take occasion to offer my acknowledgments to the gentleman for all the facts, properly so called, which he has adduced. It would have been my duty to search them out, if he had not done it; and I have no doubt he has taken them from the State papers of the day, or consulted chronicles on which he relies.

But here it grieves me to say, the harmony and good understanding between his opinions and mine must end. I have none, no, not the slightest objection to his facts; but the moment he begins to assume premises, and seeks to enlighten our intellect by what he has been told, I must be allowed, for the moment, to turn lawyer, and enter my objection to the admissibility of the hearsay. With that ingenuousness which marks his life and conversation, he admits that he has no practical acquaintance with the subject: but he says that a friend, or, perhaps, a plural number of friends, have told him how it is—and so, with one dash of his pen, and the addition of a given number of zeros, he showers, nay, he heaps, on our devoted heads more gold than was ever dug from the caverns of Potosi.

Why, the gentleman must have discovered for our benefit that grand arcanum, supposed to exist in nature, but for which the dreaming alchemist has sought in vain since the birth of time. A very Midas! he but touches us, and lo! we stand confessed, in form and pressure, as solid masses of the shining dross. He shows, by calculation, very satisfactory to himself, I have no doubt, that a saccharine concern in that country yields a nett profit to its owner of more than thirty-two per cent. He takes up a plantation, which he estimates, with all its paraphernalia, its apparatus, its laborers, its horses, its implements, its stock of every kind, at fifty thousand dollars; he then proceeds to state its account current of profit and loss for the year, in the most mercantile style of debit and per contra; and he brings out, at the end of the year, a nett profit of more than twenty thousand dollars to the proprietor!

Now this is certainly a handsome little interest on money in such hard times as these; and I wonder why some of the loose cash that is hawking about these other States at four and five per cent. per annum does not flow in that direction, and seek to invest itself in sugar plantations. I wonder that two-thirds of the people of Louisiana should continue to slave for nothing in the culture of cotton, when they see their next door neighbors plenishing their barns with doubloons. I wonder that the people of the adjacent States, who are looking on with every thing requisite in hand, do not step over the border and make their fortunes. I marvel that the gentleman himself does not mount his Argo, affront the perils of the Florida Strait, and sail up the Mississippi, to pluck the golden fleece. I can tell him why he does not. It is because he knows very well there is no such prize there. Sir, if the story were entitled to a moment's credence, you would find in Georgia alone ten thousand valorous men to start at the word, and attempt the enterprise. If but one-half the described wealth were to be collected on our shores, we should be overrun in less than twelve months by swarms more numerous and more greedy of gold than were the blue-eyed myriads that rushed from their Germanic fastnesses on the devoted provinces of the Eastern empire.

Fifty thousand dollars yielding a nett profit of twenty thousand dollars in a year! I have no objection—no, not the slightest—to the gentleman's arithmetic. I only wish it could lay claim to some portion of that accuracy commonly ascribed to the exact sciences. I sincerely wish, for the sake of the gentleman himself, and all his friends in Georgia, that it were but half true—ay, that it were but true in one-fourth part; and that it has a fourth of truth, is what I unhesitatingly deny. Ha! here is a mooted point. The gentleman says twenty thousand dollars—I say not five. How shall we decide the issue? To what umpirage shall we resort? To a wager? No, that is no test of truth. Yet, perhaps, (who knows?) the gentleman from Georgia, or some of his informants, might be willing to underwrite the result. May be they would undertake to make the achievement sure by the appliance of their own skill and craft in the science of tillage; if so, then I say to them, Come one, come all, and I will pledge myself, and will furnish a hundred responsible co-obligors on the bond, if required, that they may select any establishment in the State they please, not worth more than fifty thousand dollars; and, in fixing its value, we will estimate the mere land below what their best lands in Georgia sell for; and they may then assume the entire management and control for any length of time they please—two, three, five, or ten years, they guarantying to us the said nett profit of twenty thousand dollars per annum; and if they do, that we, on our part, will then guaranty unto them an annual salary of fifteen thousand dollars a year for their services; yes, and they shall have bed, board, and washing besides, and a horse to ride, and a seat in the parochial church to boot. Was there ever a fairer offer? The gentleman says they make nothing in Georgia. Here is a chance of fortune with us. Do you come and oversee, and ensure to us the nett profit of twenty thousand dollars, which you so confidently describe, and we will then ensure to you an annual stipend of fifteen thousand for your pains, and allow you besides the sundry little franchises I have mentioned, in order to keep the whole of it in your pocket.

Fifty thousand dollars yielding a clear profit of twenty thousand dollars! What immensely rich characters must we be! Mr. Speaker, one of the most harmless pastimes of the money-hoarder is said to consist in the joys of telling his pelf; one of the most innocent pleasures of the rich, in reckoning the aggregate of their gains. Now, only allow us a moment's fruition of this kind, and let us count.

According to the best estimates we are enabled to obtain, our investments in that culture amount to fifty millions of capital—ay, sir, to fifty millions of hard-earned dollars—not earned, however, by the cultivation of sugar. Now for the proportion. If, as the gentleman asserts, fifty thousand dollars yield a nett profit of twenty thousand in one year, how much do the fifty millions yield? Work the sum. Why, sir, it is twenty millions of dollars—almost equal to the whole revenue of the United States! The budget of your Department of Finance puts down the gross revenue of the United States at twenty-two millions—I drop fractions. The budget of the gentleman from Georgia assigns to one class of planters in a single State—a State having but three Representatives on this floor—a nett revenue almost equal to the whole gross collections of your Government, with all its imputed blood-sucking and vampyrism; notwithstanding its alleged system of taxation and oppression, which, they say, is such that the people can no longer bear it.

Sir, deduct your expense of collection, the salaries to your officers of the customs, and the cost of your revenue service, which may be about assimilated to our brokers' fees, and then, according to the gentleman's hypothesis, the difference will be but a fraction between the whole gross income of the United States and the nett income of a few planters in Louisiana. And who are they that are accumulating such a mountain of the precious metals, as, if true, must in a short time crush through the feeble substratum of their alluvion, and overwhelm both it and themselves to the depths of the bottomless abyss? Who, I say, are they? Why, they are a small portion, numerically considered, of the agriculturists of a small State! What wealthy Nabobs! what bloated Viceroyals! what gorgeous Indian Rajahs must they be! Pretty attributes these to ascribe to a class of men notoriously the most plain, unostentatious, uncostly, practically republican men, in all their habits and modes of life, of any in these United States!

I do not pretend to deny that there are some men of wealth there; there are some every where. I know several myself that have gone from these other States, principally from Georgia, and Carolina, and Virginia, and have taken their wealth with them, though very few of them have much enhanced their substance by the products of the cane. Neither do I deny that there are sundry persons there who dwell in decent houses, and live as persons similarly circumstanced do in other countries; and even they, I contend, do not live, nor are they enabled to live, in the same style of elegance and comfort with people of equal condition in other States. Sir, I speak of the great majority of those who are engaged in the culture of sugar, when I say that they are men who toil and drudge in a way that the gentleman has no conception of; for, during the period of their harvest, which runs through a portion of the inclement season of winter, they have to labor the livelong night as well as by day; that they are men who, for eleven months in the calendar, go clad in blanket coats, and wear domestic trowsers from your looms; that they are men who habitually sit down by a deal board table to a homely repast of bread and salted fish or meat bought from you, to which some, not all, are enabled to add the zest of a measure of cheap claret wine, which the sultriness of their climate makes an almost indispensable requisite to existence; while other persons, luxuriating beneath the bland influence of milder skies, are banqueting on the culled dainties of the earth, and rousing their sated appetites by the costly potatoes of France and Spain, or sit sipping the rich juices of the Fortunate islands, in order to discriminate whether the vintage have been chilled by the too rude visitation of the breeze on the northern slopes, or be dashed by the fine aroma imparted by the southern exposure. Yes, sir, those men who, you say, tax and oppress you, are men who delve and feed coarse, to tax and oppress you in reality, but they tax you with ease and with affluence, and they oppress you with Champagne, with Sherry, with Madeira. And what do you do the while? Why, you sit gravely talking of their inordinate wealth and luxuriousness, and solemnly discussing the propriety of legislative intervention, to bring them down from their high estate, or, in tailor phrase, to take them a button hole lower.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will appeal to you: is it not amazing that any portion of our country, and especially that little nook of it, should even at this day 'be so illy comprehended, so liable to be misunderstood, even by intelligent, well informed American statesmen? With nothing at all of romance in its position; without mountain and without mist, though with plenty of rain and hot weather; a plain, simple, matter of fact country, of hard work; the most accessible in the world, to our friends and yours, from the sea as well as from the land, and which is annually visited by thousands and tens of thousands, pilgrims to the shrine of pleasure or of gain, from every State in this Union! Is it not passing strange that such a place should continue to be the theme of such wild, improbable, incoherent imaginings? Why, no, I suppose it is not strange—it would seem to be preordained that it should be so. The same hallucination has existed for a hundred years or more, and will, I dare say, exist for a hundred years to come. A similar delusion prevailed in France at a very early period of our colonial history. The whole city of Paris was shaken by the frenzy. Public declaimers, then, as now, with Law, a visionary enthusiast, or mad schemer, at their head, proclaimed that the banks of the Mississippi were the famous El Dorado of which the poet had raved. Its inhabitants they depicted as Thomson describes the inmates of the Castle of Indolence: they all dwelt in sumptuous palaces; by night they slept on cushions of softest eider down; by day reclining on damask ottomans, listening to the "lascivious windings of the lute."

In this Eden of the new world, they asserted no labor was required—men sowed not, neither did they reap; wishes were no sooner formed than gratified; every thing that could minister to the appetite was scattered in spontaneous profusion through the land; every clod sparkled with a gem—every pathway was strewn with glittering ingots of silver and of gold. And, sir, the tale had its proselytes then, as it seems to have now, and as things incredible always will. Hundreds and thousands believed the story—and, sir, what came of it! It eventuated in the celebrated Mississippi scheme, in which hundreds of deluded victims of both sexes embarked. They came to the El Dorado, and what did they find? They found dreary coasts and inhospitable shores; primeval forests, dank with noxious vapor; and spreading morasses, rife with lethiferous malaria; and, worse than all the rest, squalid misery and ghastly famine staring them in the face. So burst that bubble—but the eloquence of the gentleman from Georgia not unforcibly reminds one of the ideas to which the inflation owed its birth.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how are such errors and misconceptions to be obviated? I know of but one way, and that is, by free and frequent intercommunication. That is one reason, perhaps, why I have generally, whenever I had a chance, given my vote for the construction of roads. I consider it a national benefit—a great national object. Whenever any one man is induced to travel beyond the narrow limits of his own immediate vicinage, to go to see, and visit, and hold communion with his fellow-citizens in other portions of the country, he then sees things as they are—not as he has been told they are: he is thereby enabled to rectify false impressions, and to heal himself of the besetting sin of misguided prejudice. He is sure to return home a better philosopher, a better citizen, and a better man.

Instead of giving my vote to abridge the mileage of a member of Congress, I would vote to extend it—instead of passing bills to make him go in a straight line through the air, like some migrating goose that sees a thousand miles off the lake in which she soon intends to lave, and, springing into ether, wings her way with unerring pinion—I would, if possible, make him visit every State in the Union, and would pay him for it. He might go zigzag, or he might go round; but go he should, if practicable, into every one—from a conviction that when he next approached these halls, he would come with feelings chastened and subdued, and in a mood of mind better fitting to perform those high functions in which he represents the Deity on earth, of making laws for the government and happiness of his fellow-men.

Mr. Speaker, there is a little trait of personal history, which most of us have been made to read in the day-spring of our time. It relates to a most excellent man and wise lawgiver, who was afterwards promoted to a very high station in the judiciary. I do not, just now, recollect his name, nor is it material to determine, but he held sway in Crete.

This sage lawmaker, harboring in his bosom the wish and the design to better the lot of his people, who had grown restive, they scarcely knew why, resolved to journey into foreign parts, in order to study the polity, and examine with his own eyes the condition and resources of some other States that were then in high renown. Fame, with her many tongues, told him of the wealth and splendor of Egypt—the exuberance of her soil—the grandeur and magnificence of her monuments—and her catacombs. Thither, said he, will I go. Accordingly, having provided the muniments of his voyage, on the appointed day he departed for the land of the Nile. He visited Memphis, Cairo, and Thebes with her hundred gates; and what did he see? Why, with some semblance of external splendor, he saw mummies, and he met the seven plagues of Egypt. Casting his eyes abroad through the land, he beheld a people, with a soil indeed of unbounded fertility, yet poor, toil-worn, and depressed themselves, while from the horn of plenty they poured abundance into the lap of all the surrounding States. He was satisfied—he hastened back to his own country, which he now liked better, and found it to be better off than all those of which he had heard so much. He applied himself to soothe and compose the agitated minds of his people; and, by his precept and his example, he led them on to commerce, to agriculture, to arts, and to happiness.

Now, if the gentleman from Georgia would but do the same! If he, or any of his friends who think as he does, would only vouchsafe to come for a season, and reside with us on the Delta of our great father of waters! We have some hospitality, and would hail his coming with delight; and would take the pains to investigate the process, and scrutinize the account: not the account of his own copious imagination, but the actual account-book of any of our farmers of his choice. If he should prefer it, I would introduce him to some of his own immediate countrymen, possibly his own former associates and friends, who have gone there, and embarked their all in the business, and whom it is now so perfectly natural for the gentleman to seek to destroy—for I have the pleasure to count several Georgians among the number of my most esteemed and valued acquaintances. If he will do this, I will pledge myself for a total, radical revolution in his ideas on this subject. He will at once perceive that it is not for ourselves we distil the sweets—that we are, in fact, but the laboring swarms who hive the honey for the ravenous vermin in our neighborhood to plunder; and I feel assured, that when he bids us adieu—which to us will be a moment of sadness—he will exclaim in candor, if not in sorrow—Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes.

I would here gladly turn my back on this part of the subject. I fear I have already said too much on it. Yet I must be allowed, before I dismiss it, to relate to the gentleman an incident or two, of no great zest or importance in themselves, but which may, I trust, have a tendency to convince him of the danger there is in his searches after truth—though it be a question with some whether truth be always the object of gentlemen's pursuit—to rely too much on what he is told, especially on this subject of sugar making.

The first incident I would mention to him relates to a man from his own State, a Georgian. This Georgian, about two years ago, associated himself with several other persons connected with him by ties contracted in that country, to establish one of those plantations. They were none of them practical farmers; if they had been, they probably would never have touched it. The Georgian, whom it suits my purpose to designate as the principal of the firm, owning a predilection for the land of his former abode, went back to Georgia, in all likelihood to the gentleman's own country, and laid out fifteen thousand dollars in laborers. He next repaired to the Western country, and expended five or six thousand dollars in iron castings and machinery; he then returned home, and stocked his farm with the usual number of horses, probably about fifteen hundred dollars' worth, brought from the West, and filled his granaries from the great redundancy of their Western stores. Take it all in all, it was an establishment which must have cost him about fifty thousand dollars, not one cent of which was the previous product of the cane. And mark me, at the very outset, at least one-half this capital is diffused over these United States, and of that half, more than a moiety goes to the pockets of the people of Georgia.

Here you have a common instance of one of those engines of oppression described by the gentleman. It springs into life, equipped and ready for action, not frowning in martial helmet, and brandishing in dexter the quivering hasta of battle, but holding in its open and distended palms the emblem and the medium of commerce; the incentive at once, and the reward of peaceful industry. And before it has made the first step, yea, before its young limbs have essayed the first attempt at motion, it scatters fifteen thousand dollars into the bosoms of the people of Georgia. And, sir, it is but a fair specimen of our doings in that way. Of the seven hundred plantations in that country, six hundred, at least, within the last ten or fifteen years, would furnish the elements of a similar history. Ex uno disce omnes.

But, sir, this is not the moral with which I wished to point the tale. I will proceed with it. The Georgian now set himself about to organize his plantation and erect his buildings. For the first year he made nothing; he expected to make nothing. During all that period, nothing was heard within his borders but the note of preparation. It was the constant clink of the outlayings of his cash; the regular fall of the carpenter's axe, with the chime of the blacksmith's hammer beating time on the anvil.

But the terraqueous thing moved on in its orbit, until now another autumnal sun shone out upon the land. The period to which I now allude was about the last of October, 1830, a few days before I left home to come to my duties here. By this time some yellow cane waved in the gentleman's field; his houses were up, and he was busily engaged in preparation to commence the manufacture of sugar on a new and expensive principle, which attracted some attention through the neighborhood.

At that juncture the narrator happened to be some distance in the interior, from whence I set out to proceed to my point of embarkation, intending to take the gentleman's house in my way. When I got within twenty miles of his residence, I was informed by several persons whom I met, intelligent persons, that he had commenced his operations; that he had been rolling, as we term it there, for several days, and that his new experiment succeeded wonderfully; that it was turning him out two hogsheds and a half to the acre! My heart gladdened at the tidings, and throwing the reins to the companion of my way, we proceeded on—until coming in sight of his dwelling, I strained my optics in the direction, and looked long and intensely, but I saw no smoke or vapor curling in bold relief against the sky. Drawing still nigher, I could perceive no throng of men, and horses and carts, as is wont on occasions such as that I thought I was approaching. In point of fact, he had not commenced the manufacture of sugar at all. He was not ready to begin; he did not expect to begin for fifteen days to come.

Now, I wonder if that story, which was told me in shape so plausible, within twenty miles of his residence, had been caught up by "that thing which every moment flies, and gains new strength and vigor as she goes," and had been repeated from tongue to tongue, of credible men all, until it had been waited to the ears of his friends in Georgia, what it would have been like by that time. Why, the romaunt with which the gentleman has entertained us here, of eight and ten hogsheds to the acre, or to the hand, would have been stale, rapid, and wholly unpoignant in the comparison. Nay, the balderdash we constantly see going the rounds of the newspapers, derived from an equally authentic source, relieved by a little wilful misrepresentation; those mendacious absurdities, generated by scribblers who never saw sugar cane grow, and forming a compound fit only to be gulped by boobies—would have had to hide their diminished heads, as devoid of relative interest and poignancy.

I will beg leave to narrate another fact, which relates to a gentleman formerly of South Carolina, now one of those of whom I am the unworthy representative. His name—it is Doctor Betty. I feel that I need an apology for thus pressing his name into the debate; but when I see it published in a printed paper to which it is necessary I should refer, and as I know him to be a man of note in that country, and well known to some gentlemen here from that State, I hope he will pardon the freedom in favor of the motive, which is none other than an earnest desire to correct error, and a wish to divest the truth of that opaque integument of fiction and misrepresentation which is so apt to cling around her honest form.

Well, sir, about three years ago the Doctor came into that country, and bought a farm; not for his own sole account, for he was, and still is, the copartner of another in it. Take it altogether, it is an important establishment, with thirty or forty servants, and which, in all, must have cost them at least fifty thousand dollars, valuing the land very low; fully such a one as, in the gentleman's estimate, always yields its owner a nett profit of twenty thousand dollars a year—and there he has been ever since, making sugar, and getting very rich, as a matter of course.

Some weeks ago—it was since this session of Congress, a gentleman from South Carolina, whom I have now the gratification to see nigh me on this floor, inquired of me about Doctor Betty—adding, in the course of the conversation, "that the Doctor's friends in Carolina were perfectly aware of the great fortune he had accumulated in that country by the culture of sugar; and that when he came out last year to pay them a visit, they "particularly admired" the entire simplicity of his deportment and the total absence in his person of that "pride, pomp, and circumstance" which usually attend as ministering handmaids to men of such extensive wealth and revenues. I replied that I had the honor of knowing Doctor Betty, but that I never observed any semblance of regality, nor even noticed any symptoms of opulence beneath his plain but hospitable roof—that at any rate it was not the fashion of folks there to be so very rich. But I said I had it in my power to ascertain precisely what had been the Doctor's achievements in that branch of agriculture, and that I would let him know it. Is this substantially true, sir? [The gentleman to whom the interrogation was addressed assented, and said it was, with some explanations which he would give.] Sir, continued Mr. W., I do not pretend to quote the exact phraseology: in speechifying we sometimes amplify the words of ordinary discourse, but I think I have given the substance of the conversation, though I shall be happy to hear any explanation, and, if I have mistaken any thing, to stand corrected.

Well, sir, I have not yet been as good as my word, and I am happy to have this occasion to fulfil the promise, by conveying to the gentleman the information alluded to.

I hold in my hand an accurate and authentic statement—a paper printed annually at New Orleans—of the quantity of sugar made on each and every plantation of the State during the years 1828 and 1829, the precise years in which Doctor Betty had operated before his last visit to Carolina; and, on referring to the table, I find that in 1828, which was a favorable year, Dr. Betty and his partner made fifty-six hogsheds of sugar; that on the following year, 1829, which was an unfortunate one generally, they made thirty-seven hogsheds, giving an aggregate crop of sugar, for two years, of ninety-three hogsheds—sold at five and a half cents a pound, (and it is not at all probable it averaged that much,) equal in money to five thousand one hundred and fifteen dollars. The estimate of molasses (and it is a liberal estimate) is forty gallons to the hogsheds, which, on the ninety-three hogsheds, gives them three thousand seven hundred and twenty gallons—sold at fifteen cents the gallon, equal in money to five hundred and fifty-eight dollars: now, add this to the product of the sugar, and you find that they have, for the two years, an aggregate crop of sugar and molasses, amounting to five thousand six hundred and seventy-three dollars. Divide the sum between the two years, and it leaves to each year the average partnership crop of two thousand eight hundred and thirty-six dollars and fifty-cents; which, subdivided between the two partners, Dr. Betty's quotient is fourteen hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty-five cents. Now, partly from a munificent disposition, and partly for the convenience of a round sum, let us allow him a bonus of eighty-one dollars and seventy-five cents more—and then he has a gross crop of fifteen hundred dollars per annum! And what comes of the plantation expenses during the time? Why, sir, the crops did not pay them. Nay, I assert it fearlessly that the crops of both years did not pay the expenses of one. Therefore, at the time Doctor Betty last visited his friends in Carolina, he had not made one cent by the cultivation of sugar; on the contrary, he must have been several thousand dollars out of pocket, independently of his original plantation investment: and yet this is the man that was expected to come like some oriental Satrap, with a glittering cavalcade of caparisoned steeds and laced menials; instead of which, he presents himself in simple guise, like any other man travelling to see his friends, and revisit the graves of his fathers; and, as he passes, they exclaim, "see the rich sugar planter, all the way from the banks of the Mississippi; the man who holds in hands 'the wealth of provinces spoiled to feed his luxuries!'" "But," they say, "he does not let on; he wishes to be incog. in this respect; he is modest"—and they admire!! Were ever men so insulted in their poverty? This is indeed to feel "the proud man's contumely!"

Now, sir, to what does the argument tend? Is it that, like Doctor Betty, none of us have as yet made any thing on our capital? That it is a hopeless, bootless, sisyphæan task we are all engaged in? No, sir, that is not at all what I mean. Doctor Betty's is a new establishment, not yet brought to the point of productiveness; he hopes that in process of time it may yield him a support. Di captis adspirate suis.

All I wish to convey, and on which I insist, is, that the sugar growers of Louisiana are doing precisely as all other persons are, in these times of universal peace and general over production, and not one whit better. On the contrary, it is my religious belief that the condition of most of them is already worse, and is rapidly becoming far more deplorable, than that of either the cotton or the tobacco growers of Georgia or Virginia. And why? Because their occupation is not one-half so expensive as ours. When the cotton or the tobacco planter makes a dollar, it is his, or nearly so; but the poor sugar planter, whose employment, together with agriculture, combines manufacture of the most costly kind, whenever he makes a dollar, is, of necessity, and by a kind of condition precedent, tributary to the rest of you for more than one-half of it. Yes, and in a great, great many instances, he has to remit two to you for every one that he makes. And yet he has no alternative; your productions he cannot do without; he must send you his regular quota of contribution. His crop may fail, or may fall short; expense, horrid expense, still stalks at his heels, and he must raise the wind to satisfy the demands of the fiend, or "give up the ship" at once.

In fact, it is the most idle amusement which can beguile the leisure hours of a man, to sit down to count what sugar planters make. What do steamboats make? What do ship owners make? What do merchants make. What do manufacturers of every kind make? And what do sugar planters make? I will tell you what they make: Like all other persons engaged in branches of industry, hazardous in their nature, and requiring capital for their exercise, some of them, under favorable circumstances, with luck on their side, and with rigid economy and unflinching industry skillfully directed, do make out to get along, and better their condition. There are even some who may be said to have made a fortune at the business, which means that they happened to make a good bargain, to light upon a period of abundant crops, to have lived in the days of high prices, or to have profited by some casual rise in the value of the product—just what is seen in every other part of the globe.

There is another portion of those said sugar planters, and that not a small one, who accomplish nothing in the way of success, but merely drag on, from year to year, a lengthening and galling chain, making not enough to buy what they must buy from you, and to meet the interest accruing on their debt, whatever may be its amount. While others, and they are not so very few, make short work of it—they burst, blow up, and lose all in a short venture. And there they stand, like wrecks along the shore over which the hurricane has swept, to admonish those who, like the gentleman from Georgia, come booming along in fancy's barge, with all the canvas of their imagination out—of the hazards which lie in the path of the thoughtless navigator who adventures on that perilous sea.

If there be any gentleman here who really does desire to obtain an approximation to, and an equation of, what may be made by sugar planting in Louisiana, in its most successful practice, I must refer him, for the information, to the documents transmitted from the Treasury Department, where he will see that the possible profit there ranges from five to six, or seven per cent. per annum, according to the varying opinions of persons in different parts of the country, between whom there was no concert or understanding, whose estimates were predicated on different bases, and where, of course, property has a different valuation, as it has in different parts of every country beneath the sun.

But I would particularly point him to the tabular statement annexed to the report of the committee of Plaquemine—it is the first on the file—which is the district in the State where the culture has been longest known, and most successfully prosecuted, and where the subject is best understood. They made out the profit, in that district, to be five per cent. and 9-100—that is, a very small fraction more than five per cent. And, sir, it is no fancy-piece of theirs; it is a picture from the real life; a sketch of what has been actually realized in that district for the last five years, when the price of sugar was more than a cent in the pound above what it now is.

I will here take this opportunity to say, in addition, that I had occasion to witness the extraordinary pains—I am well aware that a captious temper may object to those documents—I have actually heard something of the kind intimated, that they proceed from persons engaged in the business, and are consequently but the testimony of interested witnesses. The objection is a convenient one; but I maintain that those documents furnish the best evidence the nature of the case admits of. If you were preresolved to believe nothing but your own fantasies, why call for the vouchers? You applied for the information; and I say that I had occasion to witness the extraordinary pains, the incumbent study, with which the well informed, practical men who prepared the Plaquemine report labored to gain the information, and to make it scrupulously accurate in all its details; and, as far as my testimony is worth, I prove here, and to the world, that their names, as well as the names by which the other returns from the State are avouched, afford a pledge of the highest kind of the entire faith which is due to any statement to which they may be appended.

Sir, on this ridiculous theory of our supposed exorbitant profits, I feel as if I had been tempted to dwell too long; yet it was the burden of the gentleman's song, and it is the eternal theme with which my eyes and my ears are assailed, and my perfect knowledge to the contrary offended, whether I cast a glance upon the columns of a certain set of newspapers, or hear it mentioned as matter of discourse; and I could not well do otherwise than I have done.

[Here the SPEAKER reminded Mr. W. that the hour for which the rule had been suspended had expired; when a motion was made further to suspend the rule for half an hour, which prevailed by two-thirds; and Mr. W., after thanking the House for such unusual indulgence, proceeded.]

I will now, said he, most cheerfully turn from the disquisition as to what have been, or may hereafter be, our gains from the culture of sugar, to consider its national importance, and inquire what are, if any, the benefits which have flowed from it to the whole people of the United States.

In casting about in quest of its advantages to the nation at large, I find them to consist chiefly in two respects, which respects are the primary objects for which men have forsaken their woods and their caves, to betake themselves to communities, and form the social compact, viz. to obtain the things necessary to a comfortable livelihood, and which they have to buy at a cheap price, and, at the same time, to find a good market for whatever they have to sell; both which ends, I contend, have been eminently subserved and promoted by the creation of that interest in Louisiana. That the effect of it has been to give to the people of the United States the article of sugar at a much cheaper price than they ever would have had it otherwise; and that it has created an invaluable market for all their productions.

Duty on Sugar.

And, first, as to the price. Does not the gentleman recollect (I well remember the time) when the general price of sugar throughout the United States was twenty cents the pound? Sir, the day is not very long gone by since five pounds of sugar were considered every where in the cities, at the most accessible points, at Natchez, at New Orleans, as the fair standard equivalent of the round silver dollar. When the thrifty housewife wanted a few pounds of the luxury, she sent her servant to the store with a dollar, expecting, as a matter of course, to receive her sack of five pounds in return. At places inland, where the price was necessarily enhanced by transportation, it was no doubt much more.

In 1815, immediately after the war, the wholesale price of our own products at New Orleans was eighteen or twenty cents the pound. For several years after, it was generally sold at from ten to fifteen cents; and what has been going on since? Why, we have been gradually reducing the price to nine, to eight, to seven, to six cents, until we have now got it down to the freezing point of five cents.

The history of the decline and fall—not of the Roman empire, but what more immediately concerns the people whom I represent—of the empire of the staple by which they get their hard-earned bread, deserves to be looked a little further into.

The authority from which I draw my data, and from which I beg leave to read, is a statement furnished by the firm of Lippincott, Richards, & Co., of Philadelphia, a highly respectable house, auctioneers, and sellers of sugar, and who have been such for a period of time, of which I have no means of tracing the commencement. I will not read the entire document, but restrict myself to one item in each year. The prices are carried out as per hundred weight.

1811, Nov. 6,	54 hhds. sugar,	$10 30 a 14 30
1812, Sept. 16,	5 hhds. New Orleans,	14 60 a 14 85
1813, Aug. 2,	50 hhds.	22 10 a 22 50
1814, March 26,	90 hhds.	20 00 a 20 75
1815, June 22,	9 hhds. New Orleans,	24 00 a 20 00
1816, April 20,	25 hhds. New Orleans,	15 25 a 16 50
1817, April 2,	46 hhds. New Orleans,	13 00 a 13 50
1818, June 23,	38 hhds. New Orleans,	11 00 a 12 90
1819, June 3,	57 hhds. New Orleans,	11 70 a 12 00

The account is brought no lower down than 1819, but it comes far enough to show, that, from a peace price, varying from ten to fifteen cents, and a war price, ranging from twenty to twenty-four cents, we have got it down, according to the gentleman's own intelligence, to the average price of five and a quarter cents the pound.

Now, I wonder if this simple fact be of no importance to the people of the United States. I think it is of some slight importance. It must be no very inconvenient or uncomfortable thing to every body to have this delicious aliment, this pleasant dulcifier of life, at so very cheap a price as five or five and a quarter cents the pound.

But the gentleman from Georgia is not the man to take upon trust "the goods the gods provide him." While he feels the beneficial effect, it is necessary for him to trace the cause. The mind of man, I am aware, is an active principle, endowed with faculties to range abroad through nature; and, when the breeze of heaven rushes by him, fraught with fragrance and with health, he must needs "list whence it cometh, and whither it goeth;" and he has a right to do so, if he can. Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas.

The gentleman accordingly institutes his researches, and finds that, although the price of this once costly luxury has fallen so very low that it might be good policy in him to buy it to fatten his swine upon, a corresponding declension has taken place in the West Indies. There, he says, it has been bought as low as four cents. Who does not know that? But does the gentleman believe but that we have contributed extensively to that state of things by our competition with those islanders? Does he think that we have not been accessory to the fact of knocking down the price, even in the West Indies? Does he really imagine that the additional supply of one hundred millions of pounds to the great market of the world has not had a powerful agency in bringing the price down—down to what we see it? If not, then I would thank him to inform us whence it is that the price has generally declined just about in the ratio of the increase of the quantity with us; and, vice versa, that the price has generally risen whenever the quantity with us has fallen short. No longer ago than last year, 1829, the seasons proved disastrous to us. The quantum of sugar raised in the State did little more, if any thing, than cover the aggregate expenses of the plantations which grew it. We made but forty-seven thousand hogsheads. And what ensued thereupon? Why, the price ranged a full cent or a cent and a half in the pound higher than it does at this time; many crops were sold for more than seven cents: this year, 1830, we approximate to one hundred thousand hogsheads, and down falls the price to five cents.

To me it looks like a proposition too plain for argument to say, that, by the mutual rivalry which has been got up between the insulars and ourselves, the general demand has not kept pace with the rapid increase of the supply: we act and react on each other; and that hence it is you witness this extraordinary depression of the price.

I will put the hypothesis. Suppose that competition had never been fostered in Louisiana, and the elemental principle of those hundred millions of pounds which we now supply had, until this day, been left dormant in the bosom of the untilled earth; and, during all this lapse, the people of the United States had continued to be dependent on the islands for those progressive hundred millions of pounds: does any one fancy he would ever have witnessed that astonishing depression of the price which has occurred? Why, in such a posture of affairs, it is far more probable that the increase of the quantity would not have been equal to the growth of the demand in Europe, and here, in this rapidly augmenting and consuming country of twelve or fifteen millions of people; and, if so, instead of falling, the price would have risen all the while, and you would be paying more for it at this day than at any former period.

Sir, this is not altogether theory. It is not a mere supposititious, problematical case; it is a case sustained by actual observation of what has happened in regard to many other things. I will take, for instance, the article of Sherry wine, which has risen some twenty-five or thirty per cent. within the last few years; a fact which I the rather select, from the supposition that every gentleman here can practically attest it. And why has it risen? From the increased consumption; no other cause can be assigned. You have diminished the duty, and the thing has risen; because, while the demand has been increasing, while the wine has been growing a more fashionable potation, (thanks, perhaps, to the leech who discovered its curative virtue,) there has been no home production to compete with the foreign supply.

Gentlemen say that sugar has become an object of general use—an article of primary necessity to the people: the very strongest reason which, in the common sense of mankind, can possibly be assigned for the encouragement of its production here, in the midst of the people to whom it is an article of primary necessity: the very ground on which all our wisest statesmen have uniformly recommended it, and other things similar in character, to the fostering protection of Government. The reason which prompts the gentleman to try and crush the necessary product at home, is the very policy which led France, (it only shows how learned statesmen, as well as doctors, differ,) with colonies capable of furnishing it so abundantly and so cheap, to assess a heavy duty, to encourage its manufacture from the beet, in order that her people, to whom it is as much an article of primary necessity as it is to us, might participate in the labor, and come in for a share of the expenditures which the manufacture requires; and, also, that they might, in part, derive their supply from their own soil, free from the casualties of the boisterous element over which it had to be transported, and secure from the deeds of violence that are constantly done on its surface.

Duty on Sugar.

It is an article of primary necessity to the people, is it? Why to be sure it is: and that they knew it to be so, was just what, in 1816, impelled the Congress of the United States to adopt the policy, and place this duty on the footing on which it has stood ever since. And, sir, what portions of the American people were then the freest and the foremost to plight their troth to us, and tempt us to embark our fortunes in the precarious culture? It was the people of Georgia, and Carolina, and Virginia, and Tennessee—the very men who now pursue us with hound and with horn.

In 1816, when the proposal was made on this floor to add one half cent for protection, the representation of Georgia voted for it unanimously; so also did the delegation from Tennessee. The measure was sustained by the wisdom of the Archers, and the Macons, and the Calhouns, as well as by the sapient forecast and reproachless virtue of Lowndes—the very prophets and apostles of your political creed.

And, sir, what was the animating motive with the men of that day? They were groaning under the sense of present burdens, and smarting with the recollection of recent and greater oppression. By resorting to the protective expedient, they sought to palliate the evils to which both they and their people were then so sensibly alive, and to prevent the possible recurrence of woes still fresh in their remembrance. And has not the wisdom of their ways been fully tested by that great assayer of human actions—time? Have we not already done more in their behalf than they ever imagined we could do? From a general average, in all times, of from ten to fifteen cents, and an occasional war average of from twenty to twenty-four cents, we have brought the price down to the average of five cents and a quarter, as stated by the gentleman himself. And what more could the cupidity of any man desire? Is not it enough to gratify the most untoward propensity for cheap?

Yet this very fact of the extreme modicity of the present price is, in part, what calls forth the gentleman's moaning. In his preamble he whereas about the extravagance of the duty in proportion to the price. Now, if the duty be extravagant, in comparison to the price, the converse must follow, that the price is insignificant in comparison with the duty: yet, at the time you saw fit to create the duty, it was but small in relation to the price. And if there be any argument in the preambular proposition, it must be the most inconvenient one in the world; seeing that the more we lower the price, the more we strengthen the argument against us; insomuch that by the time we give him sugar for nothing, (as we seem likely soon to do, if we keep on in the same way,) the argument will be perfectly irresistible.

But go on, and consummate your work. Only fulminate the thunders of your Vatican against us: pronounce your anathema, and bid our factories be still: and go back to the islands of your love, with a new born demand of one hundred millions of pounds: and then send forth your diplomats to sue and entreat, and allude disparagingly to the policy of their own country, and point out wherein advantages may be gained over it; and eventually, perhaps, strike up a kind of bargain, calculated to place your adversaries on the vantage ground, and drive your poor condemned flag from the ocean. Do this, I say, and you will soon cease to have any cause to complain of the smallness of the price in comparison with the duty; you will soon see a rise of fifty or a hundred per cent. in this country. We shall then see who is taxed and oppressed. Then, in sooth, shall we feel the gripe of the "grinding monopolist," and own, too, the might of the forestalling speculator; from whose fraternity, even at this moment, methinks I hear but one voice, from New Orleans to Boston, calling on you to do the deed of folly, and commit to their tender mercies the exclusive care of supplying your people with the article of primary necessity!

The gentleman, in his speech or preamble, (no matter which, for he intended his preamble as a speech,) talks about the three cents duty, levied on the consumer, as a bounty to the producer, and augmenting the price to each by the amount of duty; and from thence he conjures up his "chimera dire," to bewilder the minds of his people, and "silence the whistle of his ploughmen," about millions of taxes!—taxes which, in nature, in reason, and in truth, have about as much existence as the fabled monster itself, which is but a spurious offspring of a wayward fancy.

He himself demonstrates the idea to be baseless. To begin to make out the proposition, he should have shown that the same quality of sugar sold in the West Indies for three cents in the pound less than at New Orleans. Did he show any such thing? No. Did he even assert it? No; he ventured no direct asseveration about it. But he did hold out an innuendo. Of what?—of a difference of three cents? No, but of about one cent; which at once destroys two-thirds of his position. In New Orleans, he says, the average price is five and a quarter cents, while, in the West Indies, he intimates, it has been bought for four cents.

Bought for four cents! Now, it does seem to me, that if it were at all important, which I conceive it is not, to find how the respective markets stood, a different mode of analysis might have been adopted. If any man of ordinary intellect had been put on the investigation, he would, probably, have deemed it proper to try and ascertain, not what was the average price at one place, and what it had been bought for at another, but what was the average price at both places.

Bought for four cents in the West Indies! Why, I raise no contest at all on that point. I am free to admit that it has been bought for four cents and for two cents. I am sure that I have frequently known our sugars at New Orleans bought for four cents and for two cents, at a time when the general average price ranged a full cent, or a cent and a half, higher than it does now; those, however, were extreme cases of inferior sugar, or sugar sold at a sacrifice.

Since it has so happened that we have gone into some examination as to the respective prices, let us see if we have any means of elucidation at hand. The most convenient source to which I can apply, would be, I think, the report of your own Treasury Department, made some weeks ago, in compliance with a call from this House; moved, no doubt, with no very friendly purpose to the subject, but for which I acknowledge obligation to the mover, seeing it has furnished me with documentary evidence of a fact which I was not aware was so easily to be obtained.

The report contains a statement of the quantity of sugar imported into the United States for a number of years, with its average cost at the places whence imported. I take the period highest our own time, viz. nine months of 1830, and selecting from it the average price of brown sugar, at the several places of its growth, I find the table to be as follows:

Having thus gained some insight into the average prices in the countries of our vicinity, let us see what news, if any, can be obtained from New Orleans. I read from "Bright's New Orleans Prices Current and Commercial Intelligencer," a paper of undoubted authority, of the 5th February, 1831, head Sugar:

"The demand has abated very much, and we quote at five cents, dull. None but that of very good quality will command that price; to obtain more, the article must be superior in every respect, and at such distance from the city as will suit convenience."

I will also beg leave to read an extract of a letter dated January 26, from an eminent commission merchant in New Orleans, a gentleman well known to many in this House. The letter was not addressed to me, nor written with any reference to such a use, and I owe it to the politeness of his correspondent that I am permitted to read it. He says, "Sugar is down to 4 a 5½ cents."

We thus find that the average price is, in reality, between four and five cents; and that, after all this uproar, this prodigious outcry about three cents in the pound, wrenched from the consumer, as a gratuity to the producer, these three millions of taxes, as a bounty to inflate the pockets of a few planters in Louisiana—in point of fact, the bounty proceeds from the planter, and is enjoyed by the consumer; that it is we who are taxed and oppressed; that we have taxed ourselves—invigiled into it by your policy—have taxed our time, our industry, our vigils, our capital, to such an extent, that we now supply the cravings of your appetite for less than you can buy the luxury for on the plantations of the West Indies. That we actually do, in a general way, undersell the Swedish and British islands, as well as Cuba, and that we get a trifle more than half the price it commands at Haiti.

Now, by what possible means, by what magic spell, we have ever been able to accomplish so much, is, one would think, a question which, when the physical and adventitious circumstances of the two countries are considered, would puzzle even the facile imagination of the honorable mover himself. The enigma of the sphynx would seem to be a commonplace child's riddle in the comparison. There is but one solution to it, and that is, the all-surmounting energies of American enterprise when induced to exert itself in any given direction.

Sir, what are the relative, natural, and accidental circumstances of that archipelago and of Louisiana? Why, on those genial isles, those ocean gems, the fostering sun beams vertically from January to January. There the plant has the whole twelve months, with twelve more to that if necessary, to mature and concoct its juices. With us it has but six short months to grow—from the last frosts of spring to the first blasts which chill the autumn. They have the livelong year to grind and manufacture in; we can claim but the hurried period of two or three months, which is liable to be abridged. They get their laborers from the banks of the Niger, or the Zaïre, for about one hundred dollars a piece. We procure ours from the shores of the Chesapeake and its tributaries, and from the gentleman's own Savannah, at four, five, and six hundred dollars. Their ploughmen or their hoemen want no purchased clothing; like our primitive parents, a fig-leaf is the ordinary costume they prefer. Ours are clad at great aggregate expense from the product of your manufactories. For their people they have little or no food to buy; they require none; they are sustained by "the gushing fruits which nature gives untilled." A patch of plantains and bananas, once formed, supports the man forever and a day. Ours are nourished by the costly aliments; the corn, the fish, the pork, which you supply.

And yet, with all these advantages on their side, it is a notorious fact that all the colonies have, of late years been in the most deplorable condition; and it has been an engrossing object with the parent countries to try and devise expedients to uphold and save them from utter bankruptcy; while we, with all our opposing obstacles, contributing, as we have to do, annual millions to the rest of you, have not only brought them down in their prices, but have descended to compete, and do compete, with them, on the level of their own platform. And yet there are gentlemen who still pretend to believe, for I cannot give credit for any thing but pretence, that we are annually coining cent per cent. on the capital we employ!

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one proposition, of the truth of which I feel a deeper sense of conviction than of any other proposition connected with the subject. It is this, that all our inquiries, touching the relative price at home and abroad, can serve no other end than to gratify a mere idle, speculative curiosity; that, if they properly understood the subject, the people of the United States, and especially those of Georgia and Virginia, would scout all such attempts to delude them by phantoms and bugbears, and would perceive that their only motive of interest in looking to the price of sugar at New Orleans should be to watch over it, and keep it up to a standard of fair profit there; that the fifty millions employed in the culture are fifty millions at work for their emolument—with this discrimination from ordinary investments, that you have neither the risk of the capital nor the trouble of the administration. This would fetch me to that part of the subject which relates to the great question of the market; a question of more intrinsic importance than all the rest combined.

Sir, if I were to attempt an exposition of the enormity of the demand which the sugar making creates for the productions of all the people in this Union, from those who dwell on our extreme Eastern seaboard, with their oil and their fish, down to those who live on our immediate confines, with another species of bipedal property, it would require more time than I have consumed in all the other topics put together.

But, sir, my moments are counted: I see the goal beyond which I cannot be allowed to proceed; and I must, therefore, with a view to obtain, not a full description of the subject, but a mere vista leading into the terminable field, again invite the attention of gentlemen to the documents on the table; wherein they will perceive that it creates an annual inland trade of from four to seven millions, and that the balance is against us; that the sugar planters of Louisiana have been actually buying from the rest of the people of the United States, for millions beyond the whole amount of their revenues. It is a fact, not more curious than true; and I only lament that time cannot be allowed to offer some explanation of the seeming anomaly, by giving an account of the sums diverted from other employments, and raised by forced loans, which they have been pouring over your respective lands, creating brisk demands and high prices for every thing you have had to sell. The unvarnished tale might, possibly, vibrate the chord of self-interest in the bosoms of all, and more especially of those from whom this strange, unaccountable move proceeds: yet I must needs, however loth, pass the subject by.

There was another gentleman, who spoke on this resolution, to whose argument I am bound, from comity, to bestow some notice—a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER.] Very little fell from him to require any answer on my part. He admits that the success of this project would materially impair the value of the property of his constituents. That is just what I say; and, therefore, in that respect, there is nothing at issue between us. But he says that, with a full knowledge of the injury it would be to his people, he is induced to advocate the measure, because it depends on a principle.

On a principle? Why, how does that alter the case? Do not we all proceed on a principle?—as well those who vote for the maintenance of duties as those who go for their abolition? The opposite points of the needle, which feel for the opposing poles of the earth, act each on its principle—a great physical principle, impressed by the inscrutable hand of Creation. So, also, in the moral world, the most diverging points of conduct all claim to have a principle to which they tend. Every thing is a principle.

But, sir, there are two principles in the world. There is the principle beneficent, and the principle maleficent. The Hindoos also had their Brama and their Vichenou—one the good principle, the creating and preserving principle; the other the evil principle, the destroying principle. And, sir, each had its votaries, equally ready to hazard all and every thing in its vindication. I had hoped the days of such enthusiasm had gone by.

It is a principle with the gentleman to construe the powers of this Government differently from all the past politicians of his own State—the very men who fought the good fight of the revolution, and helped to build up the frame-work of this republic. It is a principle with me to interpret them as Washington and Adams, and their co-laborators—as Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, have done; to say nothing of the patriots of our own days, the monument of whose fame and public services towers too high to be seen by our poor obfuscated vision, filmed by the passion of party, in all that beauty and sublimity of outline which the remove of another generation will impart to the view.

With the gentleman it is a principle to deny to this Government the right to provide for the general weal of its people. With me it is a principle to preserve to it, as far as my feeble efforts may, the powers necessary to secure me in the enjoyment of “life and the pursuit of happiness,” and liberty, too—rational liberty—that which depends for its being on obedience to the law; not that wild, unbridled liberty, the most odious form of despotism, “which knows no master but its mood.”

REPRINTING OLD DOCUMENTS.

The engrossed bill making provision for a subscription to a compilation of congressional documents, was read the third time.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he did not know that any thing he could say on this subject would at this time have any avail on the decision of the House. He had little hope that any appeal he might make to the sober judgment of the House would prevent the passage of this obnoxious measure. But a duty which he felt he owed to his constituents, to himself, and his country, forbid his giving a silent vote. Sir, said Mr. S., I can but express my regret that, at this late period of the session, this measure, without attempting to explain its utility or probable expense, should be hurried through the House in this unprecedented manner. He asked gentlemen if this was the usual course for bills containing appropriations to take. Was it not usual for them to go to a Committee of the Whole, and be there discussed, and a free interchange of opinion take place? He had too much respect for the chairman of the Library committee, who had reported this bill, to even presume he would hold back any information which might be useful in relation to the probable expense to be incurred. It, however, had not been given, and the House, almost at the close of the session, were called upon to adopt a measure which, if carried into effect, would incur an expense of between fifty and sixty thousand dollars—and for what, sir? Why to reprint a parcel of old documents, now in the archives of the House, where any gentleman can command them if he wishes. Sir, continued Mr. S., you have passed pension bills this session, you have pensioned the poor soldier, and the rich soldier, but you are now about to pass a pension law more obnoxious than any heretofore passed. You are about pensioning two printers in this city, whom you have heretofore discarded from your confidence. Yes, sir, you now propose to give them a job equal to the printing for Congress ten years. These printers, Messrs. Gales and Seaton, who, two years ago, were discarded from the confidence of the House on account of their political principles, are now to be taken in preference to all others, and given this job as an annuity or pension; and for what, sir? Could any gentleman tell what this pension is for? Is it because they have and are daily vomiting forth pollution or abuse of Andrew Jackson and his administration? He asked gentlemen if these printers were not using every means in their power, just and unjust, to bring this administration into contempt. He could only express his regret to some of the friends of the administration, in the ranks of the opposition, lending their sanction to a measure which would effectually give it a stab. Why, sir, is it that Gales and Seaton are selected in preference to all other printers to do this work, if it is expedient to effect it? Why not have it discretionary with the Clerk of the House to employ those who would do it the cheapest? Is there not on your table a proposition to print these documents, and let you take them at your own price. When they should be printed, the House could judge of their value. He was admonished that the time of the House was precious. He rose only to do what he considered his duty. It did seem to him that the House were about to take a step which would not by any means meet the sanction of the people. He wished his constituents to see his vote. He asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DRAYTON said, to decide upon the passage or rejection of this bill, it appears to me that we should determine, 1st, whether the documents proposed to be published, are such as we stand in need of in the discharge of our legislative duties; 2dly, whether, supposing this to be the case, we have the legitimate power to procure them. The documents referred to comprehend those State papers of the Executive and its departments, and those reports of both branches of Congress, which are of peculiar importance, from their throwing light upon the principles of the interior and exterior policy of our Government during the long interval which elapsed from the adoption of the federal constitution to the year 1813. The contents of these papers are known but to few. Of many of them there are but two or three copies extant, and others of them are only to be found in manuscript, in the possession of a small number of persons. Surely the records of the United States, upon subjects which ought to be familiar to every Senator and Representative, should be easily attainable; and yet the reverse is notoriously the fact. Within my own limited experience as a member of a committee of this House, it has occurred to me, upon several occasions, to make fruitless exertions to obtain documents relating to an early period of our Government, which would have aided me in the performance of my duties. These impediments in our way ought to be removed; and should this bill become a law, they will be effectually removed.

Reprinting old Documents.

Should it be rejected, we must, to a certain extent, be deprived of the benefit of the labors of those who have preceded us, and be less competent to execute those which devolve upon ourselves. The constitutional power to make an appropriation of money for these documents, I think we clearly possess. We have a right to resort to the necessary means to enable us to discharge the duties which are prescribed to us as legislators. Without information upon a variety of questions which engaged the minds, and a variety of facts, the investigation of which occupied the time of our predecessors, we should frequently be deficient in the knowledge requisite to direct our judgments. This evil will be increased by delay. We should, therefore, apply the remedy whilst it is in our power to do so. I have always been opposed to appropriating money for books to be distributed among the members, which could be purchased at the book shops; but a work like this under consideration will never be undertaken without the aid of Congress. Our right to have these documents published, stands upon the same footing as ordering to be printed an additional number of the Executive messages, or congressional reports—a right which has been acquiesced in without a single dissentient voice.

It has been said by gentlemen, that, admitting the propriety of having executed what this bill contemplates, the expense incidental to it will be enormous—that the selection of what is to be printed, is left to the unlimited discretion of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of this House, who may sanction the publication of useless trash, so as to increase the number of volumes, and to augment the cost far beyond what we should feel ourselves justified in appropriating. I can only reply to these arguments, that I am informed by the most respectable authority, that the expense cannot exceed $30,000, and that the bill sufficiently guards against the other objection of abuse of authority in the officers of this and of the other House. The Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives will be bound by the respect which they owe to themselves, and by the obligations of their official responsibility, to perform faithfully the trust which is confided to them. If the publication be provided for, these officers are best qualified to superintend and direct it. We have elected them to the situations in which they are placed—they have discharged the duties assigned to them with ability and integrity, and their repeated elections manifest that the opinions which we originally entertained of them, have remained unimpaired. Is it reasonable, then, to suspect that they will fail to execute what is required of them, without any temptation from interest, and with the means in the Representatives of detecting any treachery or impropriety in their conduct?

Gentlemen have also urged that we ought not to pass this bill, because the effect would be to confer a lucrative employment upon those who are hostile to the administration. The press is free. The individuals alluded to are as well entitled to express their sentiments as I am to express mine. Their opinion may be correct, and mine wrong, or the reverse may be the case. However this may be, I would never inquire to what party any one was attached who proposed to enter into a contract for printing our proceedings. My sole inquiries would be, whether he could execute it with fidelity, and for a just compensation. Satisfied upon these points, I should regard it as a proscription which ought not to be tolerated in a free and enlightened body, to reject his application because his political opinions were at variance with those of the majority. If our votes are to be influenced by such a motive, to talk of the liberty of the press would be a delusion and a mockery.

Mr. WAYNE also advocated the passage of the bill; and Mr. POLK and Mr. YANCEY warmly opposed it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, then said he desired to state the reasons which would influence his mind in the vote he was about to give, for gentlemen had made such broad and unqualified assertions, that his motives might be misunderstood if he gave that vote silently. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] and the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] had deprecated the passage of the bill in language censorious and reproachful to a very large portion of the House, for they had declared that, under the pretence of printing old musty documents, we were about to pension the printers of a public newspaper opposed to the administration. If, Mr. Speaker, I viewed this matter as those gentlemen declare they do, I should most certainly unite with them in defeating the bill, for they cannot more earnestly deprecate such a motive than I do. A pension to printers of a newspaper, and for what? For nothing. We are charged with an intention to thrust our hands into the treasury, and to abstract from it the funds of the nation, to gratify a spirit of wastefulness. Sir, the charge is one of grave import; and let us look at the facts, and see whether we are about to abuse the confidence of our constituents in this reckless manner. Gentlemen speak of the proposition as if it were new, but it has been brought before the two Houses repeatedly within the last four years, not by special legislation, but by our regular standing committees, who have examined into the matter, and have laid the facts before us, by which they were brought to the conclusion that the public good called for the measure. They tell us, that by fire, and from other causes, the documents of several years are so out of print, that the Government has not a copy for its use; that of some years we have a single copy, of others a few. They, therefore, come to the conclusion that a reprint is necessary. The proposition is to publish only such as are of public importance, and may be useful to the several branches of the Government, in performing its arduous and complex duties. Who does not know, sir, that those documents contain matter most deeply interesting not only to the Government, but to this great, free people? for they contain the thoughts, reasoning, and principles of the men who have been called to administer affairs through a long series of years. They contain much of our civil and political history, which ought and will be preserved, if we place a proper value upon the experience of the past. This Government, sir, has its foundations in the public will; and if we wish it to strike deep into public affection, and to be cherished and upheld, the public must understand not only its operations of to-day, but its history. Its records must not be confined to the files of this hall, where none but members can have access to them, and not even they, for useful purposes; but they must be published to the world, that the wisdom and the experience of the past may enlighten and guide us in the future. We have nothing to conceal from the public, and should not grudge a little of the public money, when it goes to aid the cause of liberty, by diffusing abroad a knowledge of the principles upon which our Government rests, and by establishing it more firmly in the hearts of the people. But it is said by a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. WICKLIFFE,] that we have no need of those documents, for he never seeks for one which he cannot find. Sir, this may be true, though many others have not been so successful in their researches. Is it enough, sir, that we have files of the papers which are sent into, or originate in this body. If the gentleman means so to be understood, I call on him to explain to me the reason why we are annually paying such large sums of money for printing to the public printer. Why do we have a public printer? If the mere fact that we have a copy of a document on file, which may be consulted, is a good reason for not multiplying copies, the argument would prove that we need no public printer, and the pay to him is a waste of public treasure; and yet this reasoning of the gentleman has failed to convince himself of this.

The gentlemen assert that these documents, though once printed for use and preservation, are not wanted; and yet one of them has called for the second reading of a letter addressed to you, sir, by Mr. Green, the public printer, and presented to the House yesterday morning. The reading of this paper could not have been demanded for the purpose of showing what has been put forth as the main allegation, that the documents are not useful or not demanded by the public, for this individual states his belief that an edition might be disposed of to States, public institutions, &c. so as to pay the publisher without asking aid from Congress. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WICKLIFFE] says he believes he understands this, and has no doubt, when the work is published, Congress will be solicited to take some copies of it. I entertain the same opinion, for we cannot get on well without them. I therefore would not delay, to see whether this proposition is executed, and run the hazard of having it executed to our satisfaction, but would proceed at once to the business, and have the publication made under the care and supervision of our own officers, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House, as the bill provides; and if there be more copies than we have occasion for, we may easily dispose of them if the public printer is right in his opinion about the demand for the work. I think, sir, on a full view of the facts, that no reasonable doubt can be entertained of the propriety of publishing these papers anew, for the convenience of Congress and the public good demand it. An objection, however, has been made to the manner of doing it. Gentlemen ask why certain printers are designated in the bill; and there, probably, lies the great obstacle with some to the measure. We have been asked, in the apparent spirit of triumph, in the course of the debate, why are not proposals made for the lowest bidder, that we may have the benefit of competition? Sir, the bill authorizes the Clerk to subscribe for a certain number of copies, the price of which is not to exceed what we pay for the public printing. Now, I would ask in turn, if this mode of setting contracts up at auction be wise, why do we elect by ballot a public printer? Why is not that work set up for the lowest bidder, instead of being regulated by law? If I am not misinformed, men can be found, nay, men have actually made proposals, who will take it for less than the law allows; but the experience of Congress has produced the conviction, that work done by speculators is less likely to be done faithfully and with despatch, than when it is put out at a reasonable and just compensation. The rule which applies to the public printing applies to this business. It should be made under the immediate supervision of our own officers; and I can see no reason why the price should be complained of, when its maximum can never reach above what we pay the public printer. I do not feel at liberty to neglect a duty which Congress is called upon, in the most imperative manner, to perform, any longer. The publication is identified with the history, progress, and principles of this Government, and all who feel an interest in its preservation and success must acknowledge the necessity of saving the lights of experience, not only to guide us, but all who may come after us. I would not so soon forget the works of the fathers of the country, nor suffer them to be buried with their authors.

The previous question was then moved by Mr. PETTIS, and was sustained by the House.

The previous question, that is, Shall the main question be now put? was, on the call of Mr. SPEIGHT, taken by yeas and nays, and carried—107 to 77.

The main question, on the passage of the bill, was then put by yeas and nays, and carried as follows:

Mr. McDUFFIE moved to suspend the rule, to enable him to make a motion to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the resolution to amend the constitution relative to the election of President, it was understood, and bring it into the House, but there were not quite two-thirds in the affirmative, and the motion was lost.

Adjourned.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

DEATH OF SENATOR NOBLE.

A message was received from the Senate by their Secretary, notifying this House that the honorable JAMES NOBLE, a Senator of the United States from the State of Indiana, died at his lodgings in this city on the 27th instant, and that his funeral will take place this day at half past eleven o'clock A. M. Whereupon,

Mr. TEST moved the following resolution, viz.

Resolved, That the members of this House will attend the funeral of the honorable JAMES NOBLE, late a member of the Senate from the State of Indiana, this day, at the hour appointed; and as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, and wear crape round the left arm for thirty days.

This resolution was agreed to unanimously.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, it was then Ordered, That, for the purpose of attending the funeral of the late Senator NOBLE, the House will take a recess until three o'clock P. M.

And then the House adjourned to three o'clock.

THREE O'CLOCK P. M.

The House resumed its session according to adjournment.

INDIAN QUESTION.

The House resumed the consideration of the memorial from Massachusetts, presented on the 7th instant by Mr. E. EVERETT, and the motion made by Mr. EVERETT on the 14th instant, that the said memorial be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, "with instructions to report a bill making further provision for executing the laws of the United States on the subject of intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, also, for the faithful observance of the treaties between the United States and the said tribes."

Mr. BELL was entitled to the floor; but he being absent, in consequence of indisposition,

Mr. SUTHERLAND said that he had prepared himself for the discussion of this subject, and believed that he had it in his power to submit some views of it, not offered by any other gentleman; but inasmuch as no legislative action could grow out of a decision of the pending question at this late period of the session, and as the further discussion of it would consume time necessary for the transaction of other important business, he would forego his own desire to deliver his views on it, and move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. POTTER moved that there be a call of the House; which was refused, by yeas and nays, by a large majority.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, and carried by a large majority, by yeas and nays.

The engrossed bill allowing the duties on foreign merchandise imported into Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, and Natchez, to be secured and paid at those places, was read the third time, and passed.

[When this bill was under consideration on Saturday, a long discussion took place, in which Messrs. CAMBRELENG, CARSON, HUNTINGTON, WICKLIFFE, INGERSOLL, RICHARDSON, HOWARD, and WILDE, participated. A motion to lay the bill on the table was lost—the previous question was demanded and sustained—and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and to be read a third time.]

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

Mr. VINTON, from the Committee on Internal Improvements, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio," hereinafter recited, reported the same with an amendment, affecting the tolls and exemptions from tolls on the Cumberland road; which being read, a considerable debate arose; and, after the debate had continued some time,

A motion was made by Mr. SUTHERLAND, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow. This motion was decided in the negative.

The question was then put, that the House do agree to the amendment reported to the said bill, and decided in the negative—63 to 80.

Another amendment was then proposed to said bill by Mr. ANGEL; when

The previous question was moved by Mr. STANBERRY, and being carried,

The main question was put, viz. Shall the bill be read a third time? and passed in the affirmative without a division.

INDIAN TREATIES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill to carry into effect certain Indian treaties; and the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the 25th ultimo were read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE renewed the motion made by him in Committee of the Whole, to insert an appropriation of eighty thousand dollars for carrying into effect the Choctaw treaty lately ratified by the Senate.

Mr. STANBERRY objected to this, because the appropriation of last year of five hundred thousand dollars would cover this object; and a long debate arose on the subject, in which Messrs. LUMPKIN, STRONG, WILDE, POLK, McDUFFIE, WAYNE, WICKLIFFE, CAMBRELENG, LEWIS, YANCEY, and TAYLOR, joined. The amendment was modified, on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, and was agreed to; and the bill was then ordered to a third reading.

Mr. DRAYTON moved that the House take up the bill making appropriations for the Engineer and Ordnance Departments, &c.; but Mr. McDUFFIE opposed the motion, as there were items in the bill which he could not agree to, and the others were immaterial; and the motion was negatived.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for building lighthouses, lightboats, beacons, and monuments, and placing buoys; and the amendments reported thereto from the Committee of the Whole House on the 25th ultimo, were read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. YANCEY asked for the reading of the bill, but it was objected to, and refused.

Mr. DRAPER demanded the yeas and nays on the third reading of the bill, but they were refused; and,

After Mr. YANCEY had made some remarks against the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department for the year 1831; and the amendments reported thereto from the Committee of the Whole House on the 17th instant, were read, and concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. BATES, of Mass., further to amend the said bill, by adding thereto the following as an additional section, viz.

"And be it further enacted, That the annuities to the Indian nations or tribes shall be paid hereafter in the way and manner they have usually been paid since the grant thereof, or until the said nations or tribes, respectively, shall, in general council, otherwise direct."

Mr. BATES said he offered this amendment in Committee of the Whole, and in deference to the wishes of the Committee of Ways and Means; and, upon the assurance that an opportunity should be afforded in the House, he forbore then to state the grounds of it. At this late hour of the day, and late day of the session, said Mr. B., I will confine myself strictly to the point, because I do not intend to afford the slightest apology or occasion for a demand of the previous question, as I wish to obtain the judgment of the House distinctly upon the proposition involved in the amendment proposed.

Since the foundation of the Government, said Mr. B., the practice has been one and undeviating—that of paying these Indian annuities to the nations, and not to the individuals composing the nations. This Government has never intermeddled with the disbursement or distribution of them. Sometimes they have been applied by the natives, partly for the support of their Government, for the maintenance of their schools, the purchase of agricultural implements, or for any other purpose which was most pleasing to themselves. The annuity to the Cherokees has latterly been paid into the public treasury of that nation; the annuity to the Creeks has been paid to the headmen of the different towns; and the annuities to the other nations have been paid in the way and manner they thought proper to direct.

In June last an order was issued by the Executive, reversing this ancient and uniform practice. I will send the order to the Clerk, and thank him to read it. It is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
18th June, 1830.

Sir: The President directs that the practice of paying annuities to the treasurer of the Cherokee nation shall from henceforth be discontinued; and that, with a view to secure to the mass of the nation their proper proportion of such annuity, the same shall be hereafter paid in every case to the individuals respectively entitled; that is to say, to the chiefs and warriors and common Indians, and their families, in the ratio in which these several classes are entitled; where there are Indians without families, the payments are to be made to them personally, and not to their chiefs. This mode of distribution is not, under any circumstances, to be departed from.

I am, &c.

P. G. RANDOLPH,
Act. Secretary of War.

To Col. HUGH MONTGOMERY,
Cherokee Agent, Calhoun, Tennessee.

This order was not confined to the Cherokees, but, in terms, was issued to the other nations. In January last, the Cherokee delegation were informed by the War Department, "that the order referred to is not applicable to the annuities of their nation exclusively, but to those of all other tribes entitled to them."

To say nothing of the difficulty arising from the ambiguous phraseology of this order, the House perceives at once that it takes from the Indian nations the right, and assumes the burden, of distributing the Indian annuities. It makes them—chiefs, warriors, and all—the mere passive recipients of your bounty, in such proportion as the Executive may see fit to dole out to them.

But, in the first place, I would respectfully inquire, how is this order to be executed? Among whom are the annuities to be distributed? Are females to be included? Or if only males, males of what age? What is to be the ratio of distribution? The order says, "to chiefs, warriors, Indians with families, and Indians without families." Is the chief to have more than the warrior? the warrior than the Indian? or the Indian with a family more than the Indian without a family? In fixing the ratio of distribution, is rank or property to be taken into the account? Whatever course is pursued, by reason that some must die and some will be born, the House perceives that at least an annual census will be indispensable: for if these annuities are due to the people individually, and not to the nation, exact justice must be done to each. Well, sir, this somewhat difficult preliminary business being settled, let me suppose the day of payment to have arrived. The amount of the annuities exceeds by a fraction two hundred and forty-five thousand dollars. The annuity to the Cherokees is between six and seven thousand. If the distribution be made according to numbers, without reference to rank, property, or condition, each Cherokee will receive about forty cents as his share.

The annuities must, therefore, be paid in silver or copper coin, the transportation of which will be a heavy expense. The territory of the Cherokees does not vary much from two hundred by eighty miles in extent, and the agency is established in the northwest corner of it. Now, sir, let me suppose that the agent, Colonel Montgomery, has received his money, and, with his wagon or mules laden, is on his way, making his annual visitation to each member of the tribe. Perhaps it is not too much to say that he will need a guard, by night at least, if not to protect himself, to protect his treasure. But I shall be told that this is not the plan; that the agent is not to go to the people, but that the people are to come to him. Well, sir, be it so. At the time appointed, the Cherokees come to the agent, at his agency house, some of them a distance of two hundred miles—upon an average, near one hundred. Now, the first thought that occurs to the mind is, that a single share—forty cents—will not pay the expense of the journey, much less the loss of time in making it. The next is, that, for such a numerous, and, I may add, troublesome and dangerous assemblage of men, extensive provision must be made, which will add another item to the present enormous amount of our Indian appropriations. But to proceed. Few of the Indians except those who have had intercourse with the whites, have more than one name, and that has reference frequently to some living or material object. There are, for instance, many whose name, in English, means racoon, or fox, or bird. Now, sir, I will suppose that all of the same cognomen come at the same time to receive their portions of the annuity: there are three or four hundred racoons. The agent pays the senior. What sort of a voucher is he to take? The Indian cannot write: he can make the racoon mark—that is all. The others come on in succession; and, before the payment is half closed, those whose business has been despatched, disguised by new paint and new ornaments, return. Then another class, still, who have become entitled since the last census, and for whom there is no money. And then come the children of those who have died since the last census, claiming their fathers' share, and each child his share of that share. After the racoons, then come the foxes, and the birds, and all the other living things, or material objects. I venture to say that the Secretary himself, before half meridian, would throw down his money bags, and be off for Tennessee. What is to protect the agent from endless imposition? or the Indians from endless frauds? How can the agent make the payments? or, if he can, how produce the requisite vouchers? It is a plan expensive and troublesome to us; vexatious and ruinous to the Indians. This order makes the annuity a debt due to individuals: you must, in justice, therefore, see it paid to them. Hence we shall have a new class of private claims upon this Government, outnumbering all others.

But, sir, I deny the right of the Executive to make this order. These annuities are debts due to the Indians—not gratuities. They are debts for which you have the value received. You owe them. Your relation to them is that of debtor, not master. They are not only debts, but they are debts due to nations. They are recognised as such by every treaty—not as debts due to individuals, but, in terms, to nations. They are debts due nations who have a Government of their own, and want not our interposition in their affairs. The Cherokees, the Creeks, and Chickasaws are well known. The Secretary of War tells us that, in the Choctaw nation, "there are three divisions, each of which is governed by a chief, who, within his limits, acts independently of the others. In his Government he is aided by minor and subordinate chiefs, called captains, each of whom acts, within his particular sphere, distinct. The people are subordinate to the captains, the captains to the chiefs." And all the other nations have a Government of some sort—such as they choose—one that satisfies them—and this should satisfy us. Now, sir, I demand, by what right do we undertake to say that these annuities shall be paid to individuals? Might we not as well have said that the purchase money of Louisiana should be paid to the citizens of France? Or may we not as well now say that the debts due the States of this Union shall be paid, not to the order of the Government, not into the State treasury, but directly to the people? And let but the Executive send agents and subagents enough into the States, and they will find among the ignorant, the disaffected, the servile, and the sycophantic, those who will approve the measure, and, if need be, implore it. Sir, you have no right, but the right of the strongest, the right of him who puts hand upon the hilt of his sword for his proof. You have the power—the "giant's power"—that is all. Will the House hear the opinion of Mr. Jefferson upon this subject? In 1808, he spoke to the chiefs of the Upper Cherokee towns as follows:

"You complain that you do not receive your just proportion of the annuities we pay your nation—that the chiefs of the lower towns take for them more than their share. My children, this distribution is made by the authority of the Cherokee nation, and according to their own rules, over which we have no control. We do our duty in delivering the annuities to the headmen of the nation, and we pretend to no authority over them, to no right of directing how they are to be distributed."

These are the correct principles upon this subject, of which one would think the practice of this Government for forty years, independent of the terms in your bond, would be satisfactory proof as of the wisdom of which it has been a continued illustration.

Indian Affairs.

I might stop here, but I should do injustice to the claims of the Indian nations if I were to omit to state briefly the effect of this order upon them. I will not speak of its object. It is known to this House, to the country, and to the world, that the Cherokees are engaged in a most unequal conflict for their existence as a nation. They claim of the United States the execution of the Indian treaties which guaranty to them protection, and the execution of the intercourse law of 1802, in which the provisions of those treaties are embodied. Georgia has decided that these treaties, as also the law, are unconstitutional and void. The Executive has confirmed that decision, and refuses to execute them. Thus the Cherokees are abandoned to their fate. In order to try this important, and to them and to us interesting and momentous question, the Cherokees, in a case in the courts of Georgia, in which one of the tribes was put on trial for his life, for an offence committed within the jurisdiction of the Cherokee nation, caused those treaties to be pleaded, which, if constitutional, ousted Georgia of her jurisdiction of the case, and turned the criminal over to the courts of his own nation, to be punished according to the laws of his own people. The courts of Georgia decided that the treaties were unconstitutional, and condemned the prisoner to death. To bring the question under the revision of the Supreme Court of the United States—a constitutional question arising under the treaties of the United States, and therefore most appropriately to be examined and decided there—a writ of error was brought, according to the provisions of existing law, of which Georgia had notice, and which Georgia defeated by executing the Cherokee. This execution was against law, if there be any force in the Indian treaties, or in the intercourse law of 1802. Thus defeated by such an act, the Cherokees have applied to the Supreme Court for an injunction against Georgia to stay her hand. Now, permit me to pause here for a moment, and inquire, had the Cherokees declined this forum, and refused to submit this question to its decision, would not the world have said it was because they had no confidence in the justice of their cause? And yet the Cherokees might well have answered—we hold your treaties, for which we have paid you—we have parted with our land, and you hold it by virtue of them. Down to these disastrous times you have always considered them as valid, and acted upon them as valid. The Supreme Court is alien to us; we had no agency in its formation—can have no influence with nor control over it: its interest and bias will be in favor of your people, and against us. All this they might have said. Yet, in the strong confidence they feel in the truth and justice of their cause, and in the integrity, the honor, and independence of the court, they seek this reference of the question, and Georgia—declines it! Nay, she insists upon the exclusive right, in virtue of her State sovereignty, to settle this question finally and irreversibly for herself, and by her own courts, the judges of which are elected periodically by her own citizens—are imbued, I will not say inflamed, with her own feelings—swayed by her own interests, having a common share in the wheel of the lottery that is to make partition and distribution of the spoils of the nation at their bar, and against which the treaties and the laws they annul are the only interposing barrier and defence.

Against this, the Cherokees, in their weakness, can only protest, and they do protest, and claim either the execution of the treaties, or a decision of your own court upon their constitutionality. The Executive refuses the one, and Georgia opposes, and will, if possible, defeat the other. In this anomalous condition of things, it became necessary for them to employ counsel, and to incur many and heavy expenses; and when their delegation left for Washington, the Legislative Council of the Cherokee nation gave them authority to draw for such part of the annuity due from the United States, as the exigency of their case might require. I have the order before me; there is no question as to the power. They did draw, and payment was refused, and still is refused, by the Executive. At the same time, the Creek delegation have been paid so far as they needed for their expenses, and so far as the nation owed for the education of the Creek children “upon Colonel Johnson’s farm in Kentucky.” But even the Creeks, as I am well informed, were refused, until assurance was given that they were not here co-operating with the Cherokees. The House, therefore, perceives that this order cuts off, at once, the resources of the Cherokees, and as far as this Government can do it; and, at this crisis of their affairs, takes from them the means of defence, and denudes them for sacrifice. The further effect of this order will be to create a severity and individuality of interest throughout all the Indian nations, that will weaken the mutual dependence and destroy the subsisting harmony among chiefs, warriors, and people; bringing the agents and subagents of the United States into contact with every individual native, and affording them an opportunity, if they shall be base enough, to use it, to distract, confound, and break them up forever. I beg the House, therefore, to consider the nature and extent of our obligations to these tribes, and whether it is not due to justice, and to our own honor, if nothing be due to them, to interfere in their behalf, at least so far as this amendment goes.

I have thus spoken briefly of the tendency and effect of this order. Allow me to inquire, in conclusion, what necessity or occasion there is for it. The Secretary has given us the rules by which his department is governed. Some of the Choctaw nation, not satisfied with the late treaty, undertook to depose one of their chiefs, and to elect another. They gave notice to the War Department of what they had done. The Secretary informed them that “this Government means not to interfere with their manner of self-government—it cannot recognise what has been done by a few; when chosen by a majority of the division, and that fact certified by their General Council, the chief will be recognised.” Very properly the Secretary here says, that the complaints and acts of individuals cannot be regarded, and nothing short of the doings of the nation in “General Council,” duly “certified,” will form a proper basis for the action or interposition of this Government.

The opinion of Mr. Jefferson, which I have quoted, is to the same effect. Whatever complaints, therefore, may have come from individuals, or from agents or subagents this order was not issued in consequence of them. But, so far as the Cherokees are concerned, I have it in my power to say, and to prove, that no complaints have been made. In July last, the 12th day, Colonel Montgomery, the agent, understanding “that there was to be a special meeting of the General Council of the Cherokee nation,” enclosed to the chiefs a copy of the order of June, with a request “that the necessary arrangements be made by the nation for the future reception of the annuities, so that each Indian might get his share, agreeably to that order.” On the 17th July, “the representatives of all the people of the Cherokee nation, convened in General Council,” answered: “That the United States stood bound to pay the money to the nation, and not to the individuals of the nation.” As to its future reception, they say “that the nation has already made the arrangement for that in its constitution and laws; and to them the agent is referred.” That arrangement is, that the annuities shall be paid into the treasury for the use of the nation. And they enter “their solemn protest against the distribution of the annuities, in the way contemplated by the Government, as a violation of the letter and spirit of the treaties subsisting between the United States and them,” and decline making any further or other order. Of all this the agent had notice; but not knowing what complaints might have been made, the delegation addressed a letter to Colonel Montgomery, the resident agent of the United States in the Cherokee nation; to which, under date of September 20, 1830, he replies: "I will state that no complaints have passed through me to the Executive, or any other person, either from the Indians, or any other person, on the subject of the distribution of the annuities." I hold the letter in my hand. Now, sir, what reason can be assigned to justify the order of June last, or a persistence in that order? I am unable to perceive any reason for it, which will bear the scrutiny of this House. It is a wide departure from the ancient, established, and beaten way of this Government—a way safe and convenient for us—a way familiar to the Indian nations—without their consent, certainly, the only right way. I will only add, in recapitulation, that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to execute the order. That this Government has no right to issue such an order; that it will be prejudicial to the Indian nations, and particularly the Cherokees—malign in all its influences—and that it is uncalled for by any new exigency, or by any one Indian tribe, and is unjustifiable upon any principle consistent with our obligation, our convenience, or a just economy in the management of our Indian affairs.

Mr. POTTER, of North Carolina, replied at considerable length to Mr. B., and to the speech of Mr. EVERETT, on the subject; and submitted his views on various topics connected with the character and proceedings of the House, &c.

Mr. BATES again rose; but

Mr. BUCHANAN obtained the floor, and said, that at the last session of Congress he had prepared himself to discuss what has been called the Indian question. He was then called home before he had any opportunity of presenting his views upon this subject. He had again prepared himself to discuss this question at the present session, and was now ready to proceed with his argument. He believed that the act of the last session was dictated not only by the purest principles of policy and humanity, but that it presented the only means of preserving and perpetuating the unfortunate and interesting children of the forest, who had so many claims upon our protection. He had the vanity to think he could present some new views upon this subject. But the hour was now late, and there were several important bills upon the table, which, unless they could pass the House, and go to the Senate this night, would be lost. He would therefore forbear; and for the first time, as he believed, since he had been a member of this House, he would move the previous question.

The previous question was sustained, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. LAMAR now moved an adjournment. Negatived.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making an appropriation for a custom-house in the city of New York; and the amendment reported thereto from the Committee of the Whole House on the 25th ultimo was read, and concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day, (and was afterwards read a third time, and passed.)

SURVEYS, &c.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the improvement of certain harbors, and providing for surveys.

The amendment inserted in Committee of the Whole, on the motion of Mr. PEARCE, was now opposed by Mr. POLK and Mr. HOWARD, and was strenuously advocated by Messrs. BURGESS and PEARCE, and was finally concurred in without a division. In the course of the discussion, Mr. LAMAR moved to lay the bill on the table, but the motion was negatived.

The appropriation for the improvement of Back creek, (the estuary leading from the Chesapeake bay to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal,) was objected to by Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina; and he demanded the yeas and nays on it, but they were refused, and the appropriation was concurred in.

And a motion was made by Mr. LECOMPTE further to amend said bill, by adding thereto the following item, viz. "For removing certain obstructions in the Kentucky river, at the mouth of Big Benson, twelve thousand dollars;" which amendment Mr. L. made some remarks to explain and support.

The previous question was moved by Mr. HUNTINGTON, and being sustained—88 to 81,

The question was put on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and carried—87 to 75.

The bill having been engrossed, was subsequently read a third time, and passed; and (about half after 10 o'clock) The House adjourned.

The resolution to reduce the duty on sugar was again taken up, and Mr. WHITE, of Louisiana, continued his remarks in opposition to the resolution until the expiration of the hour; when his argument was again arrested.

NATIONAL ROAD IN OHIO.

The bill from the Senate giving the assent of Congress to an act of the State of Ohio for the preservation of so much of the great national road as passes through that State, by the erection of toll gates, and the application of toll to the repairs of the road, was then taken up.

Mr. DUNCAN moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on Internal Improvements, with instructions to insert the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON.]

Mr. DUNCAN said that the bill in its present shape was exceedingly objectionable, and he could not consent to its passage, without entering his solemn protest against it. He was not altogether satisfied with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, but it would, in his opinion, afford some protection to the rights of his constituents, and all those residing in the States west of Ohio, who must, if this bill passes, pay nearly all the expense of keeping the road in repair, as Ohio had, by the provisions of this bill, which she had submitted for the acceptance of Congress, and which had passed the Senate, and was now on its passage, exempted her own citizens, in nearly every possible case, from the payment of toll, and consequently taxing the citizens of other States, not only to keep the road in repair, but to pay an officer at every twenty miles. Mr. D. said that this measure must drive his constituents, and all the people west of the Ohio, from the road, as they could not and would not pay so unjust a tax, especially as the road was made by compact, and out of the funds of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, as well as those of Ohio. He thought the Legislature of Ohio was mistaken in the advantage it was to gain by exempting her own citizens from this tax, as the same policy would be adopted by Pennsylvania and Maryland, so as to make Ohio pay a portion of the tax at last; but he could see no hope for his constituents, except to tax the citizens of Missouri travelling to the Atlantic cities; and then, he said, this tax would make it impossible for his constituents to drive their stock on this road, and would render it of little or no use to them. He said that the liberal and just views expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] met his entire approbation, and he firmly believed with him, that the bill, should it pass, is calculated to destroy the road, and was, in his opinion, a covert blow aimed at the whole system of internal improvements.

Mr. MERCER supported the motion. He dwelt on the acknowledged importance and value of this great national work, and insisted that it was incredible that the House could ever mean to let it go to ruin. But the law enacted by the Legislature of Ohio contained such provisions as were calculated rather to injure than to preserve the road. All that sort of use which went to destroy it, viz. the use of wagons with narrow wheels, was to be encouraged by passing toll free, while a heavy tax was at the same time laid upon large wagons with broad wheels; the use of which consolidated the road, and ought to have been more favored than travel of any other kind. Ohio had almost exempted her own citizens from any toll for the use of the road, and had left it to be paid chiefly by the citizens of other States. Mr. M. referred to several particulars in support of the representation he had made, and contended that the act ought to be remodified before it was assented to.

Mr. IRVIN, of Ohio, was warmly opposed to the recommitment of the bill, which he insisted would be tantamount to its rejection, and before next session the road would become useless. Gentlemen seem to forget that Ohio had paid a large proportion of the money which had been already expended on this work; but how much, he would ask, had Illinois contributed? Less he believed than Ohio had paid towards making the road on this side the river. It was not to be expected the Government should continue contributing to the repairs of the road; and yet, unless it were repaired from time to time, it must go to destruction. The only system that gave any promise of saving this great national work, was the exaction of toll by the States through which the road passed.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, advocated the recommitment. He considered the arrangements of the law as it now stood to be palpably unjust. Those persons through whose property the road now ran, and whose estates had thereby been increased in value more than fifty per cent., were allowed to use the road free of toll, because they resided upon it; while those who lived in more distant parts of the State, and whose farms had, therefore, enjoyed much less of the benefit, were heavily taxed, together with citizens of other States who passed over the road.

Mr. WICKLIFFE opposed the recommitment. The argument of the gentleman last up would certainly be a very powerful one if addressed to the Legislature of his own State; but it must be well known to that gentleman that a great proportion of the members of the House denied the power of Congress to interfere on the subject of tolls in any form. For himself, he was one who admitted the power of Congress to construct a road through a State, but he denied their right to erect toll gates upon it. It was utterly vain to hope for any bill, in that House, which should regulate the tolls to be paid in Ohio; and he, therefore, was desirous that the several States through which the national road passes, might take charge of their respective portions of it. It was not probable that Ohio would persevere in any system of taxation that was palpably unjust; and if her law should prove unequal in its operation, no doubt her own sense of justice would induce her to modify it. Believing that to recommit the bill would be to destroy it, and that then the House would again be called upon for further contributions, he considered it his duty to demand the previous question.

The question being taken, it appeared that there was no quorum voting; whereupon, Mr. MERCER moved to lay the bill on the table. On this motion, Mr. ALEXANDER demanded the yeas and nays, which being taken, stood—yeas 63, nays 115.

So the motion to lay the bill on the table was lost.

The call for the previous question was now sustained; and the main question being put on ordering the bill to its third reading, it was carried—yeas 89, nays 60.

BALTIMORE & WASHINGTON RAILROAD BILL,

The bill from the Senate, authorizing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to extend a lateral railroad from Baltimore to Washington, together with certain amendments thereto, being taken up,

Mr. DODDRIDGE, chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, moved that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SEMMES, of Maryland, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee for the District.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. BROWN and HOWARD.

Mr. DODDRIDGE stated that he had examined all the amendments of the Senate, and, considering them reasonable, and in conformity with the wishes of the people of the District, thought they ought to be adopted.

Mr. TALIAFERRO professed unlimited confidence in his colleague, and great reliance on his judgment; but that, as this was the first moment in which the amendment had come to his knowledge, he thought further time should be taken to consider them, and he therefore supported the recommitment.

Mr. HOWARD opposed the motion to recommit with great earnestness. He was confident that the amendments need only to be read, to have their propriety at once perceived. They had been printed; and if the gentlemen had not read them, it was their own fault. One of the amendments went to reserve the right of Congress to pass laws hereafter for the opening of branch roads, and to regulate the speed of cars. The other, which had been inserted at the instance of the representation of the District, went to limit the termination of the road within the District, to some point between the capitol and Seventh street—instead of carrying it to the President's house or Rock creek. If any objection were made to this, it was to be expected from the corporation of Washington. But both the boards constituting that body had prayed for this restriction; and, if they consented to it, who could justly oppose it? Mr. H. expressed a fear that if the bill should be now recommitment, it would never regain its place on the calendar. He explained what had been done by the Legislature of Maryland on this subject. They had granted to the company liberty to make the road as far as the District line, on condition that it should be commenced within one year. If the present bill should be rejected, or lost by delay, the company would be left in an embarrassed situation.

Mr. SEMMES stated that he had been indisposed for some days, and had not seen the amendments. The subject was important, and excited deep interest in Maryland. It had been debated in her Legislature for several weeks. His constituents had embarked largely, both capital and credit, in the concerns of the company, and it was his duty, as their Representative, to look cautiously at whatever might affect their interest. He was in favor of the bill, but could not vote in the dark. He knew, however, that a majority of the Committee for the District differed from him in opinion, and he should cheerfully submit to any decision on the subject.

The question being then put on concurring with the Senate in their amendments to the bill, it was carried by a large majority.

THE GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate's amendments to this bill came up for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Various other amendments were considered, and agreed to without debate.

The amendment making provision for the pay of extra clerks in the Post Office Department, was then taken up, having been reported against by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CONNER said: This amendment had been made by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Senate; the evidence had not been laid before the Committee of the House; but he was authorized to say that the object of the appropriation was to meet current expenses; that there was still something due to those clerks who were employed, many of them, by Mr. McLean; and the still increasing business of the department had compelled the present able incumbent to follow the example of his predecessor, (Mr. McLean,) whose name, on being mentioned in that House, produced excitement; but he [Mr. C.] had no hesitation in saying, he had for that gentleman kind feelings, and that he was an efficient officer. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HUNTINGTON] had inquired of the committee if the department was not insolvent. He would answer that gentleman, that the Post Office Department was not only not insolvent, but that its condition was a prosperous one; that for the last eighteen months the increase for each quarter was some thirty or forty thousand dollars; and so far as the department could be informed, the increase for this quarter would be in proportion with the preceding one; and he had no hesitation in saying that the increase of the present year would exceed that of the last year by $100,000. The policy of the late Postmaster General had been to retain but little surplus on hand. It was the true policy; and the present Postmaster General had very probably pursued the same course, in returning the money received back again among the people from whom it had come, for their accommodation.

The gentleman had also made an inquiry in relation to the available funds of the department; and, on another occasion, a gentleman from New York [Mr. STORUS] had sneeringly asked what had become of the $230,000 left by Mr. McLean. He [Mr. C.] could tell the gentleman what had become of that money. There were now $148,000 of it in the department; the seventy or eighty thousand dollars of that sum used, had gone to the extension of mail facilities, and accommodation to the people and the country. Where the mails were carried on horseback, they are now carried in sulkeys or stages, and the trips increased; where the mail was received only weekly, it is now received twice in the week, on other routes three times a week, and, in many instances, daily stages were put in operation. This was asked for and required of him by the people and their representatives, and this is the way that that money has gone. Sir, whilst all your other departments were stationary, this department was annually extended, daily augmenting in business and labor, which necessarily required increased expenditures. Sir, the Postmaster General has not overreached himself, as has been insinuated; and if the House will take the trouble to reflect and examine for themselves one moment, they must see the propriety of this amendment. It is in accordance with the usual mode of paying the officers of the departments, and, in accordance with that, is this appropriation asked for. The services of those clerks employed must be paid for, and the only difference out of which fund they are paid is, that, if it be taken from the Post Office, it is so much withdrawn from mail facilities and accommodations. Sir, there was laid on your table, at an early day in the session, a bill providing for an additional number of clerks. It has not been reached, nor can it, the present session. Its passage would have superseded the necessity of this amendment. There are now in your treasury more than a million of dollars, which have been deposited there by the Post Office Department; and he would, at all times, have been willing to have appropriated from that sum an amount sufficient to have completed the mail arrangements throughout the country. The department, from its prosperous condition, would, in a very few years, have reimbursed the treasury, and more. He thought the appropriation proper, and hoped the House would not withhold it.

The question was then taken, and the appropriation was stricken out.

The item allowing compensation to Judge Cranch, for extra labor in preparing a code of laws for the District, (he having, at their request, assumed the share which was assigned to two other commissioners associated with him,) gave rise to a short discussion, in which Messrs. ELLSWORTH, DODDRIDGE, and DWIGHT explained the service which had been performed, and the equity of the claim—and Mr. MCCOY opposed the appropriation as being an unsafe species of legislation.

This amendment was agreed to.

The item providing for fees to be paid to assistant counsel employed to aid the district attorneys of the United States had been originally $2,600. The amendment recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means raised the sum to $6,000; the amendment of the Senate proposed still further to increase it to $8,000; the last sum was disagreed to, and the appropriation fixed at $6,000.

THE TURKISH MISSION.

The next amendment in order was the appropriation of $15,000, as compensation to the commissioners who negotiated the late treaty with the Ottoman Porte. The Committee of Ways and Means had recommended to strike out the amendment of the Senate which provided for this item, with a proviso going to disapprove of the appointment of the commissioners during a recess of the Senate.

Mr. VERPLANCK, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, explained the grounds on which that committee had recommended to strike out this item from the amendments of the Senate. Of the exact character of the persons to be compensated, he would not speak, as there was no distinct evidence on that subject before the House; whether they were to be understood as acting under a special commission as the personal agents of the President, or whether they were to be considered as chargés des affaires, there was no evidence on which to decide. The subject was known to have excited great warmth elsewhere; and the committee, considering the very inaccurate information submitted to them, and believing that the great question entered into by the proviso was likely, especially at so late a period of the session, to delay, and possibly endanger, the bill, and thereby injuriously to affect other great interests, had been unanimous in recommending that the whole amendment, as well as the appropriation as the proviso accompanying it, should be stricken out. The parties concerned would, he presumed, be paid either from the contingent fund, or from the secret service fund; but, if not paid at this time, they must take their chance of being provided for by the next Congress. The committee considered it an act of public duty to report against the amendment.

Mr. WAYNE observed that he found one difficulty in agreeing to the proposal of the Committee of Ways and Means. If this appropriation should be stricken out, there was no fund to which the individuals concerned could look for payment. They had rendered important services; they had been the agents in the highest act which one department of the Government could perform. He felt the force of the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] and he was, to a certain extent, constrained to acquiesce in them; but the House must make some certain provision for men who had performed an important public service. Was there no other part of the bill to which an additional appropriation might be appended, by which the object could be secured? In the estimate for the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, there was one item of $25,000. There was no proposal to strike that out; and, with a view to avoid debate, he would propose to amend the present amendment, by adding to that clause the words "and $15,000, to defray the contingent expense of foreign intercourse, heretofore incurred." The Chair decided that it was not in order to amend an amendment recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. INGERSOLL said, the gentleman could easily arrive at his object, by allowing a vote first to be taken on the present amendment. If these commissioners were to be paid at all, it should be out of the secret service fund. They had been appointed by the President, under that power of the Executive which gives him control over this fund, and, if so, they ought to be paid in that way. Mr. I. said he thought he perceived where the difficulty of the gentleman lay; the gentleman was apprehensive that the secret service fund had been exhausted. How that may be, Mr. I. said, he did not know; the gentleman no doubt knew better than he did. All that he could say was, that he thought the House ought to take a question on the point now before it, and thereby settle the question of the disputed power of the Executive.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, professed not to understand the debate. He did not know what gentlemen meant when they talked about the secret service fund being exhausted; he was completely in the dark. His colleague, from the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. VERPLANCK,] told the House that that committee had no information—another gentleman told them that the commissioners had been appointed by somebody, and that some provision would be made for them by somebody, nobody knew who. For himself, he was not in the secrets of the cabinet; neither was the House in those secrets. If any public ministers or chargés were to be provided for, let the Government send the House some information—let it send the treaties that had been made—let it tell the House who the commissioners are. For his own part, he did not find such persons enumerated among our diplomatic agents. The House was asked to act in the dark—somebody said they wanted money, but the Government had not condescended to tell the people of the United States what it was wanted for. The House had received no estimate, no report: the Government gave it no information but this—that it wanted money. The House had no facts to go upon, and he therefore hoped it would strike out the whole appropriation. The item of $25,000 for contingent expenses was intended for some other purpose, he did not know what; he hoped that would be stricken out, too, unless some further information was given. When he voted away money, he liked to do it understandingly. This sum was not for the ordinary contingent fund; if it was to be spent in presents to the Grand Turk, he should like to know the fact. He wished to know what he was doing. Were these $25,000 to be paid for gold snuff boxes, diamond headed daggers, horses, urns, or what was it for?

Mr. VERPLANCK asked his colleague, [Mr. STORRS,] whether the object of his inquiry was to obtain a list of the special contingent expenses of the Turkish legation. The present sum of $15,000 was proposed to be added to the sum of $25,000, provided for general contingent expenses. It was not usual to lay the particulars of foreign intercourse directly or indirectly before the House.

Mr. WAYNE asked gentlemen to state whether, if this article was stricken out, certain persons who had rendered public service would not be left to take their chance for being paid before next Congress; and he again asked whether there was not any other part of the bill on which an amendment could be grafted to secure the payment of agents, the value of whose public services had been acknowledged by the highest act which any Government could perform, viz. the ratification of the treaty which they had made.

Mr. McDUFFIE observed that the question now was only as to one portion of the Senate's amendment—to the remainder the gentleman might add what he pleased.

Mr. WILLIAMS inquired whether, if the House should agree to the amendment recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, and thus strike out a part of the Senate's amendment, the residue might not afterwards be stricken out.

The SPEAKER replied in the affirmative.

Mr. CONDUCT asked for a division of the question, so that it might be put first on the appropriation, and then on the proviso.

The SPEAKER replied, that, if the appropriation should be stricken out, there would remain nothing to which the proviso could adhere—the division, therefore, could not take place.

Mr. BURGESS observed that he could not see why persons who had been in the service of the country should not be paid. Why ought the appropriation to be stricken out? Did gentlemen intend that the agents of the Government should not be paid? Why not paid? Had they rendered no service? or was the service which they had rendered illegal? If they had not rendered any service, how came this clause in the bill, if the service had been rendered in an illegal or unconstitutional manner? Yet, so far as the country was bound in equity, why should not this House say, with the Senate, this does not justify us in withholding their pay? Why was the clause to be stricken out? Was any gentleman prepared to say that the President had the right, without consulting the Senate, to send abroad envoys to negotiate treaties, unless under the pressing exigencies of war? Can he consummate this act without consulting the Senate? Are we going to say that the President may not only fill a vacancy which occurs during the recess of the Senate, but that he may, without the Senate, originate any mission he pleases? Mr. B. said he had no doubt that the President could send out an agent for the purpose of examining the state of our relations with a foreign Power, but this must be done secretly. Such agents never were accredited. The President might, in this manner, discover by what means our relations with a foreign Power might be improved; but he might not appoint and send abroad high public envoys without first consulting the Senate. Mr. B. called upon all who heard him to say whether they were prepared to sanction such a power in the President of the United States. He trusted there were none. Did the House then intend to deprive these agents of their pay? Were they to be left to chance for their remuneration? Would the House indulge a disposition to employ services when they were needed, and then leave the servants to get their pay how they could? No, sir, said Mr. B.; the laborer's wages shall never sleep with me. I trust there is no man here who will vote to put these agents off to another Congress. Mr. Rhind was our consul to Odessa—he is known to be poor, and to possess nothing but what the Government gives him. He believed himself to be employed by a competent power—let us pay him for the services he performed—but let us, at the same time, take care to say that the power which employed him was not competent.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the Committee of Ways and Means had no intention of being understood as saying that these agents were not entitled to compensation for their services—the committee were unanimous in the contrary opinion; but they had failed in accomplishing the object they had in view in recommending that this item be stricken out, which was to avoid debate. They desired to present the question in such a way as might conciliate all. He agreed that the simple striking out of this appropriation might, at first view, appear like the expression of an opinion that the individuals in question are not entitled to compensation; but such was not his opinion, nor that of the committee. They were, doubtless, entitled to compensation; and if the House could provide a fund out of which they might be paid, he should be glad. He had no wish to appear as if avoiding a vote on the principle contained in the Senate's amendment, but he did wish to avoid discussion. His opinion was, and he presumed there were few but would agree with him that the President did not possess power to appoint ministers plenipotentiary during a recess of the Senate, without nominating them to the Senate at its next succeeding session. But, if he was compelled to vote, he should not hesitate to say that he was unwilling to give a vote which might be construed into a censure of the President for what he had done. He was satisfied that the affair had happened through mere oversight, without any bad intent. The Senate had deemed it proper to vindicate its own powers, by inserting the proviso. The House had no such object, and no such obligation. The Senate had now done what they desired, and what they had a perfect right to do, and he hoped that further debate would be avoided.

Mr. ELLSWORTH observed that the House was now brought back to the question which had been stated by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNES.] Certain public agents had performed important services; they had the fairest claim to be indemnified, and indemnified at this time; and, unless the House intended to compensate them in some other mode, they ought not to strike out this appropriation. If gentlemen did not like the proviso, let them strike it out; but the claim to compensation was certainly just and fair, and he could never consent to strike out a just appropriation because of the proviso that was attached to it.

Mr. DRAYTON said that he deprecated argument as much as any gentleman, and he should make none, unless he felt bound in duty to do so—he should not vote for striking out the clause, even if he thought that the appointment of the commissioners was illegal or unconstitutional. But he thought it was the exercise of a constitutional power, so far as any construction of the constitution could derive force from precedent. This was supported by numerous examples. He was not for striking out the proviso. He considered these agents as entitled to salaries. There was a fund out of which they might be paid, and therefore there was not the smallest objection to the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE, in reply to Mr. ELLSWORTH, observed, that if that gentleman's vote to strike out this clause depended on the House providing some other mode of compensation, his difficulty might easily be removed; for as soon as the House should vote to strike out this amendment, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. WAYNE] would introduce another clause to cover the same object. The question was then taken on agreeing with the Committee of Ways and Means in their proposed amendment, going to strike out the amendment of the Senate, and it was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, then moved to amend the amendment of the Senate, by striking out the $25,000 for the contingent expenses of the mission, and substituting $5,000. Mr. S. said that this $25,000, was intended to provide the tribute customarily given to the Grand Seignior, as he understood it. The old Governments of Europe may feel it their interest to procure, by these means, the friendship of the Sublime Porte. Turkey lays under tribute every nation with which she has intercourse, by her policy of requiring presents. He asked if it was proper for us, while keeping up friendly relations with Russia, without any minister at St. Petersburg, to acquiesce in this course. He considered it unsound policy, after keeping ourselves, for half a century, without associating with the politicians at Constantinople, to send a charge, when a consul would be as efficient to secure our interests. He stated that in sending a chargé we shall only make our country appear ridiculous, because, while the plenipotentiaries of other courts are admitted to the "brightness of the sublime presence," our chargé will be compelled to stand at the door among the servants and understrappers, and thus would the majesty of the American people be represented. He took a view of the accumulating expenses of the diplomatic corps since the present administration came into power, and asked if this was a redemption of the pledges given by them before they were in office. We are called on to send a chargé to disgrace the American people before all Europe, and to pay $25,000 out of our treasury for this privilege. There has been no information communicated to this House to call for this appropriation; and he would not consent to make any appropriation, without sufficient knowledge communicated in a proper manner. He had heard much of this treaty out of doors. He had heard that parts of it are very exceptionable; and it was rumored that it had not been ratified. We had been told by the President, in his opening message, of a liberal treaty with Turkey. He did not understand the term. Was it not a reciprocal treaty? He had heard that Captain Bidle had written a long letter reprobating some parts of the treaty. He had also heard of Mr. Rhind and his acts. But he desired that the treaty should be communicated to the House before the appropriation is given. He thought it necessary that we should know for what we are called on to give this money.

Mr. CARSON said it always gave him pleasure to listen to the gentleman from New York, who had just taken his seat, because of the ability which he always manifested when addressing that House. It was matter of deep regret that talents of so high an order should be enlisted on the wrong side. The powers of that gentleman were admitted by all, inasmuch that he was admitted to be capable of making any cause which he chose to adopt appear to be right, by the exertion of his elevated abilities. But, on the present occasion, Mr. C. was constrained to confess that he never heard the gentleman from New York make a speech on that floor which he himself seemed less to feel. The honorable gentleman had set out with telling the House that he was perfectly in the dark; that he could not at all understand the debate; but what a development had the House witnessed, and on what authority had it been made? The first thing the gentleman had discovered was the establishment of a new mission, which was to cost the country God knows how much. Each new minister, it seemed, was to be furnished with new snuffboxes, and every subsequent Congress was to be bound to make new and further appropriations. The ministers, too, were to make themselves ridiculous, by appearing in an inferior grade; and the gentleman's motion would go to render them still more ridiculous. The President had submitted the treaty to the Senate, and Mr. C. had understood that the treaty had been ratified with an amendment which went to strike out one offensive article. He was not sure that this was the case, but he had been so informed. In the discharge of his executive duty, the President had submitted to the Senate the propriety of establishing a diplomatic mission to the Ottoman Porte. The bill at first provided for the outfit of a full minister, but the committee (consisting of the gentleman's friends) had reduced the minister to a chargé, and had thereby afforded the gentleman an opportunity of holding up to the House a very entertaining spectacle, where our minister appeared dancing attendance out of doors among servants and drogomen, but never admitted to the brightness of the Sultan's sublime presence. The gentleman appeared to have thought a good deal on the subject, and he was sorry he had not obtained any information as to the political consequences arising from this difference of grade in our minister. Probably another agent might be needed; but that was the business of the Senate, as they had the exclusive appointment of new ministers. The gentleman from New York, if he recollected right, had advocated the Panama mission. Did the gentleman at that time ask for the instructions given to our minister? Far from it. All then was to be confidence in the Executive. The House was to repose an official confidence in the Executive. It was not its duty to ask too many questions. All was to be submitted to the Executive. Why did not the House now hear from him the same language? The gentleman had professed great ignorance; but, whatever might be his disclaimers, the House all knew full well that the gentleman was acquainted with the manner in which Turkish treaties were usually negotiated. He knew perfectly well that presents were always made by every nation who wished to maintain diplomatic relations, or obtain commercial advantages, or hold any intercourse with the Turkish court. The commercial benefits to be obtained by the present arrangement the gentleman had taken great care to throw into the shade; yet, if any commercial advantage was to be derived to the country, what city or what State of the Union was so likely to share in it as that from which the gentleman came? The city of New York, to which he understood the gentleman had lately removed his residence, being the great commercial emporium of the country, had the deepest interest in a question of this kind. The gentleman had said a great deal about paying tribute, and presenting diamond snuffboxes to an infidel Power. This language might, perhaps, take with the Dutch of New York, (to use a phrase which he had heard the gentleman employ,) and it showed the gentleman's great deference for the sense and information of his constituents. But, if the gentleman could impose upon his own constituents, it did not follow that he could, with equal ease, deceive the American people. They possess too much intelligence for such an operation. Mr. C. said that Andrew Jackson had discharged his duty. The House could not yet have the treaty laid before it, but it opened a prospect of great pecuniary advantage to the nation, from a participation in the commerce of the Black Sea. All this the gentleman well understood; and if, with the full understanding of it, he chose to take the responsibility of defeating such a measure, on him, and on those who acted with him, let it rest, and not upon Andrew Jackson, or the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WHITTLESLEY now moved that the committee rise, report progress, and have leave to sit again.

The motion was negatived—yeas 61, nays 75.

Mr. ARCHER said that he had at first meant to go into a full answer to the speech of the gentleman from New York, but he relinquished this purpose, believing that the gentleman's chief object had been to discharge a feeling; he would, therefore, confine himself to two or three remarks, by way of explanation. The gentleman had commenced by supposing that the object of this treaty was to put the country in a degrading attitude—to grant a tribute, to buy a treaty of the Sublime Porte. But such had been no part of the object. The treaty was made. It had been ratified, with the exception of one article. So far from soliciting or begging a treaty, the treaty had been made and ratified, and the object was to open commercial connexions between the United States and some of the richest countries of the old world; and the present appropriation was asked in order that our country might realize these benefits. Our interest in those seas was great and extended, and the question was, whether we ought not to have commercial agents to supervise the interests of the United States. But gentlemen ask, why not entrust this duty to our consuls? If the bill had done so, the expense would have been the same. The Government now pays our consul at Algiers $4,000; and the salary of a chargé was but $4,500. Nothing would be gained, therefore, by substituting the consul; the only difference would be, that the latter appointment would not be productive of such good effects. But to show that the gentleman would be satisfied with no conduct of the administration, and that he held it a duty to find fault, the gentleman had told the House, that, if we were to have any mission to Turkey, it ought to be an embassy extraordinary. That was what the Executive had asked for, and what the Senate had refused. If the present plan was wrong, the fault was not with the President. The gentleman had endeavored to cast ridicule on the proposition, and upon the Government of his own country. The offering of presents appeared to him an unworthy object of expenditure, and calculated to degrade the nation. But why should we be degraded by doing that which had been done, at all times, by all Governments that had any connexion with the Ottoman Porte?

If it was good that we should hold commercial relations with the boundless territories of the Turk, (relations which had heretofore extended but a short distance around Smyrna,) was the country to refuse this advantage, because the gentleman from New York thought it degrading to make presents to the Grand Seigneur, to the amount of $25,000? If we held such an opinion, we should be the only Power who thought so; all other nations have acted otherwise. If the country was to have political and commercial relations with the Porte at all, it could no more have them without presents than without ministers. No minister would have been received, nor permitted to open his credentials, till he had offered the customary presents. This Government once received a mission from a Turkish Power, and we paid the ambassador a regular stipend every week, although he came only to make an apology for a threat which had been uttered by his country against ours. We paid all the expenses of his embassy, and allowed him $200 per week during his stay. Was that expenditure considered extravagant then? Was the country, for such a reason, to refuse the apology of a foreign Power, and thereby to avert the necessity of a war? Mr. Jefferson was wiser than that. The long and the short of this matter was, that here were presented to us real and great commercial advantages. Extensive regions, among some of the richest on the globe, were about to be opened to the United States. We were to hold commercial relations with all the countries round the Black Sea; and we were to have this advantage in the most economical form—at the expense of maintaining a single chargé. As to the other items, they were merely the necessary appendages of such a mission. A drogoman and presents were matters of course at the court of Turkey. If the House thought with the gentleman from New York, let them abolish the treaty; if not, let them make the appropriation.

Mr. STORRS replied; when

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. STORRS, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. WAYNE then moved the amendment he had before proposed, viz. to insert after the item of $25,000, the following:

“And $15,000 for defraying the expenses of foreign intercourse heretofore incurred.”

The amendment was adopted—yeas 70, nays 65.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved to insert the proviso, but the motion was rejected—yeas 62, nays 100.

Mr. DRAYTON moved an item of $1,500 dollars for the salary of a student of languages, but the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended on motion of Mr. WAYNE, was then agreed to, and the debate closed. The committee then rose, and reported the amendments to the House.

Mr. VANCE moved for a division of the question on the amendment which had been so long debated in committee.

Mr. WICKLIFFE explained, the state of the question, and showed that, as an appropriation to the same amount, and for the same object, had been inserted in another part of the bill, unless the present clause should be stricken out, the bill would have two appropriations, of $15,000 each, for the pay of the same persons.

Mr. VANCE said that his object in having the question divided was, that a separate vote might be taken, by yeas and nays, upon the proviso.

The SPEAKER said that the question should be divided, inasmuch as the proviso was so worded as to relate to the whole bill, and there would, therefore, be something for it to stand on, should the appropriating clause be stricken out.

Mr. MERCER explained, and, advertng to the course which had been pursued in Committee of the Whole, insisted that the amendment which had been inserted was different from that in view of which the appropriation and proviso were stricken out; so that gentlemen could not vote in the House as they had voted in committee.

The CHAIR replied that the House had adopted the amendment, and had no power to retrace the step.

The question was accordingly divided, and, being put on the appropriating clause, it passed in the affirmative.

The question then recurring on striking out the proviso of the Senate,

Mr. MERCER failed in an attempt to modify it.

And the yeas and nays, having been demanded by Mr. VANCE, and ordered by the House, were taken, and stood as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Angel, Archer, Barringer, James Blair, Bockee, Boon, Borst, Brodhead, Brown, Cambreleng, Carson, Claiborne, Clay, Conner, Crawford, Crocheron, Daniel, Davenport, Deberry, Denny, Drayton, Dudley, Earl, Findlay, Ford, Gilmore, Gordon, Hall, Halsey, Harvey, Haynes, Holland, Hoffman, Howard, Hubbard, Thomas Irwin, William W. Irvin, Jarvis, Richard M. Johnson, Cave Johnson, Kennon, Perkins King, Lamar, Lea, Leavitt, Lent, Lewis, Loyall, Lumpkin, Magee, Thomas Maxwell, McCreery, McCoy, McDuffie, McIntire, Miller, Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Patton, Pearce, Pettis, Polk, Potter, Sanford, Scott, Wm. B. Shepard, Aug. H. Shepperd, Shields, Smith, Speight, Ambrose Spencer, Richard Spencer, Stephens, Sutherland, Taylor, John Thomson, Trezvant, Tucker, Wayne, Wilde.—83.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Armstrong, Arnold, Barnwell, Bayler, Beekman, Butman, Campbell, Childs, Chilton, Coke, Cooper, Coulter, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crockett, Creighton, Desha, Draper, Eager, Ellsworth, George Evans, Horace Everett, Finch, Gauthier, Gurley, Hawkins, Hodges, Hughes, Hunt, Huntington, Johns, Lecompte, Lyon, Martindale, Lewis Maxwell, Mercer, Nuckolls, Overton, Pierson, Reed, Rencher, Richardson, Russell, Stanbery, Swift, Taliaferro, Test, Vance, Varnum, Vinton, Washington, Whittlesey, Edward D. White, Williams, Yancey.—57.

So the House agreed with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the proviso which the Senate had inserted, and which is in the words following:

"Provided always, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as sanctioning, or in any way approving, the appointment of these persons, by the President alone, during the recess of the Senate, and without their advice and consent, as commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Ottoman Porte."

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

The House then took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the Senate for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania, proposed the following section as an amendment thereto:

"And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of repairing the Cumberland road east of Wheeling."

Mr. CRAWFORD, of Pennsylvania, rose in opposition to the amendment. He said the amendment proposed was of general concern, as regarded the preservation of the great public work to which it related. This, said Mr. C., must be a desirable object with all; no gentleman surely wishes the destruction of this monument, at once of the liberality of his Government, and of the fidelity with which its engagements are fulfilled. But, important as the proposition is conceded to be, in this view of it, as well as from the large amount, its real magnitude is only perceived when we look at it in reference to its effect on the future internal improvement of the country, as it may be decided the one way or the other.

Do you believe, sir, that if roads and canals are to be sustained at the expense of the treasury, they will be extended or long continued?

If the United States are to repair as well as to make, my word for it, they will soon cease to make. If this Cumberland road system is to be persevered in, and annual calls are to be made upon the treasury for the repair of public works, we shall soon have funds for no other purpose. How many of these projects have been already submitted for consideration? How many are every day originating and bringing forth? They can scarcely be reckoned; but if you take one in many of them, as advisable or fit, and calling for the exercise of the United States' power, you will soon have as many as your treasury can sustain, and the funds which should be applied to the extension of their benefits, by laying down and constructing others, will be exhausted in preserving those which have been already made. Is any forecast required to see that this course will be destructive to the whole system of internal improvement, and that those opposed to it will find it more effectual in checking and finally arresting this country in her rapid strides to the most prosperous condition, than any other legislation likely to take place here? The road from Cumberland to Wheeling is one hundred and thirty miles long. What will be required for its repair when it shall have reached Jefferson? that is, I believe, its name—the seat of Government of Missouri, however, is the place I mean. If I were the enemy, as I am the friend of internal improvement, I would desire no surer mode of undermining the system—no more, ultimately, and at no distant day, fatal course, to be pursued in relation to it. This policy is now popular with a large proportion of this nation; I mean when properly pursued; when the power that has been consecrated by time, and the opinions of the fathers of whatever is valuable in this Government, its history or administration, is put forth for great, leading, and national purposes, and judiciously drawn into operation even for them. But popular as this policy, so pursued, undoubtedly is with a majority of those by whose authority we stand here, it must, it will soon cease to be so if funds are continually demanded, not to construct roads and canals, but to preserve from ruin and decay those which have been, or those which shall have been made, at an immense expense of treasure, instead of drawing the means of support from the accommodation which they afford the traveller. Already has this system of treasury depletion been pursued too far; even now it is the subject of complaint. What will be the effect of it, when you shall have communications from north to south, and not one, but many avenues from east to west? It will require the revenue of the Government beyond its necessary and ordinary wants, if dissatisfaction is not created with, and a consequent abandonment does not take place of this wise and hitherto popular policy. Nothing that its enemies can do will half so much endanger it, as these preserving and repairing appropriations. I call upon the friends of internal improvement to take their stand now, unless they wish to retard or prevent its further progress. So long as you continue to grant these appropriations for repair, so long will the erection of gates upon any plan be declined or refused.

I have been informed by honorable gentleman, whose service here has been of some length, that repeated pledges have been given that each of several appropriations should be the last; and that of the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars, granted on the 3d day of

The Cumberland Road.

March, 1829, it was particularly said it should be the last; and yet, within a shorter time than one year, and at the very next session of Congress, we are asked for another one hundred thousand dollars, and a bill reported for them. And here I will ask, why has this bill, reported at the last session, not been acted on? Why has it been suffered to sleep upon this table? Is it because it was too weak to stand alone? I do not affirm that this was the consideration which governed those who had it in charge; but, now and forever, I protest against the practice of attaching to appropriations that are deemed indispensable, propositions of weak or doubtful policy—of making a nucleus of what almost all approve, to which to append measures that cannot sustain themselves. Are we thus to proceed forever?

It may not be amiss to take a retrospect, and see what the repair of this Cumberland road has cost within the seven years preceding 1830. No less a sum than one hundred and seventy one thousand two hundred and fifty-nine dollars.

February 28, 1823,	-	-	-	$25,000
March 2, 1827,	-	-	-	510

May 31, 1830,	-	-	-	15,000
				$171,259

And of this sum, fifteen thousand dollars, granted the 31st day of May, 1830, besides two smaller sums previously given, were extracted from us by considerations of humanity for the contractor, whose expenditure exceeded by so much the sum placed at his disposal. I will here remark that these repairs must be most injudiciously conducted, for I presume the grant of one hundred thousand dollars, in 1829, must have been made on some friendly estimate; and yet, after it has been expended with fifteen thousand dollars more, we are called on for another sum of like amount. How large an expenditure within so short a period! More than one-tenth of what the road originally cost, and almost equal to one-fourth of what it should have cost, or what much better roads have been since made for; and yet this work is now in a worse condition than that in which it was before one dollar was expended in its repair, as I have learned from the best authority. It will never be in a better situation for the refusal of an appropriation. The argument of the necessity of putting it in thorough repair, before you collect tolls upon it, will be always in your way. Let those who advocate internal improvements consider how much they put the whole system to hazard by such measures, and that the adoption of this amendment will be fostering and cherishing this road, at the expense of other sections of the country having equal claims upon the notice of the Government. The fountain will afford an abundant supply, and the stream be copious and strong, diffusing fertility and exuberance throughout its course, provided you maintain its embankments, and preserve them so firm and hard that the water cannot waste and sink through fissures, and escape by rivulets; but if your inattention suffers its diversion at various points, it becomes so sluggish and weak as to be unequal to the purposes which it would otherwise answer. So if the treasury is made to bleed at every pore, for the purpose of supporting our public works, the funds which might be adequate to the embellishment and irrigation of the country by means of roads and canals, will, perhaps, be unequal, under any system of expenditure that the public agents have heretofore adopted, to the repair of those which have been made. The sums that will be asked for preservation would make much original improvement, if judiciously and economically expended. It is worthy of note, that the sum granted in 1829, and that now asked, are severally larger than any appropriation for the construction of this road between 1806, when it was first authorized, and 1813. They are as follows:

March 29, 1806,	-	-	-	$30,000
February 14, 1810,	-	-	-	60,000
March 3, 1811,	-	-	-	50,000
May 6, 1812,	-	-	-	30,000

Nay, sir, they are each larger than the sum provided by the very bill to which this amendment is proposed, for the continuation of this road in Indiana—larger than that proposed for the same purpose in Illinois, and equal to the sum named for Ohio, west of Zanesville, as appears by the following abstract of its provisions:

For Indiana,	-	-	-	$60,000
For Illinois,	-	-	-	60,000
West of Zanesville,	-	-	-	100,000

Let us, then, at once, refuse this appropriation, and authorize the erection of gates to collect toll, for present and future repair; thus shall we oblige those who use the road to preserve it—economize funds for other, and, if not equally valuable, certainly very valuable and desirable improvements, and retain for the system the strength and support of public opinion. Is this unjust to those who are specially interested in the road or use it? Is there any other facility for travel or transportation in the country, that is not so burdened, and to a much greater extent than will be required here? How are your State or corporation roads and canals supported? By tolls, which must be so high as not only to preserve and repair, but to furnish funds for the payment of dividends to stockholders, or the interest of money borrowed for their construction. Here all that is required is to repair; and a reasonable toll will repair present dilapidations, and be equal to future preservation. To this you must come; you had better do it now. Pursue the course I advise, and, in addition to the other reasons that abundantly justify the step, you will do justice to the public and private avenues to the West that come into competition with this road. They are compelled to collect heavy tolls, and enter into a very unequal struggle with this favorite, and perhaps deservedly favorite structure, which so far has been free of charge.

Sir, a persistence in this course will not only paralyze and ultimately check improvement by United States' means, but its tendency is to discourage private and State effort for the extension of those communications which add so much to the beauty, so much augment the strength, and multiply the resources of any country. Can corporations or joint stock companies invest their moneys in enterprises which must compete for business and use with those that are regulated on the free trade plan? Can States even, in the ordinary condition of their revenues, engage in the constructing of roads and canals without reckoning upon interest for the sums so embarked? And what hope can they have of its receipt, if the United States shall continue to lay down as good, perhaps better, means of intercourse, to which resort can be had without expense. Justice, then, to States, to corporate bodies, and to individual interests, calls upon you to change your course. Shall my money be taken to construct a road that may be worn, out free of charge, to the destruction of an investment that I have made elsewhere under State permission? Refuse a further grant of money; erect, or allow to be erected, toll gates, and you will thus aid the great cause of internal improvement, and preserve for it the only foundation upon which it can long rest—the favorable opinion of our constituents; you will at least not throw any obstacles in the way of enterprise from other quarters, and will act justly by those exertions which have been successfully made elsewhere.

I again entreat the House to pause and reflect before this appropriation for repair is granted. Those honorable gentlemen who favor the improvement of the country may rest assured that if this wasteful course is persevered in, this eternal drain upon the treasury, it will go further and faster to undermine this now favorite policy, than any thing else which can be said or done. One hundred thousand dollars granted the session before the last, on a condition, at least so understood by many, that more would not be again asked—expended with fifteen thousand dollars more, paid by us in May last—and now we are, and last year were, importuned for another one hundred thousand dollars. This road, first and last, has cost a prodigious sum of money, as is shown by the exhibit submitted. The road from Cumberland to Wheel-

Besides which, it is estimated that the expense of it^s contemplated construction from Vandalia, in Illinois, to Jefferson, in Missouri, will be one million of dollars.

To the appropriations for making roads, that are proper objects for General Government effort, I go cheerfully and willingly, though I do not always think that the money is prudently or economically expended. Upon this system of repair, I will not enter at all. For any constitutional method of raising toll, preferring one mode to another, but preferring any to none, I will vote; but I cannot consent to wither a system so exuberant with good—to dry up a fountain, whose waters, if not scattered and thrown upon the ground where they cannot be gathered, are sufficient to refresh and invigorate us all. In one word, I will not aid this lavish expenditure of money—this squandering of it, might I not say, upon a single object, to the exclusion of others requiring, perhaps not in so great a degree, but still requiring the assistance of the Government. This subject might be pursued at great length, but I have too much respect for the House, and I will add, too much self-respect, on this the last business day of the session, to obtrude myself further upon its notice.

Mr. McCREERY, of Pennsylvania, said that although he would, under different circumstances, feel himself bound to take notice of some of the arguments of his friend and colleague, [Mr. CRAWFORD,] yet he could assure the House that he did not intend to make a speech. He said that he would merely observe that, unless the appropriation now asked for be granted, the road would inevitably go to ruin; and the only question to be determined was, whether it was the true policy of the Government to grant an appropriation to repair the road, and adopt some measure for its permanent preservation, or to abandon this great national work, and lose all that has been heretofore expended, and thus deprive the people and the Government of all the advantages contemplated in the construction of this road. He said he was sorry that his colleague had considered it his duty to oppose this appropriation. He would not say that he was influenced by any considerations of interest which he may have in a certain road in Pennsylvania, for he could not believe that any member of Congress would be actuated by such selfish principles; yet it was somewhat strange that the only opposition in Pennsylvania came from that quarter. It was not for him, he said, to give the reason; he presumed the gentleman had one, satisfactory to himself. He said his colleague appeared to be in favor of erecting gates; but he would ask him, what would be the use of gates on a road that could not be travelled? And unless an appropriation should be now made, that would be the case with this road in a short time. Those who feel an immediate interest in the road do not object to gates, and the collection of so much toll as will keep the road in repair in future; but until it is improved, toll could not be collected, were gates now on the road. By refusing the appropriation, you deprive us of the only means left of preserving the road in future. He begged of the House to consider the situation in which this part of the Cumberland road was placed; it was locked up from the respective States, in the hands of the General Government; so that if the States through which it passes were disposed to repair it, they have not the power. All we ask is, that the General Government put the road in such repair as will justify the collection of toll, and we have no objection to making the travel keep it in repair in future. He said that he had promised that he would not detain the House with a speech; and he would only express a hope that the House would not deprive the public of this useful and important road, but would grant the small sum now asked for, which was indispensably necessary to preserve the road from utter ruin.

The amendment was negatived, and the bill was reported to the House.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.

Mr. POTTER, from the select committee on the rules of the House, reported a resolution directing the arrangement and printing of the existing rules, and the designation of such as clash with each other. To this Mr. MERCER proposed an amendment, which went to modify the operation of the previous question, so as to enable it to be put without (as at present) excluding all pending amendments; but the report and amendment were, on motion of Mr. CONDUCT, laid upon the table.

Mr. WHITE proceeded with his speech on the sugar bill till he was arrested by the expiration of the allotted hour, and an additional half hour allowed by a vote of the House.

[Mr. RENCHER was opposed to the suspension of the rule at this late hour of the session. There was no possibility of legislating on the subject at this session, and the only object of discussion at this time was to produce effect elsewhere. He, therefore, hoped, if the House should agree to suspend the rule, it would be an indefinite suspension for a general discussion, and not for the accommodation of any one member. Mr. R. said he had been very anxious to embark in this debate, and should now be glad of an opportunity of replying to the argument of his friend from Louisiana, if he could do so without setting aside, and thereby sacrificing, important measures that were pressing upon the attention of the House. The rule was suspended, however, and Mr. WHITE concluded his speech, the whole of which is embodied in the preceding pages.]

THE CUMBERLAND ROAD.

This bill coming up, Mr. IRWIN, of Pennsylvania, renewed the motion he made yesterday in committee, to add a section appropriating one hundred thousand dollars for the repair of the road east of Wheeling. He supported his motion by a short speech explaining the facts of the case, and adverting to the new policy adopted by Ohio and Pennsylvania for the preservation of the road by the erection of toll gates.

Choctaw Treaty.—Fortifications.—Trade to Danish Islands.

[H. OF R.]

The amendment was again opposed by Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. LETCHER explained in reply—briefly urging that, unless the road was to be abandoned, the amendment must prevail. The same ground was taken by Mr. McCREERY, to whom Mr. DENNY replied; when the amendment was rejected—yeas 53, nays 94.

Mr. PETTIS'S amendment, proposing $10,000 for extending the road west of Vandalia, shared the same fate; as did another offered by Mr. DUNCAN, proposing $5,000 for a different route in the same quarter, by the intervention of the previous question, on motion of Mr. POLK.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading—yeas 78, nays 67; and was subsequently passed by yeas and nays—yeas 89, nays 66.

On motion of Mr. VERPLANCK, the House agreed to the request of the Senate for a conference on the general appropriation bill; and Messrs. VERPLANCK, WHITE, of New York, SPENCER, of New York, WAYNE, and DRAYTON, were appointed a committee on the part of the House.

CHOCTAW TREATY.

The military appropriation bill was next considered in Committee of the Whole, Mr. CONDIOT in the chair.

The amendment which went to appropriate $80,000 for the expenses of the Choctaw treaty, out of the treasury, and not out of the sum of $500,000 appropriated by the Indian bill of last year, being read,

Mr. BELL explained, and strenuously advocated the amendment, answering several queries of Mr. VINTON, in relation to the expenditure of part of the appropriation of last year.

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the amendment, insisting that the $500,000 of last year was intended to cover the expenses included in this sum.

Mr. STORRS took similar ground, and quoted the Indian bill in support of his position, comparing the treatment of the House by the Executive to the child's play of "shut your eyes and open your mouth."

Mr. POLK replied, contending that the House had abundant light, and insisting that the objects of this appropriation never were contemplated when the $500,000 were granted by the bill of last year.

Mr. HUNTINGTON further quoted the law, and argued to show that the objects now proposed might be paid for out of the sum in that law; and whether or not, the House might now so direct.

Mr. BURGESS earnestly argued on the same side.

Mr. WICKLIFFE advised that no reply be made, as the speeches would avail nothing, save for political effect.

Mr. BELL replied, insisting on the distinct character of the objects now asked for; arguing, with great warmth, to show that the President would have violated the act of last session if he had applied the money then given him to the objects of education, farming utensils, rifles, council houses, &c. comprised in the present appropriation, and then the gentleman would have taken opposite ground, and cried out autocracy, &c., and repelling the ideas suggested by Mr. BURGESS, that the fund in the hands of the President was to be reserved as a treasure for bribery.

Mr. STORRS replied, and explained.

Mr. WHITTLESEY remonstrated against the consumption of time in this debate.

Mr. WILDE demanded the question, and threatened a full discussion should the debate be further pursued.

The question was taken accordingly, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 93; so the House concurred, and the clause was stricken out which takes the $80,000 out of the $500,000 of last year.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The next bill considered in Committee of the Whole was that for fortifications. The Senate's amendment, which gives $200,000 instead of $100,000 towards arming the forts, was advocated by Mr. DRAYTON.

Mr. YANCEY opposed the amendment, as did Mr. REED, on the ground that the contracts were unfavorable, and the ordinance might be furnished thirty per cent. cheaper; and Mr. TUCKER, on constitutional grounds. Mr. WILLIAMS inquired if the contracts were advertised for. Mr. REED stated there was a monopoly. Mr. DRAYTON dissented from this statement; when, the question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The committee then rose, and reported the bills. On concurring with the committee on the disputed amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, Mr. ELLSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, stood—yeas 92, nays 72.

So the House concurred, and the clause was stricken out.

Mr. VERPLANCK, from the committee of conference, reported a unanimous agreement of that committee in the following compromise: to strike out all the specifications of items of expense of the negotiation with the Ottoman Porte, and inserting the following in lieu thereof: "For the contingent expenses of foreign intercourse, in addition to the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars herein-after appropriated, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars." This report was agreed to.

And the House then adjourned to half past six o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

TRADE TO DANISH ISLANDS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the message from the President of the United States, transmitting the correspondence between the Danish minister and the Secretary of State, concerning the commerce between the United States and the island of St. Croix, made the following report; which was read, and laid on the table:

"The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the correspondence between the Danish minister and the Secretary of State, concerning the commerce of the United States with the island of St. Croix, make the following report:

"The Danish minister represents that the produce and manufactures of the United States have been uniformly admitted into the island of St. Croix, without duty, or at very moderate rates, and that the vessels of other countries have been excluded. The navigation of the United States has been permitted by Denmark to enjoy the almost entire monopoly of her colonial commerce. While that Government has extended to us these advantages, the Danish minister complains that we have augmented our duties upon the produce of the island of St. Croix, so much as to render it impossible for the planter to pay for his supplies; and that unless some change should be made, the commerce of that island must, of necessity, be driven into some other channel.

"The committee have also before them a memorial of American citizens, interested directly and indirectly in the plantations of St. Croix, sustaining the representation of the Danish minister. To revive this branch of commerce, the minister proposed certain commercial arrangements, which were declined by the President, as they were founded upon concessions of an exclusive character. At the request of the minister, the correspondence was referred to Congress.

"The following proposals were offered by Denmark:

1. "That, in the intercourse of the island of St. Croix with foreign countries beyond the West Indian seas, no foreign ships but those of the United States shall be admitted to an entry at the custom-houses of the island, nor suffered to export produce thence; (the whole trade of the island will thus be reserved to the Danish and American flags.)
2. "That Indian corn and Indian corn meal, imported

Importers of Salt.—Suspension of Rule.

into the island of St. Croix from the United States, shall be subject to no duty whatever; (this article amounts to nearly twenty thousand puncheons annually;) and

3. "That all other articles, without any limitation whatever, shall be allowed to be imported into the island of St. Croix from the United States, subject to such duties only as by this arrangement shall be agreed upon, and which shall not exceed five per cent. ad valorem on certain articles, considered necessities, or of general use and consumption, as flour, salted provisions of any kind, butter, cheese, tallow, candles, fish oil, oil of turpentine, live stock, and horses, staves, hoops, headings, shingles, boards and deals of all descriptions, and all sorts of manufactured goods of the coarser kind, whether made from wood, metals, wool, or cotton, and not exceeding ten per cent. ad valorem on all other articles coming more properly under the denomination of luxuries, as furnitures, carriages, gigs, &c.

"The concessions were, however, proposed only upon condition that the United States would also concede exclusive advantages to the commerce and navigation of St. Croix, including a provision that the produce of that island should be admitted into this country at lower rates of duty than might be levied upon similar productions of other countries.

"The friendly policy of Denmark, and the recent manifestation of her justice towards this country, should recommend any proposition of hers to our most favorable consideration. But with every disposition to receive these proposals in a spirit of mutual liberality, the committee discover too many and substantial objections to any arrangement of the character proposed. It has always been our wise policy to offer equal commercial advantages to all nations, and to entangle ourselves with no embarrassing arrangements with any country; granting privileges denied to other countries, and establishing discriminating duties in favor of the productions of particular nations, which are not offered to all. The committee deem it impolitic to enter into any exclusive arrangements, even were they not restrained from recommending any such measure, by our obligations to other nations. Our duties on the productions of St. Croix are undoubtedly too high to admit of a mutually profitable exchange in our commerce with that island. We may, however, indulge the hope that some modification of our imposts may follow the redemption of our public debt, which will be more favorable to the productions of an island which, from its vicinity to our continent, may be almost considered a commercial appendage of the United States. But whatever measure we may adopt, should be of a general character, operating with a just equality on our commerce with all nations. The committee, therefore, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the correspondence."

IMPORTERS OF SALT.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act to reduce the duty on salt," when a motion was made by Mr. McDUFFIE to strike out the second and third sections of the said bill; which motion he subsequently withdrew.

A motion was then made by Mr. MILLER to amend the said bill, by inserting, in the second section thereof, these words: "And which still remains unsold by the importer or importers thereof;" so as that salt which has been put into custom-house stores, under the bond of the importer, and remained under the control of officers of the customs on the 31st December, 1830, and which still remains unsold by the importer or importers thereof, shall be subject to no higher duty than if the same were imported after the 31st December, 1830.

And, after debate on this amendment, it was,

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESEY,

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to an act granting the right of pre-emption to settlers on the public lands, approved the 29th day of May, 1830;" and, after debate on an amendment reported thereto by the Committee on the Public Lands, it was,

On motion of Mr. HUNT,

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

Subsequently Mr. HUNT moved to reconsider this order; which motion to reconsider was also laid on the table.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the several laws for the sale of the public lands;" and, after debate on the said bill, it was,

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS,

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

Several other bills were laid on the table, and many others passed and disposed of in different ways.

SUSPENSION OF RULE.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the 17th joint rule of the two Houses, which declares that "no bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approval on the last day of the session," be suspended.

The SPEAKER (Mr. McDUFFIE at this time officiating) decided that under the rules of the House it was not in order for the Committee on Enrolled Bills to make report at this period of the day of any matter, except the examination and presentation of enrolled bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND appealed from this decision, on the ground that, by the 105th rule of the House, it is declared that "it shall be in order for the Committee on Enrolled Bills to report at any time."

And the question was put, without debate, on the appeal, when the SPEAKER's decision was affirmed.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to regulate the foreign and coasting trade on the Northern and Northwestern frontiers of the United States, was read, and adopted.

[The amendment of the Senate extends the provisions of the bill to the trade on the Northeastern frontier of the United States.]

The bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Thomas Worthington came up; and upon this bill a long and animated debate arose. It was principally opposed by Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, and advocated by Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia.

It was finally ordered to be read a third time, by yeas and nays—yeas 55, nays 52.

The bill was then, accordingly, read the third time, and the question was stated from the Chair, that it do pass.

Upon this question the debate was again renewed with great earnestness, between Mr. ELLSWORTH and Mr. FOSTER. Mr. CREIGHTON also earnestly advocated the bill. It was opposed also by Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. CHILTON, the latter of whom moved that the bill be laid on the table; which motion was lost—yeas 52, nays 57.

The debate was again resumed; during the course of which it was suggested that a quorum was not present.

And then, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, a call of the House was ordered; and the roll having been called, one hundred and thirteen members answered to their names, which being more than a quorum, further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

And some gentleman having announced that the Senate had adjourned,

The House then also adjourned at half past three o'clock in the night, between the 2d and 3d of March.

[H. OF R.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

After sundry reports,

Mr. DWIGHT moved the following resolution, viz.

Resolved, That the 17th joint rule be suspended, with the concurrence of the Senate, so far as to allow the bills of this House, which were passed or acted upon yesterday, as also the bill making appropriations for building lighthouses, lightboats, beacons, monuments, and placing buoys, the bill for the relief of Percis Lovely, and the bill from the Senate for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Thomas Worthington, deceased, to be finally acted upon, and presented to the President of the United States.

This resolution was read, when a message was received from the Senate, notifying the House of the passage by the Senate of a resolution of similar import, and asking concurrence.

The resolution was then read, and concurred in by the House.

And then the amendments of the Senate to the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for building lighthouses, lightboats, beacons, monuments, and for placing buoys;" and

The amendments of the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Percis Lovely," were read, and, being considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, were concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. POLK, that the rule of the House which allots one hour for the making reports and the presentation of resolutions, be suspended for the remainder of the session.

And the question being put, two-thirds of the members present did not vote in the affirmative, and the question was therefore decided in the negative.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. CARSON rose (Mr. McDUFFIE temporarily occupying the chair) and said, the House of Representatives of the twenty-first Congress had met for the last time; and when we separate to-day, said he, many of us will have parted to meet no more forever. My heart admonishes me that this is a fit occasion for us to offer up all our animosities upon the altar of peace, kindness, and good will. In rising, sir, to perform a last act of legislative duty upon this occasion, I do it the more willingly, and with the more pleasure, because, while it is an act of justice, it is an act of friendship.

I ask leave to introduce the following resolution, which I hope will be unanimously received and adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable ANDREW STEVENSON, Speaker, for the dignity, impartiality, promptitude, and ability, with which he has discharged the duties of the chair during the present session.

RAISING OF SILK.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred a letter to the Speaker from Count Fontaniellere, of Paris, accompanied with a translation of a treatise by Count Dandolo, on the art of cultivating the mulberry, by Count Vevu, and also observations by Count Fontaniellere on two different varieties of mulberries, by leave of the House reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to answer, in behalf of the House, the aforesaid letter, and to express the acknowledgments of the House for this manifestation of the interest taken by distinguished foreigners in the welfare and prosperity of the United States, and that the said books be placed in the public library.

The said resolution was read.

And on the question, Will the House agree thereto?

It passed in the affirmative.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. MERCER moved to suspend the rule, to enable him to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to renew and to prosecute from time to time such negotiations with the several maritime Powers of Europe and America, as he may deem expedient, for the effectual abolition of the African slave trade, and its ultimate denunciation, as piracy, under the law of nations, by the consent of the civilized world.

And on the question shall the rule be suspended,

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 36.

The said resolution was then received; and, after debate thereon,

The previous question was moved by Mr. POLK; and being demanded by a majority of the members present,

The said previous question was put, viz. Shall the main question be now put?

And passed in the affirmative.

The main question was then put, viz. Will the House agree to the said resolution?

And passed in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anderson, Angel, Arnold, Bailey, Barber, Barringer, Bates, Beckman, Bockee, Borst, Brodhead, Burges, Butman, Cahoon, Campbell, Childs, Condict, Cooper, Coulter, Cowles, Craig, Crane, Crawford, Creighton, Crocheron, Crowninshield, Davenport, John Davis, Denny, De Witt, Dickinson, Draper, Drayton, Dwight, Eager, Earll, Ellsworth, George Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Findlay, Finch, Fry, Gilmore, Grennell, Halsey, Hammons, Harvey, Hawkins, Hemphill, Hodges, Holland, Hoffman, Howard, Hubbard, Hunt, Huntington, Ibrie, Thomas Irwin, Jarvis, Johns, R. M. Johnson, Kendall, Kincaid, Perkins King, Adam King, Leavitt, Lecompte, Leiper, Letcher, Lyon, Magee, Martindale, McCreery, McDuffie, Mercer, Miller, Mitchell, Muhlenberg, Pearce, Pettis, Ramsey, Reed, Richardson, Rose, Scott, W. B. Shepard, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Semmes, Sill, Smith, Ambrose Spencer, Richard Spencer, Stanbery, Sterigere, William L. Storrs, Strong, Sutherland, Swift, Taliaferro, Taylor, Test, John Thomson, Tracy, Tucker, Vance, Varnum, Verplanck, Vinton, Washington, Weeks, Whittlesey, C. P. White, Edward D. White, Williams, Wilson, Young.—118.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alexander, Barbour, Barnwell, James Blair, Bouldin, Carson, Daniel, W. R. Davis, Desha, Dudley, Foster, Gaither, Hall, Haynes, Hinds, C. Johnson, Lamar, Lea, Loyall, Nuckolls, Overton, Patton, Polk, Potter, Rencher, Roane, Speight, Wiley Thompson, Trezvant, Wickliffe, Wilde, Yancey.—32.

So the resolve was agreed to.

The House then again resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and executors of Thomas Worthington, deceased;" and after a warm and animated discussion, in which Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, and Mr. ELLSWORTH, of Connecticut, bore the principal part for and against the bill,

The question was put, Shall the bill pass? and was decided in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. SPENCER, of New York, that the rule be suspended, to enable him to submit a resolution authorizing a renewal of the subscription to Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates.

TREATY WITH AUSTRIA.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Donelson, his private Secretary, viz.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress a treaty of commerce and navigation between the United States and the Emperor of Austria, concluded in this city on the 28th March, 1830, Adjournment.

[MARCH 3, 1831.]

the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 10th of February last.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, March 2, 1831.

The message was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry communications from the Executive Departments.

And then, being half past three o'clock P. M.,

The House took a recess until six o'clock P. M.

SIX O'CLOCK, P. M.

The House resumed its session.

On motion of Mr. DWIGHT,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to be joined by such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and to notify him that, unless he may have further communications to make, the two Houses of Congress, having completed the business before them, are ready to close the present session by an adjournment.

Mr. DWIGHT and Mr. ROANE were appointed of the said committee on the part of this House. Soon after,

Mr. DWIGHT, from the said joint committee, reported that the committee had, according to order, waited on the President, and made the communication to him; and that the President answered that he had no further communications to make to either House of Congress.

It was then

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify that body that this House, having completed the business before it, is now ready to close the present session by an adjournment, and that the Clerk do go with said message.

The Clerk having delivered said message, and being returned, a message was received from the Senate by Mr. Lowrie, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate, having completed the legislative business before it, is now ready to close the present session of Congress by an adjournment.

Thereupon,

The SPEAKER rose from his chair, and addressed the House as follows:

GENTLEMEN: I receive with sentiments of profound respect and grateful feeling the renewed expression of your approbation and confidence in my administration of the arduous duties of this high office. The character and power of this House; the rank which it holds in the eyes of the world; the deep and abiding confidence of the nation in the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of its Representatives, must ever render the approbation or censure of this House a matter of no ordinary importance to those who fill high places of public trust and confidence. This station, justly esteemed among the first in distinction and honor, has always been regarded not only as one of elevated character, but of severe responsibility and labor, and of extreme delicacy. In discharging its arduous and multifarious duties, no man can hope to free himself from error, or to give unqualified or universal satisfaction. In times, even, of profound tranquillity and repose, to please every one cannot, and ought not to be expected. Amid the storms of political and party excitements, it would be idle and vain to expect it. My path here for the last four years has not been strewn with roses. I have had, as you well know, my full share of responsibility, embarrassment, and toil. I can say, however, with truth, that I have endeavored to meet your expectations by a zealous devotion of my time, and even my health, to your service, and by a faithful and independent discharge of my public duty. This, gentlemen, was all that I promised when I received this high appointment at your hands; and in laying it down I feel a proud consciousness that I have redeemed my pledge; and if the trust has not been ably, it has, at least, been honestly discharged. During the entire period of my service, and under all the agitations of the times, it has been my peculiar good fortune and pleasure to receive, in an almost unexampled manner, the kindness and support of the members of this House; and in proof of it I may be permitted to remark, I hope without vanity, that in all the numerous and important decisions which I have been called upon to pronounce from this chair, but one has ever been reversed by the judgment of the House, and that under circumstances which can cause me no regret. Can I, then, feel otherwise than gratified and flattered, cheered and consoled, by this renewed and distinguished evidence of your confidence and favor? I receive it, gentlemen, in the spirit in which it has been offered; I cherish it in my heart. It is the highest and the only reward that I either sought or expected; and I shall cherish it through life with feelings of the deepest respect, and the most affectionate gratitude. God grant that you may long live to serve and benefit your country, and enjoy its undiminished confidence; and, in bidding you an affectionate, and, perhaps, last farewell, accept, I pray you, my cordial and best wishes for your individual health, prosperity, and happiness.

He then declared the House to be adjourned sine die.

21st Cong. 2d Sess.]

President's Message.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

TO BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS,

At the commencement of the Second Session of the Twenty-first Congress.

DECEMBER 7, 1830.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senateand of the House of Representatives :

The pleasure I have in congratulating you on your return to your constitutional duties is much heightened by the satisfaction which the condition of our beloved country at this period justly inspires. The beneficent Author of all good has granted to us, during the present year, health, peace, and plenty, and numerous causes for joy in the wonderful success which attends the progress of our free institutions.

With a population unparalleled in its increase, and possessing a character which combines the hardihood of enterprise with the considerateness of wisdom, we see in every section of our happy country a steady improvement in the means of social intercourse, and correspondent effects upon the genius and laws of our extended republic.

The apparent exceptions to the harmony of the prospect are to be referred rather to inevitable diversities in the various interests which enter into the composition of so extensive a whole, than to any want of attachment to the Union—interests whose collisions serve only, in the end, to foster the spirit of conciliation and patriotism, so essential to the preservation of that union which, I most devoutly hope, is destined to prove imperishable.

In the midst of these blessings, we have recently witnessed changes in the condition of other nations, which may, in their consequences, call for the utmost vigilance, wisdom, and unanimity, in our councils, and the exercise of all the moderation and patriotism of our people.

The important modifications of their Government, effected with so much courage and wisdom by the people of France, afford a happy presage of their future course, and has naturally elicited from the kindred feelings of this nation that spontaneous and universal burst of applause in which you have participated. In congratulating you, my fellow-citizens, upon an event so auspicious to the dearest interests of mankind, I do no more than respond to the voice of my country, without transcending, in the slightest degree, that salutary maxim of the illustrious Washington, which enjoins an abstinence from all interference with the internal affairs of other nations. From a people exercising, in the most unlimited degree, the right of self government, and enjoying, as derived from this proud characteristic, under the favor of heaven, much of the happiness with which they are blessed ; a people who can point in triumph to their free institutions, and challenge comparison with the fruits they bear, as well as with the moderation, intelligence, and energy, with which they are administered ; from such a people, the deepest sympathy was to be expected in a struggle for the sacred principles of liberty, conducted in a spirit every way worthy of the cause, and crowned by an heroic moderation which has disarmed revolution of its terrors. Notwithstanding the strong assurances which the man whom we so sincerely love and justly admire has given to the world of the high character of the present King of the French, and which, if sustained to the end, will secure to him the proud appellation of Patriot King, it is not in his success, but in that of the great principle which has borne him to the throne—the paramount authority of the public will—that the American people rejoice.

I am happy to inform you that the anticipations which were indulged at the date of my last communication on the subject of our foreign affairs, have been fully realized in several important particulars.

An arrangement has been effected with Great Britain, in relation to the trade between the United States and her West India and North American colonies, which has settled a question that has for years afforded matter for contention and almost uninterrupted discussion, and has been the subject of no less than six negotiations, in a manner which promises results highly favorable to the parties.

The abstract right of Great Britain to monopolize the trade with her colonies, or to exclude us from a participation therein, has never been denied by the U. States. But we have contended, and with reason, that if, at any time, Great Britain may desire the productions of this country as necessary to her colonies, they must be received upon principles of just reciprocity ; and further, that it is making an invidious and unfriendly distinction, to open her colonial ports to the vessels of other nations, and close them against those of the United States.

Antecedently to 1794, a portion of our productions was admitted into the colonial islands of Great Britain, by particular concession, limited to the term of one year, but renewed from year to year. In the transportation of these productions, however, our vessels were not allowed to engage ; this being a privilege reserved to British shipping, by which alone our produce could be taken to the islands, and theirs brought to us in return. From Newfoundland and her continental possessions, all our productions, as well as our vessels, were excluded, with occasional relaxations, by which, in seasons of distress, the former were admitted in British bottoms.

By the treaty of 1794, she offered to concede to us, for a limited time, the right of carrying to her West India possessions, in our vessels not exceeding seventy tons burden, and upon the same terms as British vessels, any productions of the United States which British vessels might import therefrom. But this privilege was coupled with conditions which are supposed to have led to its rejection by the Senate : that is, that American vessels should land their return cargoes in the United States only ; and, moreover, that they should, during the continuance of the privilege, be precluded from carrying molasses, sugar, coffee, cocoa, or cotton, either from those islands or from the U. States, to any other part of the world. Great Britain readily consented to expunge this article from the treaty ; and subsequent attempts to arrange the terms of the trade, either by treaty stipulations or concerted legislation, having failed, it has been successively suspended and allowed, according to the varying legislation of the parties.

The following are the prominent points which have, in later years, separated the two Governments. Besides a restriction, whereby all importations into her colonies in American vessels are confined to our own products carried hence, a restriction to which it does not appear that we have ever objected, a leading object on the part of Great Britain has been to prevent us from becoming the carriers of British West India commodities to any other country than our own. On the part of the United States, it has been contended, 1st. That the subject should be regulated by treaty stipulations in preference to separate legislation ; 2d. That our productions, when imported into the colonies in question, should not be subject to higher duties than the productions of the mother country, or of her other colonial possessions ; And, 3d. That our vessels should be allowed to participate in the circuitous trade between the United States and different parts of the British dominions.

The first point, after having been, for a long time, strenuously insisted upon by Great Britain, was given up by the act of Parliament of July, 1825 ; all vessels suffered to trade with the colonies being permitted to clear from thence with any articles which British vessels might export ; and proceed to any part of the world, Great Britain and her dependencies alone excepted. On our part, each of the above points had, in succession, been explicitly abandoned in negotiations preceding that of which the result is now announced.

This arrangement secures to the United States every advantage asked by them, and which the state of the negotiation allowed us to insist upon. The trade will be placed upon a footing decidedly more favorable to this country than any on which it ever stood; and our commerce and navigation will enjoy, in the colonial ports of Great Britain, every privilege allowed to other nations.

That the prosperity of the country, so far as it depends on this trade, will be greatly promoted by the new arrangement, there can be no doubt. Independently of the more obvious advantages of an open and direct intercourse, its establishment will be attended with other consequences of a higher value. That which has been carried on since the mutual interdict under all the expense and inconvenience unavoidably incident to it, would have been insupportably onerous, had it not been, in a great degree, lightened by concerted evasions in the mode of making the transshipments at what are called the neutral ports. These indirections are inconsistent with the dignity of nations that have so many motives, not only to cherish feelings of mutual friendship, but to maintain such relations as will stimulate their respective citizens and subjects to efforts of direct, open, and honorable competition only; and preserve them from the influence of seductive and vitiating circumstances.

When your preliminary interposition was asked at the close of the last session, a copy of the instructions under which Mr. McLane has acted, together with the communications which had at that time passed between him and the British Government, was laid before you. Although there has not been any thing in the acts of the two Governments which requires secrecy, it was thought most proper, in the then state of the negotiation, to make that communication a confidential one. So soon, however, as the evidence of execution on the part of Great Britain is received, the whole matter shall be laid before you, when it will be seen that the apprehension which appears to have suggested one of the provisions of the act passed at your last session, that the restoration of the trade in question might be connected with other subjects, and was sought to be obtained at the sacrifice of the public interest in other particulars, was wholly unfounded; and that the change which has taken place in the views of the British Government has been induced by considerations as honorable to both parties, as, I trust, the result will prove beneficial.

This desirable result was, it will be seen, greatly promoted by the liberal and confiding provisions of the act of Congress of the last session, by which our ports were, upon the reception and announcement by the President of the required assurance on the part of Great Britain, forthwith opened to her vessels, before the arrangement could be carried into effect on her part; pursuing, in this act of prospective legislation, a similar course to that adopted by Great Britain, in abolishing, by her act of Parliament, in 1825, a restriction then existing, and permitting our vessels to clear from the colonies, on their return voyages, for any foreign country whatever, before British vessels had been relieved from the restriction imposed by our law, of returning directly from the United States to the colonies—a restriction which she required and expected that we should abolish. Upon each occasion, a limited and temporary advantage has been given to the opposite party, but an advantage of no importance in comparison with the restoration of mutual confidence and good feelings, and the ultimate establishment of the trade upon fair principles.

It gives me unfeigned pleasure to assure you that this negotiation has been, throughout, characterised by the most frank and friendly spirit on the part of Great Britain, and concluded in a manner strongly indicative of a sincere desire to cultivate the best relations with the United States. To reciprocate this disposition to the fullest extent of my ability, is a duty which I shall deem it a privilege to discharge.

Although the result is, itself, the best commentary on the services rendered to his country by our Minister at the court of St. James, it would be doing violence to my feelings were I to dismiss the subject without expressing the very high sense I entertain of the talent and exertion which have been displayed by him on the occasion.

The injury to the commerce of the United States resulting from the exclusion of our vessels from the Black sea, and the previous footing of mere sufferance upon which even the limited trade enjoyed by us with Turkey has hitherto been placed, have, for a long time, been a source of much solicitude to this Government; and several endeavors have been made to obtain a better state of things. Sensible of the importance of the object, I felt it my duty to leave no proper means unemployed to acquire for our flag the same privileges that are enjoyed by the principal Powers of Europe. Commissioners were, consequently, appointed, to open a negotiation with the Sublime Porte. Not long after the member of the commission who went directly from the United States had sailed, the account of the treaty of Adrianople, by which one of the objects in view was supposed to be secured, reached this country. The Black Sea was understood to be opened to us. Under the supposition that this was the case, the additional facilities to be derived from the establishment of commercial regulations with the Porte were deemed of sufficient importance to require a prosecution of the negotiation as originally contemplated. It was therefore persevered in, and resulted in a treaty, which will be forthwith laid before the Senate.

By its provisions, a free passage is secured, without limitation of time, to the vessels of the United States, to and from the Black Sea, including the navigation thereof; and our trade with Turkey is placed on the footing of the most favored nation. The latter is an arrangement wholly independent of the treaty of Adrianople; and the former derives much value, not only from the increased security which, under any circumstances, it would give to the right in question, but from the fact, ascertained in the course of the negotiation, that, by the construction put upon that treaty by Turkey, the article relating to the passage of the Bosphorus is confined to nations having treaties with the Porte. The most friendly feelings appear to be entertained by the Sultan, and an enlightened disposition is evinced by him to foster the intercourse between the two countries by the most liberal arrangements. This disposition it will be our duty and interest to cherish.

Our relations with Russia are of the most stable character. Respect for that Empire, and confidence in its friendship towards the United States, have been so long entertained on our part, and so carefully cherished by the present Emperor and his illustrious predecessor, as to have become incorporated with the public sentiment of the United States. No means will be left unemployed on my part to promote these salutary feelings, and those improvements of which the commercial intercourse between the two countries is susceptible, and which have derived increased importance from our treaty with the Sublime Porte.

I sincerely regret to inform you that our Minister lately commissioned to that Court, on whose distinguished talents and great experience in public affairs I place great reliance, has been compelled, by extreme indisposition, to exercise a privilege, which, in consideration of the extent to which his constitution had been impaired in the public service, was committed to his discretion—of leaving temporarily his post for the advantage of a more genial climate.

If, as it is to be hoped, the improvement of his health should be such as to justify him in doing so, he will repair to St. Petersburg, and resume the discharge of his official duties. I have received the most satisfactory assurance that, in the mean time, the public interests in that quarter will be preserved from prejudice, by the intercourse which he will continue, through the Secretary of Legation, with the Russian cabinet.

You are apprised, although the fact has not yet been officially announced to the House of Representatives, that a treaty was, in the month of March last, concluded between the United States and Denmark, by which $ 650,000 are secured to our citizens as an indemnity for spoiliations upon their commerce in the years 1808, 1809, 1810, and 1811. This treaty was sanctioned by the Senate at the close of its last session, and it now becomes the duty of Congress to pass the necessary laws for the organization of the Board of Commissioners to distribute the indemnity amongst the claimants. It is an agreeable circumstance of this adjustment, that its terms are in conformity with the previously ascertained views of the claimants themselves; thus removing all pretence for a future agitation of the subject in any form.

The negotiations in regard to such points in our foreign relations as remained to be adjusted, have been actively prosecuted during the recess. Material advances have been made, which are of a character to promise favorable results. Our country, by the blessing of God, is not in a situation to invite aggression; and it will be our fault if she ever becomes so. Sincerely desirous to cultivate the most liberal and friendly relations with all; ever ready to fulfil our engagements with scrupulous fidelity; limiting our demands upon others to mere justice; holding ourselves ever ready to do unto them as we would wish to be done by, and avoiding even the appearance of undue partiality to any Nation, it appears to me impossible that a simple and sincere application of our principles to our foreign relations can fail to place them ultimately upon the footing on which it is our wish they should rest.

Of the points referred to, the most prominent are, our claims upon France for spoiliations upon our commerce; similar claims upon Spain, together with embarrassments in the commercial intercourse between the two countries, which ought to be removed; the conclusion of the treaty of commerce and navigation with Mexico, which has been so long in suspense, as well as the final settlement of limits between ourselves and that republic; and finally the arbitration of the question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the northeastern boundary.

The negotiation with France has been conducted by our Minister with zeal and ability, and in all respects to my entire satisfaction. Although the prospect of a favorable termination was occasionally dimmed by counterpretensions, to which the United States could not assent, he yet had strong hopes of being able to arrive at a satisfactory settlement with the late Government. The negotiation has been renewed with the present authorities; and, sensible of the general and lively confidence of our citizens in the justice and magnanimity of regenerated France, I regret the more not to have it in my power, yet, to announce the result so confidently anticipated. No ground, however, inconsistent with this expectation, has been taken; and I do not allow myself to doubt that justice will soon be done to us. The amount of the claims, the length of time they have remained unsatisfied, and their incontrovertible justice, make an earnest prosecution of them by this Government an urgent duty. The illegality of the seizures and confiscations out of which they have arisen is not disputed; and whatever distinctions may have heretofore been set up in regard to the liability of the existing Government, it is quite clear that such considerations cannot now be interposed.

The commercial intercourse between the two countries is susceptible of highly advantageous improvements; but the sense of this injury has had, and must continue to have, a very unfavorable influence upon them. From its satisfactory adjustment, not only a firm and cordial friendship, but a progressive development of all their relations, may be expected. It is, therefore, my earnest hope that this old and vexatious subject of difference may be speedily removed.

I feel that my confidence in our appeal to the motives which should govern a just and magnanimous Nation, is alike warranted by the character of the French people, and by the high voucher we possess for the enlarged views and pure integrity of the monarch who now presides over their councils; and nothing shall be wanting on my part to meet any manifestation of the spirit we anticipate in one of corresponding frankness and liberality.

The subjects of difference with Spain have been brought to the view of that Government, by our Minister there, with much force and propriety; and the strongest assurances have been received of their early and favorable consideration.

The steps which remained to place the matter in controversy between Great Britain and the United States fairly before the arbitrator, have all been taken in the same liberal and friendly spirit which characterized those before announced. Recent events have doubtless served to delay the decision, but our Minister at the Court of the distinguished arbitrator has been assured that it will be made within the time contemplated by the treaty.

I am particularly gratified in being able to state that a decidedly favorable, and, as I hope, lasting change has been effected in our relations with the neighboring republic of Mexico. The unfortunate and unfounded suspicions in regard to our disposition, which it became my painful duty to advert to on a former occasion, have been, I believe, entirely removed; and the Government of Mexico has been made to understand the real character of the wishes and views of this in regard to that country. The consequence is, the establishment of friendship and mutual confidence. Such are the assurances which I have received, and I see no cause to doubt their sincerity.

I had reason to expect the conclusion of a commercial treaty with Mexico in season for communication on the present occasion. Circumstances which are not explained, but which, I am persuaded, are not the result of an indisposition on her part to enter into it, have produced the delay.

There was reason to fear, in the course of the last summer, that the harmony of our relations might be disturbed by the acts of certain claimants, under Mexican grants, of territory which has hitherto been under our jurisdiction. The co-operation of the representative of Mexico near this Government was asked on the occasion, and was readily afforded. Instructions and advice have been given to the Governor of Arkansas and the Officers in command in the adjoining Mexican State, by which, it is hoped, the quiet of that frontier will be preserved, until a final settlement of the dividing line shall have removed all ground of controversy.

The exchange of ratification of the treaty concluded last year with Austria has not yet taken place. The delay has been occasioned by the non-arrival of the ratification of that Government within the time prescribed by the treaty. Renewed authority has been asked for by the representative of Austria; and, in the mean time, the rapidly increasing trade and navigation between the two countries have been placed upon the most liberal footing of our navigation acts.

Several alleged depredations have been recently committed on our commerce by the national vessels of Portugal. They have been made the subject of immediate remonstrance and reclamation. I am not yet possessed of sufficient information to express a definitive opinion of their character, but expect soon to receive it. No proper means shall be omitted to obtain for our citizens all the redress to which they may appear to be entitled.

Almost at the moment of the adjournment of your last session, two bills, the one entitled "An act for making appropriations for building light-houses, light-boats, beacons, and monuments, placing buoys, and for improving harbors and directing surveys," and the other, "An act to authorize a subscription for stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company," were submitted for my approval. It was not possible, within the time allowed me, before the close of the session, to give these bills the consideration which was due to their character and importance; and I was compelled to retain them for that purpose. I now avail myself of this early opportunity to return them to the Houses in which they respectively originated, with the reasons which, after mature deliberation, compel me to withhold my approval.

The practice of defraying out of the Treasury of the United States the expenses incurred by the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, within the bays, inlets, harbors, and ports of the United States, to render the navigation thereof safe and easy, is coeval with the adoption of the Constitution, and has been continued without interruption or dispute.

As our foreign commerce increased, and was extended into the interior of the country by the establishment of ports of entry and delivery upon our navigable rivers, the sphere of those expenditures received a corresponding enlargement. Light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and the removal of sand bars, sawyers, and other partial or temporary impediments in the navigable rivers and harbors which were embraced in the revenue districts from time to time established by law, were authorized upon the same principle, and the expense defrayed in the same manner. That these expenses have at times been extravagant and disproportionate, is very probable. The circumstances under which they are incurred, are well calculated to lead to such a result, unless their application is subjected to the closest scrutiny. The local advantages arising from the disbursement of public money too frequently, it is to be feared, invite appropriations for objects of this character that are neither necessary nor useful. The number of light-house keepers is already very large, and the bill before me proposes to add to it fifty-one more, of various descriptions. From representations upon the subject which are understood to be entitled to respect, I am induced to believe that there has not only been great improvidence in the past expenditures of the Government upon these objects, but that the security of navigation has, in some instances, been diminished by the multiplication of light-houses, and consequent change of lights, upon the coast. It is in this, as in other respects, our duty to avoid all unnecessary expense, as well as every increase of patronage not called for by the public service. But, in the discharge of that duty in this particular, it must not be forgotten that, in relation to our foreign commerce, the burden and benefit of protecting and accommodating it necessarily go together, and must do so as long as the public revenue is drawn from the people through the custom house. It is indisputable, that whatever gives facility and security to navigation, cheapens imports; and all who consume them are alike interested in whatever produces this effect. If they consume, they ought, as they now do, to pay; otherwise, they do not pay. The consumer in the most inland State derives the same advantage from every necessary and prudent expenditure for the facility and security of our foreign commerce and navigation, that he does who resides in a maritime State. Local expenditures have not, of themselves, a correspondent operation.

From a bill making direct appropriations for such objects, I should not have withheld my assent. The one now returned does so in several particulars, but it also contains appropriations for surveys of a local character, which I cannot approve. It gives me satisfaction to find that no serious inconvenience has arisen from withholding my approval from this bill; nor will it, I trust, be cause of regret that an opportunity will be thereby afforded for Congress to review its provisions under circumstances better calculated for full investigation than those under which it was passed.

In speaking of direct appropriations, I mean not to include a practice which has obtained to some extent, and to which I have, in one instance, in a different capacity, given my assent—that of subscribing to the stock of private associations. Positive experience, and a more thorough consideration of the subject, have convinced me of the impropriety as well as inexpediency of such investments. All improvements effected by the funds of the nation, for general use, should be open to the enjoyment of all our fellow citizens, exempt from the payment of tolls, or any imposition of that character. The practice of thus mingling the concerns of the Government with those of the States or of individuals, is inconsistent with the object of its institution, and highly impolitic. The successful operation of the federal system can only be preserved by confining it to the few and simple, but yet important objects for which it was designed.

A different practice, if allowed to progress, would ultimately change the character of this Government, by consolidating into one the General and State Governments, which were intended to be kept forever distinct. I cannot perceive how bills authorizing such subscriptions can be otherwise regarded than as bills for revenue, and consequently subject to the rule in that respect prescribed by the Constitution. If the interest of the Government in private companies is subordinate to that of individuals, the management and control of a portion of the public funds is delegated to an authority unknown to the Constitution, and beyond the supervision of our constituents: if superior, its officers and agents will be constantly exposed to imputations of favoritism and oppression. Direct prejudice to the public interest, or an alienation of the affections and respect of portions of the people, may, therefore, in addition to the general discredit resulting to the Government from embarking with its constituents in pecuniary speculations, be looked for as the probable fruit of such associations. It is no answer to this objection to say that the extent of consequences like these cannot be great from a limited and small number of investments: because experience in other matters teaches us, and we are not at liberty to disregard its admonitions, that, unless an entire stop be put to them, it will soon be impossible to prevent their accumulation, until they are spread over the whole country, and made to embrace many of the private and appropriate concerns of individuals.

The power which the General Government would acquire within the several States by becoming the principal stockholder in corporations, controlling every canal and each sixty or hundred miles of every important road, and giving a proportionate vote in all their elections, is almost inconceivable, and, in my view, dangerous to the liberties of the people.

This mode of aiding such works is, also, in its nature, deceptive, and in many cases conducive to improvidence in the administration of the national funds. Appropriations will be obtained with much greater facility, and granted with less security to the public interest, when the measure is thus disguised, than when definite and direct expenditures of money are asked for. The interests of the nation would doubtless be better served by avoiding all such indirect modes of aiding particular objects. In a Government like ours, more especially, should all public acts be, as far as practicable, simple, undisguised, and intelligible, that they may become fit subjects for the approbation or animadversion of the people. The bill authorizing a subscription to the Louisville and Portland canal affords a striking illustration of the difficulty of withholding additional appropriations for the same object, when the first erroneous step has been taken by instituting a partnership between the Government and private companies. It proposes a third subscription on the part of the United States, when each preceding one was at the time regarded as the extent of the aid which Government was to render to that work; and the accompanying bill for light-houses, &c. contains an appropriation for a survey of the bed of the river, with a view to its improvement, by removing the obstruction which the canal is designed to avoid. This improvement, if successful, would afford a free passage to the river, and render the canal entirely useless. To such improvidence is the course of legislation subject, in relation to internal improvements on local matters, even with the best intentions on the part of Congress.

Although the motives which have influenced me in this matter may be already sufficiently stated, I am, nevertheless, induced by its importance to add a few observations of a general character.

In my objections to the bills authorizing subscriptions to the Maysville and Rockville Road Companies, I expressed my views fully in regard to the power of Congress to construct roads and canals within a State, or to appropriate money for improvements of a local character. I, at the same time, intimated my belief that the right to make appropriations for such as were of a national character had been so generally acted upon, and so long acquiesced in by the Federal and State Governments, and the constituents of each, as to justify its exercise on the ground of continued and uninterrupted usage; but that it was, nevertheless, highly expedient that appropriations, even of that character, should, with the exception made at the time, be deferred until the national debt is paid, and that, in the mean while, some general rule for the action of the Government in that respect ought to be established.

These suggestions were not necessary to the decision of the question then before me; and were, I readily admit, intended to awaken the attention, and draw forth the opinions and observations, of our constituents, upon a subject of the highest importance to their interests, and one destined to exert a powerful influence upon the future operations of our political system. I know of no tribunal to which a public man in this country, in a case of doubt and difficulty, can appeal with greater advantage or more propriety, than the judgment of the people; and although I must necessarily, in the discharge of my official duties, be governed by the dictates of my own judgment, I have no desire to conceal my anxious wish to conform, as far as I can, to the views of those for whom I act.

All irregular expressions of public opinion are of necessity attended with some doubt as to their accuracy; but, making full allowances on that account, I cannot, I think, deceive myself in believing that the acts referred to, as well as the suggestions which I allowed myself to make in relation to their bearing upon the future operations of the Government, have been approved by the great body of the people. That those whose immediate pecuniary interests are to be affected by proposed expenditures should shrink from the application of a rule which prefers their more general and remote interests to those which are personal and immediate, is to be expected. But even such objections must, from the nature of our population, be but temporary in their duration; and if it were otherwise, our course should be the same, for the time is yet, I hope, far distant, when those entrusted with power to be exercised for the good of the whole, will consider it either honest or wise to purchase local favor at the sacrifice of principle and the general good.

So understanding public sentiment, and thoroughly satisfied that the best interests of our common country imperiously require that the course which I have recommended in this regard should be adopted, I have, upon the most mature consideration, determined to pursue it.

It is due to candor, as well as to my own feelings, that I should express the reluctance and anxiety which I must at all times experience in exercising the undoubted right of the Executive to withhold his assent from bills on other grounds than their unconstitutionality. That this right should not be exercised on slight occasions, all will admit. It is only in matters of deep interest, when the principle involved may be justly regarded as next in importance to infractions of the Constitution itself, that such a step can be expected to meet with the approbation of the people. Such an occasion do I conscientiously believe the present to be. In the discharge of this delicate and highly responsible duty, I am sustained by the reflection that the exercise of this power has been deemed consistent with the obligation of official duty by several of my predecessors; and by the persuasion, too, that, whatever liberal institutions may have to fear from the encroachments of Executive power, which has been every where the cause of so much strife and bloody contention, but little danger is to be apprehended from a precedent by which that authority denies to itself the exercise of powers that bring in their train influence and patronage of great extent; and thus excludes the operation of personal interests, every where the bane of official trust. I derive, too, no small degree of satisfaction from the reflection, that, if I have mistaken the interests and wishes of the people, the Constitution affords the means of soon redressing the error, by selecting for the place their favor has bestowed upon me a citizen whose opinions may accord with their own. I trust, in the mean time, the interests of the nation will be saved from prejudice, by a rigid application of that portion of the public funds which might otherwise be applied to different objects to that highest of all our obligations, the payment of the public debt, and an opportunity be afforded for the adoption of some better rule for the operations of the Government in this matter than any which has hitherto been acted upon.

Profoundly impressed with the importance of the subject, not merely as it relates to the general prosperity of the country, but to the safety of the federal system, I cannot avoid repeating my earnest hope that all good citizens, who take a proper interest in the success and harmony of our admirable political institutions; and who are incapable of desiring to convert an opposite state of things into means for the gratification of personal ambition—will, laying aside minor considerations, and discarding local prejudices, unite their honest exertions to establish some fixed general principle, which shall be calculated to effect the greatest extent of public good in regard to the subject of internal improvement, and afford the least ground for sectional discontent.

The general ground of my objection to local appropriations has been heretofore expressed; and I shall endeavor to avoid a repetition of what has been already urged—the importance of sustaining the State sovereignties, as far as is consistent with the rightful action of the Federal Government, and of preserving the greatest attainable harmony between them. I will now only add an expression of my conviction—a conviction which every day's experience serves to confirm—that the political creed which inculcates the pursuit of those great objects as a paramount duty is the true faith, and one to which we are mainly indebted for the present success of the entire system, and to which we must alone look for its future stability.

That there are diversities in the interests of the different States which compose this extensive confederacy, must be admitted. Those diversities, arising from situation, climate, population, and pursuits, are doubtless, as it is natural they should be, greatly exaggerated by jealousies, and that spirit of rivalry so inseparable from neighboring communities. These circumstances make it the duty of those who are entrusted with the management of its affairs to neutralize their effects as far as practicable, by making the beneficial operation of the Federal Government as equal and equitable among the several States as can be done consistently with the great ends of its institution.

It is only necessary to refer to undoubted facts, to see how far the past acts of the Government upon the subject under consideration have fallen short of this object. The expenditures heretofore made for internal improvements amount to upwards of five millions of dollars, and have been distributed in very unequal proportions amongst the States. The estimated expense of works of which surveys have been made, together with that of others projected and partially surveyed, amount to more than ninety-six millions of dollars.

That such improvements, on account of particular circumstances, may be more advantageously and beneficially made in some States than in others, is doubtless true; but that they are of a character which should prevent an equitable distribution of the funds amongst the several States, is not to be conceded. The want of this equitable distribution cannot fail to prove a prolific source of irritation amongst the States.

We have it constantly before our eyes, that professions of superior zeal in the cause of internal improvement, and a disposition to lavish the public funds upon objects of that character, are daily and earnestly put forth by aspirants to power, as constituting the highest claims to the confidence of the people. Would it be strange, under such circumstances, and in times of great excitement, that grants of this description should find their motives in objects which may not accord with the public good? Those who have not had occasion to see and regret the indication of a sinister influence in these matters in past times, have been more fortunate than myself in their observation of the course of public affairs. If to these evils be added the combinations and angry contentions to which such a course of things gives rise, with their baleful influences upon the legislation of Congress touching the leading and appropriate duties of the Federal Government, it was but doing justice to the character of our people to expect the severe condemnation of the past which the recent exhibition of public sentiment has evinced.

Nothing short of a radical change in the action of the Government upon the subject, can, in my opinion, remedy the evil. If, as it would be natural to expect, the States which have been least favored in past appropriations should insist on being redressed in those hereafter to be made, at the expense of the States which have so largely and disproportionately participated, we have, as matters now stand, but little security that the attempt would do more than change the inequality from one quarter to another.

Thus viewing the subject, I have heretofore felt it my duty to recommend the adoption of some plan for the distribution of the surplus funds which may at any time remain in the treasury after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States, in proportion to the number of their representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement.

Although this plan has met with favor in some portions of the Union, it has also elicited objections which merit deliberate consideration. A brief notice of these objections here will not, therefore, I trust, be regarded as out of place.

They rest, as far as they have come to my knowledge, on the following grounds: 1st, an objection to the ratio of distribution; 2d, an apprehension that the existence of such a regulation would produce improvident and oppressive taxation to raise the funds for distribution; 3d, that the mode proposed would lead to the construction of works of a local nature, to the exclusion of such as are general, and as would consequently be of a more useful character; and, last, that it would create a discreditable and injurious dependence, on the part of the State Governments, upon the federal power. Of those who object to the ratio of representation as the basis of distribution, some insist that the importations of the respective States would constitute one that would be more equitable; and others, again, that the extent of their respective territories would furnish a standard which would be more expeditious, and sufficiently equitable. The ratio of representation presented itself to my mind, and it still does, as one of obvious equity, because of its being the ratio of contribution, whether the funds to be distributed be derived from the customs or from direct taxation. It does not follow, however, that its adoption is indispensable to the establishment of the system proposed. There may be considerations appertaining to the subject which would render a departure, to some extent, from the rule of contribution, proper. Nor is it absolutely necessary that the basis of distribution be confined to one ground. It may, if, in the judgment of those whose right it is to fix it, it be deemed politic and just to give it that character, have regard to several.

In my first message, I stated it to be my opinion that "it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the treasury beyond what may be required for its current service." I have had no cause to change that opinion, but much to confirm it. Should these expectations be realized, a suitable fund would thus be produced for the plan under consideration to operate upon; and if there be no such fund, its adoption will, in my opinion, work no injury to any interest; for I cannot assent to the justness of the apprehension that the establishment of the proposed system would tend to the encouragement of improvident legislation of the character supposed. Whatever the proper authority, in the exercise of constitutional power, shall, at any time hereafter, decide to be for the general good, will, in that as in other respects, deserve and receive the acquiescence and support of the whole country; and we have ample security that every abuse of power in that regard, by the agents of the people, will receive a speedy and effectual corrective at their hands. The views which I take of the future, founded on the obvious and increasing improvement of all classes of our fellow-citizens, in intelligence, and in public and private virtue, leave me without much apprehension on that head.

I do not doubt that those who come after us will be as much alive as we are to the obligation upon all the trustees of political power to exempt those for whom they act from all unnecessary burdens; and as sensible of the great truth, that the resources of the nation, beyond those required for the immediate and necessary purposes of Government, can no where be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people.

It may sometimes happen that the interests of particular States would not be deemed to coincide with the general interest in relation to improvement within such States. But, if the danger to be apprehended from this source is sufficient to require it, a discretion might be reserved to Congress to direct, to such improvements of a general character as the States concerned might not be disposed to unite in, the application of the quotas of those States, under the restriction of confining to each State the expenditure of its appropriate quota. It may, however, be assumed as a safe general rule, that such improvements as serve to increase the prosperity of the respective States in which they are made, by giving new facilities to trade, and thereby augmenting the wealth and comfort of their inhabitants, constitute the surest mode of conferring permanent and substantial advantages upon the whole. The strength, as well as the true glory, of the confederacy, is mainly founded on the prosperity and power of the several independent sovereignties of which it is composed, and the certainty with which they can be brought into successful, active co-operation, through the agency of the Federal Government.

It is, moreover, within the knowledge of such as are at all conversant with public affairs, that schemes of internal improvement have, from time to time, been proposed, which, from their extent and seeming magnificence, were regarded as of national concernment; but which, upon fuller consideration and further experience, would now be rejected with great unanimity.

That the plan under consideration would derive important advantages from its certainty; and that the moneys set apart for these purposes would be more judiciously applied and economically expended under the direction of the State Legislatures, in which every part of each State is immediately represented, cannot, I think, be doubted. In the new States particularly, where a comparatively small population is scattered over an extensive surface, and the representation in Congress consequently very limited, it is natural to expect that the appropriations made by the Federal Government would be more likely to be expended in the vicinity of those members through whose immediate agency they were obtained, than if the funds were placed under the control of the Legislature, in which every county of the State has its own representative. This supposition does not necessarily impugn the motives of such Congressional representatives, nor is it so intended. We are all sensible of the bias to which the strongest minds and purest hearts are, under such circumstances, liable. In respect to the last objection, its probable effect upon the dignity and independence of the State Governments, it appears to me only necessary to state the case as it is, and as it would be if the measure proposed were adopted, to show that the operation is most likely to be the very reverse of that which the objection supposes.

In the one case, the State would receive its quota of the national revenue for domestic use, upon a fixed principle, as a matter of right, and from a fund to the creation of which it had itself contributed its fair proportion. Surely there could be nothing derogatory in that. As matters now stand, the States themselves, in their sovereign character, are not unfrequently petitioners at the bar of the Federal Legislature for such allowances out of the national treasury as it may comport with their pleasure or sense of duty to bestow upon them. It cannot require argument to prove which of the two courses is most compatible with the efficiency or respectability of the State Governments.

But all these are matters for discussion and dispassionate consideration. That the desired adjustment would be attended with difficulty, affords no reason why it should not be attempted. The effective operation of such motives would have prevented the adoption of the Constitution under which we have so long lived, and under the benign influence of which our beloved country has so signally prospered. The framers of that sacred instrument had greater difficulties to overcome, and they did overcome them. The patriotism of the people, directed by a deep conviction of the importance of the Union, produced mutual concession and reciprocal forbearance. Strict right was merged in a spirit of compromise, and the result has consecrated their disinterested devotion to the general weal. Unless the American people have degenerated, the same result can be again effected, whenever experience points out the necessity of a resort to the same means to uphold the fabric which their fathers have reared. It is beyond the power of man to make a system of government like ours, or any other, operate with precise equality upon States situated like those which compose this Confederacy; nor is inequality always injustice. Every State cannot expect to shape the measures of the General Government to suit its own particular interests. The causes which prevent it are seated in the nature of things, and cannot be entirely counteracted by human means. Mutual forbearance, therefore, becomes a duty obligatory upon all; and we may, I am confident, count on a cheerful compliance with this high injunction, on the part of our constituents. It is not to be supposed that they will object to make such comparatively inconsiderable sacrifices for the preservation of rights and privileges, which other less favored portions of the world have in vain waded through seas of blood to acquire.

Our course is a safe one, if it be but faithfully adhered to. Acquiescence in the constitutionally expressed will of the majority, and the exercise of that will in a spirit of moderation, justice, and brotherly kindness, will constitute a cement which would forever preserve our Union. Those who cherish and inculcate sentiments like these, render a most essential service to their country; whilst those who seek to weaken their influence, are, however conscientious and praiseworthy their intentions, in effect its worst enemies.

If the intelligence and influence of the country, instead of laboring to foment sectional prejudices, to be made subservient to party warfare, were, in good faith, applied to the eradication of causes of local discontent, by the improvement of our institutions, and by facilitating their adaptation to the condition of the times, this task would prove one of less difficulty. May we not hope that the obvious interests of our common country, and the dictates of an enlightened patriotism, will, in the end, lead the public mind in that direction.

After all, the nature of the subject does not admit of a plan wholly free from objection. That which has for some time been in operation is, perhaps, the worst that could exist; and every advance that can be made in its improvement is a matter eminently worthy of your most deliberate attention.

It is very possible that one better calculated to effect the objects in view may yet be devised. If so, it is to be hoped that those who disapprove of the past, and dissent from what is proposed for the future, will feel it their duty to direct their attention to it, as they must be sensible that, unless some fixed rule for the action of the Federal Government in this respect is established, the course now attempted to be arrested will be again resorted to. Any mode which is calculated to give the greatest degree of effect and harmony to our legislation upon the subject—which shall best serve to keep the movements of the Federal Government within the sphere intended by those who modelled and those who adopted it—which shall lead to the extinguishment of the national debt in the shortest period, and impose the lightest burdens upon our constituents, shall receive from me a cordial and firm support.

Among the objects of great national concern, I cannot omit to press again upon your attention that part of the Constitution which regulates the election of President and Vice President. The necessity for its amendment is made so clear to my mind by the observation of its evils, and by the many able discussions which they have elicited on the floor of Congress and elsewhere, that I should be wanting to my duty were I to withhold another expression of my deep solicitude upon the subject. Our system fortunately contemplates a recurrence to first principles, differing, in this respect, from all that have preceded it, and securing it, I trust, equally against the decay and the commotions which have marked the progress of other Governments. Our fellow-citizens, too, who, in proportion to their love of liberty, keep a steady eye upon the means of sustaining it, do not require to be reminded of the duty they owe to themselves to remedy all essential defects in so vital a part of their system. While they are sensible that every evil attendant upon its operation is not necessarily indicative of a bad organization, but may proceed from temporary causes, yet the habitual presence, or even a single instance of evils which can be clearly traced to an organic defect, will not, I trust, be overlooked through a too scrupulous veneration for the work of their ancestors. The Constitution was an experiment committed to the virtue and intelligence of the great mass of our countrymen, in whose ranks the framers of it themselves were to perform the part of patriotic observation and scrutiny; and if they have passed from the stage of existence with an increased confidence in its general adaptation to our condition, we should learn from authority so high the duty of fortifying the points in it which time proves to be exposed, rather than be deterred from approaching them by the suggestions of fear, or the dictates of misplaced reverence.

A provision which does not secure to the people a direct choice of their Chief Magistrate, but has a tendency to defeat their will, presented to my mind such an inconsistency with the general spirit of our institutions, that I was induced to suggest for your consideration the substitute which appeared to me at the same time the most likely to correct the evil and to meet the views of our constituents. The most mature reflection since has added strength to the belief that the best interests of our country require the speedy adoption of some plan calculated to effect this end. A contingency which sometimes places it in the power of a single member of the House of Representatives to decide an election of so high and solemn a character, is unjust to the people, and becomes, when it occurs, a source of embarrassment to the individuals thus brought into power, and a cause of distrust of the representative body. Liable as the confederacy is, from its great extent, to parties founded upon sectional interests, and to a corresponding multiplication of candidates for the Presidency, the tendency of the constitutional reference to the House of Representatives, is, to devolve the election upon a body in almost every instance, and, whatever choice may then be made among the candidates thus presented to them, to swell the influence of particular interests to a degree inconsistent with the general good. The consequences of this feature of the Constitution appear far more threatening to the peace and integrity of the Union than any which I can conceive as likely to result from the simple legislative action of the Federal Government.

It was a leading object with the framers of the Constitution to keep as separate as possible the action of the Legislative and Executive branches of the Government. To secure this object, nothing is more essential than to preserve the former from the temptations of private interest, and, therefore, so to direct the patronage of the latter as not to permit such temptations to be offered. Experience abundantly demonstrates that every precaution in this respect is a valuable safeguard of liberty, and one which my reflections upon the tendencies of our system incline me to think should be made still stronger. It was for this reason that, in connexion with an amendment of the Constitution, removing all intermediate agency in the choice of the President, I recommended some restrictions upon the re-eligibility of that officer, and upon the tenure of offices generally. The reason still exists; and I renew the recommendation, with an increased confidence that its adoption will strengthen those checks by which the Constitution designed to secure the independence of each department of the Government, and promote the healthful and equitable administration of all the trusts which it has created. The agent most likely to contravene this design of the Constitution is the Chief Magistrate. In order, particularly, that his appointment may, as far as possible, be placed beyond the reach of any improper influences; in order, that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people, uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty; and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power, and the weakness of its possessor, will admit, I cannot too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such an amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service.

It gives me pleasure to announce to Congress that the benevolent policy of the Government, steadily pursued for nearly thirty years, in relation to the removal of the Indians beyond the white settlements, is approaching to a happy consummation. Two important tribes have accepted the provision made for their removal at the last session of Congress; and it is believed that their example will induce the remaining tribes, also, to seek the same obvious advantages.

The consequences of a speedy removal will be important to the United States, to individual States, and to the Indians themselves. The pecuniary advantages which it promises to the Government are the least of its recommendations. It puts an end to all possible danger of collision between the authorities of the General and State Governments, on account of the Indians. It will place a dense and civilized population in large tracts of country now occupied by a few savage hunters. By opening the whole territory between Tennessee on the north, and Louisiana on the south, to the settlement of the whites, it will incalculably strengthen the southwestern frontier, and render the adjacent States strong enough to repel future invasion without remote aid. It will relieve the whole State of Mississippi, and the western part of Alabama, of Indian occupancy, and enable those States to advance rapidly in population, wealth, and power. It will separate the Indians from immediate contact with settlements of whites; free them from the power of the States; enable them to pursue happiness in their own way, and under their own rude institutions; will retard the progress of decay, which is lessening their numbers; and perhaps cause them gradually, under the protection of the Government, and through the influence of good counsels, to cast off their savage habits, and become an interesting, civilized, and Christian community. These consequences, some of them so certain, and the rest so probable, make the complete execution of the plan sanctioned by Congress at their last session an object of much solicitude.

Toward the aborigines of the country no one can indulge a more friendly feeling than myself, or would go further in attempting to reclaim them from their wandering habits, and make them a happy and prosperous people. I have endeavored to impress upon them my own solemn convictions of the duties and powers of the General Government in relation to the State authorities. For the justice of the laws passed by the States within the scope of their reserved powers, they are not responsible to this Government. As individuals; we may entertain and express our opinions of their acts; but, as a Government, we have as little right to control them as we have to prescribe laws to foreign nations.

With a full understanding of the subject, the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes have, with great unanimity, determined to avail themselves of the liberal offers presented by the act of Congress, and have agreed to remove beyond the Mississippi river. Treaties have been made with them, which, in due season, will be submitted for consideration. In negotiating these treaties, they were made to understand their true condition; and they have preferred maintaining their independence in the Western forests to submitting to the laws of the States in which they now reside. These treaties being probably the last which will ever be made with them, are characterized by great liberality on the part of the Government. They give the Indians a liberal sum in consideration of their removal, and comfortable subsistence on their arrival at their new homes. If it be their real interest to maintain a separate existence, they will there be at liberty to do so without the inconveniences and vexations to which they would unavoidably have been subject in Alabama and Mississippi.

Humanity has often wept over the fate of the aborigines of this country; and philanthropy has been long busily employed in devising means to avert it. But its progress has never for a moment been arrested; and one by one have many powerful tribes disappeared from the earth. To follow to the tomb the last of his race, and to tread on the graves of extinct nations, excites melancholy reflections. But true philanthropy reconciles the mind to these vicissitudes, as it does to the extinction of one generation to make room for another. In the monuments and fortresses of an unknown people, spread over the extensive regions of the West, we behold the memorials of a once powerful race, which was exterminated, or has disappeared, to make room for the existing savage tribes. Nor is there any thing in this, which, upon a comprehensive view of the general interests of the human race, is to be regretted. Philanthropy could not wish to see this continent restored to the condition in which it was found by our forefathers. What good man would prefer a country covered with forests, and ranged by a few thousand savages, to our extensive republic, studded with cities, towns, and prosperous farms; embellished with all the improvements which art can devise, or industry execute; occupied by more than twelve millions of happy people, and filled with all the blessings of liberty, civilization, and religion!

The present policy of the Government is but a continuation of the same progressive change, by a milder process. The tribes which occupied the countries now constituting the Eastern States were annihilated, or have melted away, to make room for the whites. The waves of population and civilization are rolling to the Westward; and we now propose to acquire the countries occupied by the red men of the South and West, by a fair exchange, and, at the expense of the U. States, to send them to a land where their existence may be prolonged, and perhaps made perpetual. Doubtless it will be painful to leave the graves of their fathers; but what do they more than our ancestors did, or than our children are now doing? To better their condition in an unknown land, our forefathers left all that was dear in earthly objects. Our children, by thousands, yearly leave the land of their birth, to seek new homes in distant regions. Does humanity weep at these painful separations from every thing, animate and inanimate, with which the young heart has become entwined? Far from it. It is rather a source of joy that our country affords scope where our young population may range unconstrained in body or in mind, developing the power and faculties of man in their highest perfection. These remove hundreds, and almost thousands of miles, at their own expense, purchase the lands they occupy, and support themselves at their new home from the moment of their arrival. Can it be cruel in this Government, when, by events which it cannot control, the Indian is made discontented in his ancient home, to purchase his lands, to give him a new and extensive territory, to pay the expense of his removal, and support him a year in his new abode? How many thousands of our own people would gladly embrace the opportunity of removing to the west on such conditions! If the offers made to the Indians were extended to them, they would be hailed with gratitude and joy.

And is it supposed that the wandering savage has a stronger attachment to his home, than the settled, civilized Christian? Is it more afflicting to him to leave the graves of his fathers, than it is to our brothers and children? Rightly considered, the policy of the General Government towards the red man is not only liberal but generous. He is unwilling to submit to the laws of the States, and mingle with their population. To save him from this alternative, or perhaps utter annihilation, the General Government kindly offers him a new home, and proposes to pay the whole expense of his removal and settlement.

In the consummation of a policy originating at an early period, and steadily pursued by every administration within the present century—so just to the States, and so generous to the Indians, the Executive feels it has a right to expect the co-operation of Congress, and of all good and disinterested men. The States, moreover, have a right to demand it. It was substantially a part of the compact which made them members of our confederacy. With Georgia, there is an express contract; with the new States, an implied one, of equal obligation. Why, in authorizing Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama, to form constitutions, and become separate States, did Congress include within their limits extensive tracts of Indian lands, and, in some instances, powerful Indian tribes? Was it not understood by both parties that the power of the States was to be co-extensive with their limits, and that, with all convenient despatch, the General Government should extinguish the Indian title, and remove every obstruction to the complete jurisdiction of the State Governments over the soil? Probably not one of those States would have accepted a separate existence—certainly it would never have been granted by Congress—had it been understood that they were to be confined forever to those small portions of their nominal territory, the Indian title to which had at the time been extinguished.

It is, therefore, a duty which this Government owes to the new States, to extinguish, as soon as possible, the Indian title to all lands which Congress themselves have included within their limits. When this is done, the duties of the General Government in relation to the States and Indians within their limits are at an end. The Indians may leave the State or not, as they choose. The purchase of their lands does not alter, in the least, their personal relations with the State Government. No act of the General Government has ever been deemed necessary to give the States jurisdiction over the persons of the Indians. That they possess, by virtue of their sovereign power within their own limits, in as full a manner before as after the purchase of the Indian lands; nor can this Government add to or diminish it.

May we not hope, therefore, that all good citizens, and none more zealously than those who think the Indians oppressed by subjection to the laws of the States, will unite in attempting to open the eyes of those children of the forest to their true condition, and, by a speedy removal, to relieve them from the evils, real or imaginary, present or prospective, with which they may be supposed to be threatened.

Among the numerous causes of congratulation, the condition of our impost revenue deserves special mention, inasmuch as it promises the means of extinguishing the public debt sooner than was anticipated, and furnishes a strong illustration of the practical effects of the present tariff upon our commercial interests.

The object of the tariff is objected to by some as unconstitutional; and it is considered by almost all as defective in many of its parts.

The power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely incidental to that power, that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very considerable reservation relating to their inspection laws.—This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case: this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress.

In this conclusion, I am confirmed as well by the opinions of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who have each repeatedly recommended the exercise of this right under the Constitution, as by the uniform practice of Congress, the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people.

The difficulties of a more expedient adjustment of the present tariff, although great, are far from being insurmountable. Some are unwilling to improve any of its parts, because they would destroy the whole: others fear to touch the objectionable parts, lest those they approve should be jeopardied. I am persuaded that the advocates of these conflicting views do injustice to the American people, and to their Representatives. The general interest is the interest of each: and my confidence is entire, that, to ensure the adoption of such modifications of the tariff as the general interest requires, it is only necessary that that interest should be understood.

It is an infirmity of our nature to mingle our interests and prejudices with the operation of our reasoning powers, and attribute to the objects of our likes and dislikes qualities they do not possess, and effects they cannot produce. The effects of the present tariff are doubtless overrated, both in its evils and in its advantages. By one class of reasoners, the reduced price of cotton and other agricultural products is ascribed wholly to its influence, and by another, the reduced price of manufactured articles. The probability is, that neither opinion approaches the truth, and that both are induced by that influence of interests and prejudices to which I have referred. The decrease of prices extends throughout the commercial world, embracing not only the raw material and the manufactured article, but provisions and lands. The cause must, therefore, be deeper and more pervading than the tariff of the United States. It may, in a measure, be attributable to the increased value of the precious metals, produced by a diminution of the supply, and an increase in the demand; while commerce has rapidly extended itself, and population has augmented. The supply of gold and silver, the general medium of exchange, has been greatly interrupted by civil convulsions in the countries from which they are principally drawn. A part of the effect, too, is doubtless owing to an increase of operatives and improvements in machinery. But, on the whole, it is questionable whether the reduction in the price of lands, produce, and manufactures, has been greater than the appreciation of the standard of value.

While the chief object of duties should be revenue, they may be so adjusted as to encourage manufactures. In this adjustment, however, it is the duty of the Government to be guided by the general good. Objects of national importance, alone, ought to be protected; of these the productions of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, essential to national defence, occupy the first rank. Whatever other species of domestic industry, having the importance to which I have referred, may be expected, after temporary protection, to compete with foreign labor on equal terms, merit the same attention in a subordinate degree.

The present tariff taxes some of the comforts of life unnecessarily high; it undertakes to protect interests too local and minute, to justify a general exaction; and it also attempts to force some kinds of manufactures, for which the country is not ripe. Much relief will be derived, in some of these respects, from the measures of your last session.

The best, as well as fairest mode of determining whether, from any just considerations, a particular interest ought to receive protection, would be to submit the question singly for deliberation. If, after due examination of its merits, unconnected with extraneous considerations—such as a desire to sustain a general system, or to purchase support for a different interest—it should enlist in its favor a majority of the Representatives of the people, there can be little danger of wrong or injury in adjusting the tariff, with reference to its protective effect. If this obviously just principle were honestly adhered to, the branches of industry which deserve protection, would be saved from the prejudice excited against them, when that protection forms part of a system by which portions of the country feel, or conceive themselves to be, oppressed. What is incalculably more important, the vital principle of our system—that principle which requires acquiescence in the will of the majority—would be secure from the discredit and danger to which it is exposed by the acts of majorities, founded, not on identity of conviction, but on combinations of small minorities, entered into for the purpose of mutual assistance in measures which, resting solely on their own merits, could never be carried.

I am well aware, that this is a subject of so much delicacy, on account of the extended interests it involves, as to require that it should be touched with the utmost caution; and that, while an abandonment of the policy in which it originated—a policy coeval with our Government, and pursued through successive administrations, is neither to be expected or desired, the people have a right to demand, and have demanded, that it be so modified as to correct abuses and obviate injustice.

That our deliberations on this interesting subject should be uninfluenced by those partizan conflicts that are incident to free institutions, is the fervent wish of my heart. To make this great question, which unhappily so much divides and excites the public mind, subservient to the short-sighted views of faction, must destroy all hope of settling it satisfactorily to the great body of the people, and for the general interest. I cannot, therefore, on taking leave of the subject, too earnestly for my own feelings or the common good, warn you against the blighting consequences of such a course.

According to the estimates at the Treasury Department, the receipts in the treasury during the present year will amount to twenty-four millions one hundred and sixty-one thousand and eighteen dollars, which will exceed by about three hundred thousand dollars the estimate presented in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The total expenditure during the year, exclusive of public debt, is estimated at thirteen millions seven hundred and forty-two thousand three hundred and eleven dollars; and the payment on account of public debt for the same period will have been eleven millions three hundred and fifty-four thousand six hundred and thirty dollars; leaving a balance in the treasury, on the first of January, 1831, of four millions eight hundred and nineteen thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars.

In connexion with the condition of our finances, it affords me pleasure to remark that judicious and efficient arrangements have been made by the Treasury Department for securing the pecuniary responsibility of the public officers, and the more punctual payment of the public dues. The revenue cutter service has been organized, and placed on a good footing; and, aided by an increase of inspectors at exposed points, and the regulations adopted under the act of May, 1830, for the inspection and appraisement of merchandise, have produced much improvement in the execution of the laws, and more security against the commission of frauds upon the revenue. Abuses in the allowances for fishing bounties have also been corrected, and a material saving in that branch of the service, thereby effected. In addition to these improvements, the system of expenditure for sick seamen belonging to the merchant service has been revised; and, by being rendered uniform and economical, the benefits of the fund applicable to this object have been usefully extended.

The prosperity of our country is also further evinced by the increased revenue arising from the sale of public lands, as will appear from the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the documents accompanying it, which are herewith transmitted. I beg leave to draw your attention to this report, and to the propriety of making early appropriations for the objects which it specifies.

Your attention is again invited to the subjects connected with that portion of the public interests entrusted to the War Department. Some of them were referred to in my former message; and they are presented in detail in the report of the Secretary of War, herewith submitted. I refer you, also to the report of that officer for a knowledge of the state of the Army, fortifications, arsenals, and Indian affairs; all of which, it will be perceived, have been guarded with zealous attention and care. It is worth of your consideration whether the armaments necessary for the fortifications on our maritime frontier, which are now, or shortly will be, completed, should not be in readiness sooner than the customary appropriations will enable the Department to provide them. This precaution seems to be due to the general system of fortification which has been sanctioned by Congress, and is recommended by that maxim of wisdom which tells us in peace to prepare for war.

I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Navy for a highly satisfactory account of the manner in which the concerns of that Department have been conducted during the present year. Our position in relation to the most powerful nations of the earth, and the present condition of Europe, admonish us to cherish this arm of our national defence with peculiar care. Separated by wide seas from all those Governments whose power we might have reason to dread, we have nothing to apprehend from attempts at conquest. It is chiefly attacks upon our commerce, and harassing incursions upon our coast, against which we have to guard. A naval force adequate to the protection of our commerce, always afloat, with an accumulation of the means to give it a rapid extension in case of need, furnishes the power by which all such aggressions may be prevented or repelled. The attention of the Government has, therefore, been recently directed more to preserving the public vessels already built, and providing materials to be placed in dépôt for future use, than to increasing their number. With the aid of Congress, in a few years, the Government will be prepared, in case of emergency, to put afloat a powerful Navy of new ships almost as soon as old ones could be repaired.

The modifications in this part of the service suggested in my last annual message, which are noticed more in detail in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, are again recommended to your serious attention.

The report of the Postmaster General, in like manner, exhibits a satisfactory view of the important branch of the Government under his charge. In addition to the benefits already secured by the operations of the Post-office Department, considerable improvements, within the present year, have been made, by an increase in the accommodation afforded by stage coaches, and in the frequency and celerity of the mail between some of the most important points of the Union.

Under the late contracts, improvements have been provided for the southern section of the country, and, at the same time, an annual saving made of upwards of seventy thousand dollars. Notwithstanding the excess of expenditure beyond the current receipts for a few years past, necessarily incurred in the fulfilment of existing contracts, and in the additional expenses, between the periods of contracting, to meet the demands created by the rapid growth and extension of our flourishing country, yet the satisfactory assurance is given, that the future revenue of the Department will be sufficient to meet its extensive engagements. The system recently introduced, that subjects its receipts and disbursements to strict regulation, has entirely fulfilled its design. It gives full assurance of the punctual transmission, as well as the security, of the funds of the Department. The efficiency and industry of its officers, and the ability and energy of contractors, justify an increased confidence in its continued prosperity.

The attention of Congress was called, on a former occasion, to the necessity of such a modification of the office of Attorney General of the United States as would render it more adequate to the wants of the public service. This resulted in the establishment of the office of Solicitor of the Treasury; and the earliest measures were taken to give effect to the provisions of the law which authorized the appointment of that officer, and defined his duties. But it is not believed that this provision, however useful in itself, is calculated to supersede the necessity of extending the duties and powers of the Attorney General's office. On the contrary, I am convinced that the public interest would be greatly promoted by giving to that officer the general superintendence of the various law agents of the Government, and of all law proceedings, whether civil or criminal, in which the United States may be interested; allowing to him, at the same time, such a compensation as would enable him to devote his undivided attention to the public business. I think such a provision is alike due to the public and to the officer.

Occasions of reference from the different Executive Departments to the Attorney General are of frequent occurrence; and the prompt decision of the questions so referred, tends much to facilitate the despatch of business in those Departments. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, hereto appended, shows also a branch of the public service not specifically entrusted to any officer, which might be advantageously committed to the Attorney General.

But, independently of those considerations this office is now one of daily duty. It was originally organized, and its compensation fixed, with a view to occasional service, leaving to the incumbent time for the exercise of his profession in private practice. The state of things which warranted such an organization no longer exists. The frequent claims upon the services of this officer would render his absence from the Seat of Government, in professional attendance upon the courts, injurious to the public service; and the interests of the Government could not fail to be promoted by charging him with the general superintendence of all its legal concerns.

Under a strong conviction of the justness of these suggestions, I recommend it to Congress to make the necessary provisions for giving effect to them, and to place the Attorney General, in regard to compensation, on the same footing with the heads of the several Executive Departments. To this officer might also be intrusted a cognizance of the cases of insolvency in public debtors, especially if the views which I submitted on this subject last year should meet the approbation of Congress—to which I again solicit your attention.

Your attention is respectfully invited to the situation of the District of Columbia. Placed, by the Constitution, under the exclusive jurisdiction and control of Congress, this District is certainly entitled to a much greater share of its consideration than it has yet received. There is a want of uniformity in its laws, particularly in those of a penal character, which increases the expense of their administration, and subject the people to all the inconveniences which result from the operation of different codes in so small a territory. On different sides of the Potomac, the same offence is punishable in unequal degrees; and the peculiarities of many of the early laws of Maryland and Virginia remain in force, notwithstanding their repugnance, in some cases, to the improvements which have superseded them in those States.

Besides a remedy for these evils, which is loudly called for, it is respectfully submitted whether a provision, authorizing the election of a Delegate, to represent the wants of the citizens of this District on the floor of Congress, is not due to them, and to the character of our Government. No portion of our citizens should be without a practical enjoyment of the principles of freedom; and there is none more important than that which cultivates a proper relation between the governors and the governed. Imperfect as this must be in this case, yet it is believed that it would be greatly improved by a representation in Congress, with the same privileges that are allowed to that of the other Territories of the United States.

The penitentiary is ready for the reception of convicts, and only awaits the necessary legislation to put it into operation; as one object of which I beg leave to recal to your attention the propriety of providing suitable compensation for the officers charged with its inspection.

The importance of the principles involved in the inquiry, whether it will be proper to recharter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of Congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen, in any degree, the dangers which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution, as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present Bank through the agency of a Bank of the United States so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections.

It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposits, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government, and the expenses of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium. Not being a corporate body, having no stockholders, debtors, or property, and but few officers, it would not be obnoxious to the constitutional objections which are urged against the present bank; and having no means to operate on the hopes, fears, or interests of large masses of the community, it would be shorn of the influence which makes that bank formidable. The States would be strengthened by having in their hands the means of furnishing the local paper currency through their own banks; while the Bank of the United States, though issuing no paper, would check the issues of the State banks, by taking their notes in deposit, and for exchange, only so long as they continue to be redeemed with specie. In times of public emergency, the capacities of such an institution might be enlarged by legislative provisions.

These suggestions are made, not so much as a recommendation, as with a view of calling the attention of Congress to the possible modifications of a system which cannot continue to exist in its present form without occasional collisions with the local authorities, and perpetual apprehensions and discontent on the part of the States and the people.

In conclusion, fellow-citizens, allow me to invoke, in behalf of your deliberations, that spirit of conciliation and disinterestedness which is the gift of patriotism. Under an overruling and merciful Providence, the agency of this spirit has thus far been signalized in the prosperity and glory of our beloved country. May its influence be eternal.

ANDREW JACKSON.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, DEC. 1, 1830.

To the President of the United States.

SIR: I have the honor to make known to you the operations of this Department during the present year, and to offer such suggestions as appear to me necessary to be presented. The Army, at the different positions it has occupied along our western and southern frontiers, has been engaged in preserving quiet in those quarters, and has fully succeeded. Fears were entertained of a serious rupture with some of our northwestern tribes of Indians; but the presence of a military force, and the exercise of a proper discretion on the part of those to whom the trust of reconciling them was confided, has had the effect to prevent it, and peace has been the consequence. Similar apprehensions have recently been entertained of the Indians who reside on our southwestern boundary, and precautionary steps have been taken to prevent any acts of hostility. The vigilance, intelligence, and discretion, of our officers, induce a belief that, by their exertions, these distant tribes can be retained at peace with each other. Occasional interruptions have arisen from marauding parties, who range through the forest, and, at points distant from our posts, commit depredations: these acts, in turn, produce retaliation. It is important to prohibit these aggressions, if possible, though no other plan can be suggested that what has already, heretofore, been presented, viz: an authority to employ a detachment of mounted troops. These, ranging through the country at irregular periods, would do much more towards preserving peace with our Indian tribes, and quiet along our borders, than could be effected through any augmentation of our posts.

I regret to say that desertions from the Army are not of less frequent occurrence than heretofore. The number, for the present year, will exceed one thousand. Various efforts have been made, and many theories suggested, to arrest an evil so injurious to the operations and character of an Army. None have succeeded! The benevolent intention of the act of Congress of last winter, which took from the offence the penalty of death, and in obedience to the spirit of which all past offences of the kind were by you directed to be forgiven, has had no restraining, no salutary effect. I am not an advocate for the severity of penalties. The hope of reward, more frequently than the fear of punishment, operates beneficially upon mankind. A resort to both might be serviceable. While penalties corresponding with the nature of the offence might be imposed upon delinquents, the faithful and good soldier should be cheered with the expectation of reward. To this end, an authority to make some reasonable compensation to those who obtain an honorable discharge should be granted. In conformity to this opinion, I would take occasion to suggest, that, while some adequate penalty be imposed for so gross a violation of duty as that of abandoning a service voluntarily assumed, it may also be provided that the soldier who serves faithfully, and is honorably discharged, shall receive, at the termination of his enlistment, one hundred and twenty dollars. Let him receive, instead of his present pay, four dollars per month, retaining the residue, payable at the end of service. The difference in expense thus created to the Government, for the five years of enlistment, would be but sixty dollars; which increase, it is hoped and believed, will be more than compensated for by a saving in the expenses which are incurred under the present system of restraining desertion. The amount retained should be forfeited if, at any time, the soldier desert the service. It might operate as a strong incentive to good conduct, and would serve as a fund at the close of his engagement, by which to establish him in some advantageous pursuit. By the present mode, he retires from the Army dependent and poor as he entered; and often, instead of returning for a time to his family, enters the Army contrary to his inclination, induced only by his poverty and wants. Dissatisfaction takes place, and desertion follows.

Repeated efforts have been made to arrest this growing evil; and they should be continued, so long as there is a hope of remedy. The loss to the service is not so material. The great fear is, that, in peace, the practice may become so frequent and familiar as in war to lose that odium which should attach to so aggravated an offence.

Recently, by an order from the War Department, the whiskey part of the ration has been taken away, with a view to ascertain how far a theory frequently introduced might be practically productive of benefit. Time has not been afforded to test the experiment; but little confidence is reposed in the attempt. If the plan suggested—the giving enlarged compensation to the non-commissioned officers—which every soldier may aspire to be—shall fail to produce a remedy, I know not what other can be attempted with any reasonable prospect of success. In peace the soldier is not stimulated by that buoyancy which in war induces him to aspire to promotion through gallantry and good conduct. To be a non-commissioned officer is all that he can hope for or expect. To place this class of officers on a more advantageous and respectable footing, for the purpose of exciting a spirit of emulation amongst the soldiers, might prove highly serviceable. The subject, being one of importance, is at least worthy of consideration and experiment.

Connected with the Army is the Military Academy at West Point. The beneficial effects which have been produced to the country already, and the more enlarged ones which are in prospect from this valuable institution, render it matter of importance that it should be maintained upon its present liberal plan and principles. The education of two hundred and fifty young gentlemen, selected from every State in the Union, cannot fail to carry with it general advantages and benefits correspondent to the demands it produces on the Treasury. But, apart from this, the education obtained there being of a military character, the benefits diffused through every section of our country cannot but prove highly salutary when it shall again be involved in war. The information which is acquired there is carried to the several States: these young men become officers of militia; and, in time, through the means thus afforded, something approaching to uniformity in the discipline of our militia may be expected. The able report of the Board of Examiners at the last commencement, which accompanies this report, will present in detail the progress and advantages of the institution.

By the act of 1818, the President of the United States is authorized to confer upon the graduates of this academy the appointment of brevet lieutenants. Already there are 87 supernumerary officers thus created, who cannot now be provided for in the line of the Army. In June next there will probably be 33 more added, which will produce an excess of 14 over the number authorized. The law prohibits brevet appointments of a greater number than 106—one for each company; of course, upon a reasonable calculation, but few, if any, of the cadets, after June, 1831, will be entitled to a brevet commission. I would respectfully suggest whether some rule different from the present be not necessary to restrict for the future lieutenant appointments, retaining only so many as might supply the probable vacancies which occur within the year. The number of promotions to the Army from this corps, for the last five years, has averaged about 22 annually; while the number of graduates for the same period has been at an average of 40. This excess, which is annually increasing, has placed 87 in waiting until vacancies shall take place, and shows that, in the next year probably, and in the succeeding one certainly, there will be an excess beyond what the existing law authorizes to be commissioned. There will then be 106 supernumerary brevet second lieutenants appurtenant to the Army, at an annual expense to the Government of $80,000.

In the Engineer Department, important operations, as regards the internal improvement of the country, have been in successful progress. The advantages to our commerce from the improvements which have been made in the navigation of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, have already been sensibly felt; and great good to the community at large is to be anticipated from further efforts. The experiments begun, and, in some respects, completed, show, that, at an inconsiderable annual expense, the Ohio river may be cleared of its bars and shoals, so as to afford a convenient and safe navigation at those seasons of the year when, heretofore, it has been considered impracticable.

This subject well merits the attention of the Government. These rivers pass through an immense and fertile region of our country, the products of which contribute essentially to advance our commercial interest. An inconsiderable expenditure from the public Treasury will have the effect to give security to a commerce which at present is carried on at much hazard, and, by diminishing the insurance now required, and preventing losses, speedily reimburse to the community the cost which has been incurred, and the expense which may be required. At present the imports to the West are mainly along these rivers, and the export trade almost entirely. Usually, for six months in the year, one of these (the Ohio) ceases to be useful, because of the numerous obstructions, and consequent hazards, which are presented at those times when the waters are materially reduced. The inconvenience and risk thus felt are susceptible of such easy remedy, and at so small an expense, that it becomes matter of surprise that improvements so important and valuable to a large community should have been so long overlooked or neglected. The necessity of improving the navigation of these rivers for commercial purposes, all admit; of the practicability of effecting it, none can doubt. The experiment lately made, through a most difficult obstruction at a place called the Grand Chain, conclusively tests the feasibility of improving other places, and shows that the expense will be inconsiderable. As it regards this branch of the subject, however, it appears to me that the importance and value of the thing to be done, is of infinitely greater consequence than any apprehension of charge which it may occasion to the Treasury.

The breakwater situated at the mouth of the Delaware river is another valuable improvement, which, within the last year, has been rapidly progressing. The work has already risen above the water, and furnished evidence of its importance to our commerce. During the violent gale of last September, several vessels which lay under the protection of this work were preserved. The force of the sea being broken by its opposition, they were enabled to keep at their moorings, and to ride out the gale in safety. Fifteen other vessels in view, not possessing the advantages of this position, were driven on shore, and lost, or gotten off at much expense. A few years will complete this valuable work. The attention it has received since it was placed in charge of the Quartermaster's Department by your direction, and the advantages already derived from it, give proof of the propriety of its completion, and of the numerous benefits it must afford to commerce. At this heretofore hazardous part of our coast navigation, a security will be afforded which, in a few years, may occasion a saving of property which will amply compensate for the cost incurred in its construction.

The Ordnance Department is progressing as rapidly as the means afforded will permit, in arming the militia of the States, and in preparing the necessary guns and carriages for garnishing the different fortresses of the country. It is worthy of consideration whether the appropriation applicable to this service should not be increased, so as to provide a suitable armament by the time the different fortifications along the coast shall be completed. For the forts which are finished, a million of dollars will be necessary; but besides these, others are in progress, and will shortly be completed. With the annual appropriation of $100,000 towards this purpose, it will require ten years to accomplish the object for those which are in readiness. Should we be blessed with peace, no injury will arise; but should war take place, the effects upon our country would be of a serious and prejudicial character.

In all the disbursing branches connected with the War Department, I am happy to say that punctuality and fidelity have strictly, and almost without exception, been regarded during the year.

A new era in the history of this country has, within a few years, arisen in relation to Indian affairs. Under the act of 1802, and the practices of the Government resulting therefrom, principles have been introduced, the correctness of which deserves serious consideration. By this act it is prohibited to any one to settle upon Indian lands, or to enter their territory; and, for its execution, the President is authorized and directed to employ the "military force" of the country.

It is worthy of reflection how far this act (as circumstances exist) is to be considered within the pale of the Constitution, and obligatory upon the authorities of the Government. Before the States were members of this Union, they were sovereign. The United States Government can legitimately exercise those rights only with which the States parted under their general compact. To regulate their internal municipal authority is a privilege which has not been surrendered: Amongst those rights is the indisputable one of controlling their citizens and governing them after their own mode, with this exception, that a republican form of Government is to be secured to each. The States, being independent and sovereign within their own limits, can admit no check upon their sovereignty, whether, in its exercise, it affects one citizen or another—the white or the red man. By courtesy, the laws have been withheld from an interference with the Indians within a State; and that which heretofore was mere courtesy is now insisted upon as a matter of paramount constitutional right. Surely this cannot be correct according to our notions and system of Government; and, if wrong, the act of 1802, from the moment the laws are extended over a State over Indian territory, must cease to be operative. Reciprocity is always fair and just; and hence the law which would make it penal for a white man to tread unlicensed upon soil held through Indian occupancy, should equally restrain the Indian from entering upon the domain of the white man. So far as existing treaties operate, the United States possess the power to concede this or any other privilege, because treaties, whether well or ill made, are the supreme law of the land; but they should be such as are permitted to be entered into by the Constitution, and which do not affect the rights of a State beyond what her consent in becoming a member of the Union has sanctioned and authorized. Every thing beyond this is usurpation.

Under the authority confided by you, during last summer, I visited some of the Indian tribes, with a highly valuable auxiliary, General John Coffee, of Alabama, and made known to them their situation. With the Choctaws and Chickasaws, (the only tribes with whom we negotiated,) treaties were concluded. From all appearances, they were well satisfied with their own decision, and the course which we pursued towards them. If any different feeling has since been incited, it is the work of persons who have sought, through the channels of their ignorance, to persuade them to the belief that great injustice has been practised. I undertake to assure you, that, in all we did, the utmost fairness and candor were practised. We sought, through persuasion only, to satisfy them that their situation called loudly for serious reflection. Pending the negotiation, no secret meetings were had, no bribes were offered, nor promises made. Every argument adduced, or suggestion offered, was in open council, and in view of those whose rights were to be affected. Of this, abundant evidence exists, whatever may be said to the contrary. There was no motive to impose upon or to deceive them. Our instructions forbade us to do so, and our inclination, beside, was an ample restraint. The treaties concluded are ready for submission; and how far any practised injustice or want of liberality can be imputed, will be fairly judged of when their tenor and condition shall be disclosed. If a liberality ample and generous has not been regarded, our wishes have failed, and our judgments been mistaken.

During this period I witnessed much of Indian character, their progress, refinement, and march towards civilization, and can well say, that, in conducting the negotiation every thing was done to retain them in those pursuits which should tend to their advancement, and to which their situation could reasonably lay claim. Those who so zealously have espoused their cause, and who affect seriousness, or are moved by mistaken considerations of kindness. But, as mankind are found to differ even upon essential matters of faith, and their ultimate results, I can well imagine that, in reference to such a subject as the present, honest differences of opinion may be expected, and will arise. Yet, before a desire be adopted, earnestly, to retain these people at their present homes, we should be careful not to receive mere impressions for facts, but rather to hear the suggestions of truth and reason. We should look to the red men as they are, and not as oftentimes they are represented to be; to their inaptitude to live under a well regulated system of law, and to the danger and hazard of the experiment. A few of them are well informed men, and capable of enjoying refined society. These are the mixed Indian—the half breed, as they are usually termed. Scarcely any of the others speak our language, or are acquainted with the principles of our Government. Little hope should be entertained, even by those most sanguine on the subject, that any material advances in civilization can be made with the present generation—those, I mean, who are now at maturity in life. Care and attention towards the rising generation may tend greatly to improve, and in time to meliorate, their present condition. To turn them to industry is of first importance. Labor is never an acceptable pursuit to Indians. In their unimproved state, a fondness for war and the chase, and oratory at their councils, constitute their leading traits, because these afford the highest distinction. When, through the influence of culture and education, their taste upon these subjects shall be changed, and the character of an industrious agriculturist be held in higher estimation than dexterity of pursuit in the chase, then may they be expected to resort to industry, and give attention to the duties of agriculture. Indisposition to manual labor, so peculiarly the characteristic of an Indian, causes him to select the poorest grounds, because of the ease with which the timber is felled and cleared away. The exceptions which exist to this are principally amongst those of mixed Indian blood, whose habits have been improved, and whose minds have been cultivated.

There are three divisions in the Choctaw nation, each of which is governed by a chief, who, within his limits, acts independently of the others. In his government he is aided by minor and subordinate chiefs, called captains, each of whom acts within his particular district. The people are subordinate to the captains, the captains to the chiefs. One of these divisions composes what is called the Christian District; the chief of which is a man of good mind, with a common English education, and is religious. His people, too, are seemingly pious. Each night, pending the negotiation, until a late hour, they were at their exercises, singing and preaching. From every information, this Christian party, as it is termed, are not accurately and correctly informed as to the principles and faith upon which they profess to act. A future state of rewards and punishments for virtues or for crimes is fashioned by their standard of savage life, and its enjoyments; and, in their imagination, is made to conform to what they conceive to be essential to constitute happiness or misery here. Judging from their devotional conduct, they are, to all appearances, a religious people. Certainly there are some perceptible and beneficial changes amongst them. They have become mostly an agricultural people. The practice of perforating the nose and ears for the purpose of ornamenting them is rapidly disappearing, and considered a rude custom. Vermillion paint, to ornament and to decorate the face, is, in a great measure, given up. A credulity in supernatural agency, in witches, and in witchcraft, is fast yielding; and the use of ardent spirits, particularly in one of the districts, is in a great measure abandoned. A reasonable hope may be entertained that these people may, in time, prove that the zeal and efforts of the Government to protect and civilize them are not improperly bestowed.

In concluding a treaty with these people, candor and fairness were the only means resorted to by the commissioners. They were given to understand distinctly, that, in coming to visit them at their solicitation, and at their homes, no design was entertained beyond communicating to them a knowledge of their true condition, and submitting to their judgment the course of policy by them to be pursued. We told them the opinion entertained by the Government as to the authority of Mississippi to extend over them her laws; and that the United States possessed not the power to prevent it. The interviews had with them were in open council, where were present the chiefs and warriors, and some of our own citizens. Arguments addressed to their judgments were the means employed. No threat was used; no intimidation attempted. Under these circumstances, a treaty was concluded and signed, more than five thousand Indians being in attendance at the time.—Amongst them was great apparent unanimity. Some did object and were dissatisfied, but not as it regarded the general policy of treating, but because they believed themselves entitled to obtain, and were solicitous to procure large reservations. The number thus influenced was small. Since that time, active efforts have been made in the nation to induce dissatisfaction amongst the Indians, and to persuade them that they had been greatly deceived and imposed upon.

An old chief (Mushulatubbee,) who was favorable to the treaty, by a few of the discontented of his district, has been recently deposed, and the name of another sent to this office to receive recognition. The design is probably to show that the people are displeased because he signed the treaty. The answer returned to their application was, that, while the Government meant not to interfere with their mode or manner of self-government, it could not recognize what had been done by a few; yet, when a chief should be chosen by a majority of the division, and the fact so certified by their General Council, he would be regarded as properly chosen, and be considered as such. An examination of this treaty will clearly show, I think, that justice and liberality have been regarded. The great majority of the nation were satisfied when we left them; and, from information since received, yet continue to be satisfied. Their anxious desire is, to get to a country under the protection of the United States, where they can be free from any liability to State laws, and be able to dwell in peace under their own customs.

The Commissioners appointed to further the execution of the treaty of Butte des Morts have discharged the trust confided to them, and have made their report. The misunderstanding between the New York and Green Bay Indians has been examined and adjusted; the report to be confirmed, only requires your approval, agreeably to the second article of that treaty.

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. EATON.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 6, 1830.

The following report of the transactions of the Navy of the United States during the present year, with a view of the several subjects connected with its interests, is respectfully laid before the President of the United States.

The state of the Navy, since the communication made to you in December last, has been, generally, favorable to its active exertions in the important pursuits in which it has been engaged. No distressing casualty or marked calamity has assailed it since the loss of the sloop of war Hornet; information of which lamented event was received prior to the adjournment of the last session of Congress.

The active force employed within the year has not been essentially varied from that kept in service for several years past. This consists of five frigates, ten sloops of war, and four schooners: of these, the most efficient squadron, composed of two frigates and four sloops, has been required to cruise in the Mediterranean sea, where, from the large interest engaged in mercantile adventures to the several States on its coasts, its presence was deemed of most importance. This has continued under the command of Com. Biddle. Two of the vessels composing it have been relieved, their terms of service having expired, and their places supplied by the sloops of war Concord and Boston; the former being first ordered to convey the United States' Minister to Russia, and the latter to take the United States' Consul General to the Barbary Powers.

The state of these vessels has been represented to be, in point of order and preparation for service, every way worthy of approbation, and the discipline exact, without rigor—promising all required efficiency in its force. Under the command of this able and vigilant officer, all the necessary protection has been given to the trade in that quarter, no case having come to the knowledge of the Department of injuries from piratical attacks; and, with the several States and sovereignties bordering on its coasts, the best understanding has been preserved. This squadron continues to rendezvous at the port of Mahon, in the Island of Minorca, a privilege which has been conceded by the Government of Spain, affording great conveniences to the United States' squadrons, especially at seasons when their safety would be endangered by remaining at sea. Here they enjoy a respite from the labors and the dangers of the ocean, in a climate mild and favorable to the restoration of the health of their crews, after long and laborious service at sea.

Other changes in the vessels employed in this sea are contemplated during the next year, but the force is not proposed to be diminished; nor, in the present agitated condition of the contiguous States, could this be done, without subjecting the commercial enterprises of the country to the casualties attending a state of warfare, should such be the unhappy result of the present hostile indications in that quarter.

The squadron appointed to cruise on the coasts of Brazil and Buenos Ayres, and on the Pacific Ocean has been steadily engaged in guarding the United States' mercantile interests on these coasts. This service has been performed with fidelity and success; and the flag of the Union now gives full security to the merchandise it is authorized to introduce and exchange with the respective countries to which it is carried.

The cessation of hostilities between the States of Chili and Peru and the mother country, and between Brazil and Buenos Ayres, has greatly favored the advances of trade, and diminished the hazards of mercantile adventure with every part of the South American continent. But the unstable and inefficient Governments of a part of these States forbid the idea that this can be long enjoyed, without embarrassments and vexatious interruptions, unless it shall be sustained by the presence of an active protecting force. It cannot, consequently, be believed to be consistent with good policy to lessen the efficiency of this force.

Several of the vessels composing these two squadrons will be relieved in the course of the next year, preparation for that purpose being in active progress. It is also contemplated to make some changes in the description of force to be employed on the Atlantic coast of South America, adapting it better for the harbors it is forced to look to for security against the tempestuous weather so often experienced on these coasts.

In a former communication made to you, it was noticed that the sloop of war Vincennes, commanded by Captain Finch, which had composed one of the squadron in the Pacific ocean, had been directed, after the expiration of the term limited for the cruise on the coasts of Chili and Peru, to touch at the Marquesas Society, and Sandwich Islands; and, after spending the necessary time in looking to the United States' commercial concerns in that quarter, to take Canton, &c., in the way, and thence, by the Cape of Good Hope, pursue the usual route to the United States.

This order has been faithfully executed: the ship has returned in good condition, with its crew well disciplined, and in excellent health.

The particulars of this voyage are given in the Report of Captain Finch. These have a claim to the attention of the public, from the information afforded on many points relating to the character and habits of a people just emerging from a state of simplicity and ignorance, and, from their peculiar locality, necessarily controlling the comforts of the large number of the United States' citizens who annually visit them.

The great amount of tonnage and capital employed in whale fisheries, in the adjoining seas, makes its convenient prosecution a matter of no inconsiderable concern to the nation.

The necessity, also, for repose after the long voyages required by this trade, and the want of supplies for health and convenience, and repairs of the vessels, render these islands places of general rendezvous; and it is consequently of great importance, that the most friendly intercourse be maintained with the inhabitants. Captain Finch, by his judicious and conciliatory deportment, has probably secured a long continuance of kindly treatment to his countrymen from these people, and has added greatly to the prospects of a successful termination of their enterprises.

Some extracts from this report are herewith transmitted, marked A.

The squadron which has been maintained in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico consists, at present, of four sloops of war and three schooners, under the command of Commodore Elliott. Several changes have been made in the vessels employed on this station, in consequence of the expiration of the terms of service of the crews, or the want of repairs of the vessels. No causes are supposed to exist making it necessary to add to this force; nor can it be safely diminished, though the energy and activity with which it has guarded the United States' trade, may be said, for the present, effectually to have suppressed piratical aggression.

The great facilities afforded by the inlets and harbors of the islands in the Mexican gulf for the resort and concealment of the vessels engaged in the commission of piracies; the class of population with which these islands abound, composed of refugees and outlaws, escaped from the punishment due for crimes committed in other countries, give advantages for piratical enterprises scarcely known in any other quarter of the globe. Nothing short of the exertion of positive and continued force can be expected to keep these marauders in check, and give the desired security to trade.

The invasion, which took place during the last year, of the territories of the Mexican States, by an armament from the island of Cuba, having given ground for apprehension that the United States' trade to these States might suffer from the pretexts afforded by this state of conflict between the two countries, an act was passed at the last session of Congress authorizing the employment of some additional force upon that station. In conformity to the provisions of that act, the frigate Brandywine, under the command of Captain Ballard, was equipped and despatched for that coast, and continued for several months to cruise in its vicinity. Whatever danger might have threatened the trade in that quarter, has been effectually parried by the means taken for its protection; and this ship, after returning to the United States for necessary refitments, has since sailed to join the Mediterranean squadron and relieve the frigate Java.

It is believed that great advantages might be derived from changing, to a certain extent, the description of naval force employed in the West Indies, especially for the suppression of piracy.

The proposed change would consist of the substitution of three schooners in lieu of one of the sloops of war now employed in that service.

Vessels of this force would be fully able to cope with and capture any piratical cruiser which might be expected to be encountered on this station; and they would possess the greater advantage of multiplying, by the increased number of the squadron, the chances of discovering the enemy, while their structure and inferior size would diminish the risk of being known in their approaches. Their lighter draft of water would favor the pursuit into the obscure recesses and haunts of these cruisers, and give the important facility of entering many of the harbors on the Mexican gulf, for security against the frequent hurricanes prevailing in tropical climates.

It is respectfully recommended that an appropriation be made for building the proposed number and description of vessels.

The health of the officers and crew of the United States' vessels of war has been generally good, and uninterrupted by the attacks of the epidemic and malignant fevers which are so readily engendered in tropical climates, and which exert such fatal influence on the constitutions of persons not familiarized to a residence in them. This may be ascribed, in some degree, to the improved system of ventilation, and the great neatness observed in the economy of vessels of war, and the adaptation of the diet and dress of the crews to the temperature of the coasts and countries where their duties are to be performed. The modern discoveries in chemical science have also been resorted to, to preserve the mariner from the attacks of these fatal maladies. Several communications have been received from the Surgical Department of the Navy, by whom experiments on the chloride of lime were ordered to be made, giving the results of their observations on its powers in preventing the generation of such diseases.

From these a few extracts have been taken, and are herewith transmitted, marked B.

These furnish subjects for congratulation to the friends of the improvement of the condition of the seaman's life, and indicate that the period is not remote when a service in the climates of the torrid zone will no longer be the terror of nautical men, but will be performed with as fair a prospect of exemption from disease as is now experienced in the temperate latitudes.

It is to be regretted that an exception to this general healthfulness of the Navy has been experienced in one of the vessels of the West India squadron.

From the communications of Commodore Elliott, it appears that the yellow fever made its appearance on board the sloop of war Peacock some time in the month of June last, and that it continued to harass the crew of that vessel after its return to Pensacola, in September; nor were its attacks intermitted until it had deprived the service of four valuable officers, and of several seamen.

It is worthy of remark, that, on board this vessel, the powerful preventive agent above-mentioned was not used, the surgeon relying, for the preservation of the health of the crew, on the superior cleanliness and well ventilated state of the vessel.

The Commissioners of the Navy Board, interpreting the act making an appropriation for the repairs of vessels in ordinary, and the wear and tear of vessels in commission, as admitting a greater latitude in its application to naval purposes, than, it is believed, was contemplated by the framers of the law, or was admissible by a fair construction of its terms, have caused to be built, out of that fund, a new sloop of war, in the place of the "John Adams," which had been found defective in the model, and otherwise unfit for repair.

This subject was referred to your consideration; and, in conformity to your decision, an order has been issued, requiring that, in future, the application of this fund shall be confined to the repairs of vessels in ordinary, and the wear and tear of vessels in commission; and that no vessels shall be built or rebuilt, unless authorized by a specific appropriation.

The condition of the Navy hospitals at most of the Navy yards in the United States is entirely deficient in the means of giving accommodation to the invalids of the Navy who may be so unfortunate as to require it. At most of these places, the only provision made for their comfort during illness is some temporary shelter or old building, possessing no one of the requisites necessary for this purpose. The mariner who returns after long and faithful service in distant and uncongenial climates, finds no asylum prepared for his reception and recovery from diseases incident to such service, but is compelled to linger out his life in crowded and confined apartments, even less favorable to his restoration than the hold of the vessel from which he has been discharged.

The funds which have accrued from the monthly deductions of the pay of the Navy, and the several appropriations made by Congress, have been expended in the erection of two magnificent buildings, neither of which has been finished, and but one of them (at Norfolk, Va.) is applicable to, or designed for, the accommodation of the sick. For several years to come, there cannot be such an accumulation of Navy hospital capital as will enable the Commissioners of that fund to engage in the construction of other useful and permanent buildings for these objects.

At Pensacola, to the mild and salubrious climate of which the invalids of the Navy look with so much anxiety as a place of refuge and restoration from tropical pestilence, there is no building which will even protect the sufferers from the inclemencies of the weather, much less secure to them the conveniences and comforts which their situation demands.

At New York, and at Charlestown, Massachusetts, the necessary lands have been purchased with the Navy hospital funds for the erection of buildings for the use of the sick, and are in every respect favorably situated for affording the advantages which such establishments should possess.

These sites, in the vicinity of stations which are of so much importance to the Navy, from the number of efficient recruits enlisted at them for its service, remain unimproved, and unprovided with the buildings that are indispensable for the welfare of the invalid.

The laws passed at the last and preceding sessions of Congress for the gradual improvement of the Navy, the protection of the ships in ordinary, and for the preservation of the materials for naval purposes collected at the different Navy Yards, have received a due share of the attention of the Department.

The construction of the two dry-docks authorized under the first of these acts, at Boston and Norfolk, is progressing. The one at Boston is now in such a state of advancement as to induce the expectation that it may be brought into operation during the ensuing year, or early in 1832. The completion of these two laborious and expensive works will mark an important advance in the progress of our naval improvements. Repairing the ships of war of the larger classes, hitherto a work of so much labor, expense, and hazard, will by the conveniences afforded of these docks, be rendered comparatively easy, and may be executed, not only without risk and at far less cost than formerly, but in a manner better securing both the strength and durability of the ship. Paper marked C, annexed, contains information in detail on this subject.

Extensive houses have been prepared for the reception of materials provided under this act, and other buildings are in progress, which will give complete protection to the large stores now deposited at the different yards, and those which are to be delivered under existing contracts.

The necessary examinations required by this act, to determine the practicability and expediency of erecting a marine railway, at the Navy Yard, Pensacola, have been made by one of the United States' Engineers.

The views of this officer on this subject were laid before the Board of Navy Commissioners, and they have expressed the opinion that it is not expedient or proper, under the restrictions and conditions imposed by the act, to cause the construction of this desirable improvement to be attempted.

It is indispensable, however, that some facility should be afforded at this most convenient position for the repairs of the vessels of war engaged in the West India service. It is proposed that a wharf suitable for these purposes should be built, in place of the contemplated rail-way; and the necessary estimates for its erection are in readiness to be transmitted.

Further efforts have been made for the execution of this act as far as it relates to the preservation of the live oak growing on the coasts of the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico.

By the fourth section of this act, the President is authorized to provide for the preservation of this timber; but it seems to have been intended that the power should be limited to that object. An interpretation of the law has, heretofore, been entertained, extending this power not only to the planting of the acorns, and the cultivation of plantations of young trees, but to the purchase from individuals of lands producing them. The paper accompanying this, marked D, shows the amount which has been expended on these plantations, and the sums which have been paid to individuals for the purchase of tracts of such land.

When it is considered that this timber is the natural product of the coast of the United States from the St. Mary's to the Sabine: that the greater part of this belongs to the United States, and is proposed to be retained with a view to preserving a supply of this important material for the Navy, it can scarcely be necessary for the present to engage in its artificial propagation or culture.

Under an impression that this system is neither expedient, nor in conformity to the intentions of the act, an order has been given to discontinue the works after the expiration of the present year.

But the preservation of this timber is an object of great importance, and should be prosecuted with an active and undeviating purpose.

In aid of those measures which have been heretofore resorted to, a vessel of such draft of water as was adapted to the navigation of the rivers and creeks of the coasts of Florida, and the Gulf of Mexico, has been selected and fitted out, and the command given to a vigilant and enterprising officer of the Navy, who has been required to visit, from time to time, as the season or circumstances would permit, every section of these coasts, and to use the utmost efforts to suppress further depredations upon the public interests. Surveyors and agents have also been directed to explore such parts of the coast as abound with the live oak, to designate the boundaries between private and public claims to land, and to mark out such tracts as they may think it most conducive to the public interest should be reserved for sale.

The accompanying report of the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, marked E, shows the several sums which have been paid in carrying into effect the act of 3d March, 1819, and other acts, making appropriation for supporting and removing certain persons of color from the United States to the coast of Africa. It appears from this statement, that, under authority of these acts, 252 persons of this description have been removed to the settlement provided by the Colonization Society on the coast of Africa; and that there has been expended there for the sum of two hundred and sixty-four thousand seven hundred and ten dollars.

These several acts appear to have been passed in a spirit of justice and benevolence, to repair, as far as possible, the injuries inflicted by the citizens of the United States upon the defenceless persons who are the subjects of the African slave trade; and the appropriations have been made with a liberality corresponding with the humane intentions of the framers of the laws.

The terms of these acts are sufficiently defined to be readily intelligible. It would seem that the authority given to the President was limited to the support of the negroes or persons of color during their stay in the United States, to their removal to the coast of Africa, and to the delivering of them to the care of an agent, &c. There is no power expressly vested in the Executive to provide, after such delivery, either for their support or protection. A liberal interpretation of the law might permit some allowance to be made for their maintenance after being landed, until they could find employment by which it might be earned. But this even would be authority from inference only, and should be cautiously exercised.

The practice has been to furnish these persons with provisions for a period of time, after being landed in Africa, varying from six months to one year; to provide them with houses, arms, and ammunition; to pay for the erection of fortifications; for the building of vessels for their use; and, in short, to render all the aids required for the founding and support of a colonial establishment.

This latitudinous interpretation of the law has resulted in the heavy expenditures detailed in the annexed report. Understanding the law in the limited acceptation represented above, it will in future be executed accordingly, and every effort made by the Department to confine the application of this fund within the pale of its provisions.

The term for which the crew of the frigate Java had been enlisted having nearly expired, that vessel has been ordered to return to the United States; in doing which, the commander has been required, in furtherance of the humane policy pursued by the Government, to touch at the settlement at Liberia, and to aid in enforcing the laws which have been enacted for the suppression of the slave trade.

In a communication heretofore made to you, the opinion was expressed, that the number of Navy Yards now established and in operation was greater than was required for the present wants of the naval service, and that a part of them were liable to the further objection of inconvenient location, both from their great distance from the ocean, and the deficiency in the depth of water for the larger classes of vessels.

This opinion has not been changed by any information since obtained, or by subsequent consideration of the subject.

Should it, however, become the necessary policy of the Government to make a great addition to its naval force, it is possible they may all be found useful, especially for the repairs of the smaller classes of vessels, and as depots for materials for the Navy, collected from the contiguous country.

Whatever course may be pursued in relation to these establishments, it is believed to be of the utmost importance to the security and general interests of the Navy that other positions be sought for, possessing greater advantages, and not liable to the objections which have been mentioned.

Few positions on our maritime frontier offer all the requisites for such purposes. But where these are found, it cannot be good policy to neglect the measures necessary to secure the possession and improvement of them.

The advantages believed to be possessed by the Dry Tortugas, in the Gulf of Mexico, for such an establishment, have heretofore been represented to Congress, and it is much to be desired that the opinions of the intelligent naval officers who have recommended this position should be tested by the more minute examinations of Engineers possessing the scientific knowledge necessary for its accurate determination.

Pensacola, as a place of depot and resort for vessels of war requiring supplies or repairs, has much to recommend it, being contiguous to that part of the United States' coast which, it may be presumed, it will long be necessary should be guarded, particularly by that class of vessels which can safely enter its harbor, possessing a healthful climate, and the country in its neighborhood abounding with the best materials for the construction of vessels of war. But, as a place of general rendezvous for fleets or squadrons composed of ships of the largest classes, it cannot, in the present state of the entrance into its harbor, be regarded as offering the required facilities.

From a report made by the Department of War to the House of Representatives on the 5th February, 1830, it appears that a survey was made of this harbor during the preceding year, with a view of determining the practicability of deepening the channel of the entrance into this harbor, and thus adapting it to the great purposes of a naval depot for the United States' Navy.

The result of this survey was entirely favorable to the expectation of success from such an undertaking, and at an expense not estimated to exceed $107,000. Whether the work, if it could be accomplished, would secure a permanent facility of entrance, uninfluenced by the operations of the tides and storms, can only be determined by the experiment. The object, however, is one of deep interest to those sections of the United States embraced within the valley of the Mississippi, as well as to those engaged in conveying their productions to market.

The communication made by the Commissioners of the Navy, dated 19th October, 1829, and addressed to you, with the report on naval affairs, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, afforded some views in relation to the fitness of the harbor of Newport, Rhode Island, or some place in the Narraganset Bay, for a naval depot and rendezvous for the United States' Navy.

From this it appears that the general advantages of this harbor or bay, for such purposes, are, in some respects, superior to any position East of the Chesapeake Bay. In addition to the information furnished by this document, it will be found, on reference to the surveys of Captains Evans and Perry, made by order of the Navy Department in 1815 and 1817, that the places referred to combine almost every advantage desirable for such an establishment; especially a facility of ingress and egress, with a sufficient depth of water for ships of the largest classes, and of a capacity to permit the largest fleets to ride within their waters, in security from storms, or obstructions from accumulations of ice; that its proximity to the ocean gives all the advantages of convenient attack or retreat from an enemy; and that, from the number and nature of the channels of entrance and departure, a fleet could not be blockaded within it without an application of force incomparably greater than the one intended to be shut up; and that it is believed to be defensible at an expense far less than that which has been incurred for similar objects. In addition to these important advantages, it is described by the officers above named as admitting of the entrance of vessels with the wind blowing from points of the compass during the prevalence of which it would be impossible to make a port in any harbor on the Eastern coast of the United States. This peculiar facility might, if the harbor was properly defended, result in the security of a fleet from the attacks of a superior enemy, and affords the strongest inducements to provide for its scientific survey, and the determination of all the points connected with the subject.

It is respectfully recommended that an appropriation be made, authorizing such survey by the proper Engineers, of the harbor of Newport, or other positions on Narraganset Bay, with a view to the selection of a site offering the greatest number of these advantages, and susceptible of defence at the least expense to the nation.

Some difference of opinion having taken place between the Commissioners of the Navy Yards, who were appointed to examine the sites at the Navy Yard in Brooklyn and Governor's Island, to determine which of the two positions was more eligible for a naval depot and building yard, no selection had been made for the buildings which were required for the several purposes of the establishment. This yard had consequently remained unimproved, to the great injury of the store of materials which had been collected there, as well as the general operations of building and repairing.

The subject having been referred to your consideration, and all the documents explaining the relative advantages of the two sites having been laid before you, it has, in conformity with your opinion, been ordered that the timber-houses shall be erected at the old establishment at Brooklyn, until further surveys can be made, affording such minute information as will justify a final disposition of the subject.

The papers herewith transmitted, marked F, furnish statements communicated by the Board of Navy Commissioners.

No. 1 shows the number of vessels of war in ordinary at the different stations, their present condition, and the progress which has been made in protecting them from the effects of the weather, and the expense which must be incurred for their thorough repair.

No. 2 shows that there are now on the stocks, well protected from the weather, and in a very advanced stage of preparation, five ships of the line and seven frigates. These can be readily finished and put in commission, whenever the exigencies of the service may demand an increase of the naval force.

An important circumstance attending this condition of the vessels alluded to, is, that they may be retained for any length of time in their present situation, without material injury from any cause of decay, and that this is effected at an expense scarcely worth estimating.

No. 3 exhibits the measures taken for the protection of the vessels in ordinary from further decay.

The list marked 4, giving a view of the quantity of materials for the Navy collected at the several places of depot, shows that, making all due allowance for that portion which has been rendered unfit for use by their long exposure to the weather, there is still remaining a large supply of the most valuable qualities.

The great loss which has been suffered from the causes mentioned above, has made it necessary to urge the adoption of measures to prevent its future occurrence; and instructions have been issued to provide in time the necessary houses and timber sheds, so as to guard against the injurious exposure of the materials to the weather, after they shall have been deposited at the respective Navy Yards.

The accompanying extracts of letters, marked G, addressed to the Department by the officers of the Navy, who have had opportunities of witnessing the employment of canvass made of cotton, on board their respective vessels, are herewith presented for your consideration.

The results of their observations go far to confirm the favorable anticipations which have been entertained of the value of this kind of canvass. And the opinion may now, with some confidence, be offered, that this article of domestic production will ultimately supersede the necessity for the importation of foreign hemp, for the manufacture of a large portion of the canvass required for the United States' Navy.

The laws for the government of the Navy are believed to require revision. Under the vague and indeterminate provisions of these laws, it can scarcely happen that similar degrees of punishment will be awarded for similar degrees of offence.

The tribunals invested with the power of trying persons charged with violations of these laws, may, in many cases, (if the party has been found guilty) sentence the offender to suffer the severest penalties of the law, or dismiss him with the mere nominal punishment of reprimand—the words of the law, in several of its most important articles, being that the offender shall, on conviction, &c. “suffer death, or such other punishment as the court shall adjudge.”

Amongst the evils and odious features of the law, as an institution, this very uncertainty has been cited as one justly meriting the opprobrium which has been attached to it; and, pervading as it does almost every part of this system, it furnishes, independently of other defects, an urgent motive for a reconsideration of the subject by the National Legislature.

Believing that the usefulness and reputation of the Navy are connected essentially with its obedience to the laws and regulations enacted for its government, the Department has been assiduously engaged in endeavoring to promote their proper observance, and to cause the duties of its officers, especially of its junior members, to be discharged in alternate routine, thus imposing on each a share of the burdens, and giving to all the advantages to be derived from a practical attention to them.

In a communication made to the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate and House of Representatives, on the 16th February last, proposing a peace establishment, some remarks were offered supporting the opinion that it was just and expedient that an increase in the rank of its officers should constitute a part of the naval system.

While the United States' marine was confined to a few frigates and smaller vessels, no advantage could have been gained, in any point of view, from higher grades in the naval service than that of Captain. But, since the great increase in the number and size of the United States' vessels of war, and as occasions arise in the service for their combination into fleets or squadrons, other duties, arduous and responsible, and requiring the possession of superior nautical science and general intelligence, devolve upon their commanders. These higher degrees of qualification for the service, the fruit of long and unremitting devotion to their acquirement, merit a corresponding elevation in professional rank and distinction.

It has been supposed, also, that superior rank has a tendency to secure the enforcement of discipline, inasmuch as the orders of a superior are more readily and faithfully observed than those of one of equal grade.

The increase may certainly obviate some causes of irritation in the intercourse of the officers of the Navy with those of foreign nations, the least powerful of which have higher grades than are known in this service, and universally claim honors and precedence according to their rank. These must either be yielded, or intercourse suspended; and this could not but result injuriously, should it be necessary for the United States' vessels to co-operate with those of other nations in any difficult naval enterprise.

The subject of an increase of the pay of the officers of the Navy has heretofore been brought to your consideration; and you are again respectfully referred to the suggestions offered in the report made to you on the first December last.

In anticipation that this measure will receive favorable consideration, estimates, founded on the scale of increased compensation proposed at the last session of Congress, are herewith transmitted.

The authority which is given to the Department to make allowances out of the contingent fund to cover the expenses of the officers of the Navy, for various incidental purposes, forms an important item in its duties and powers. The disposition of this large fund is wholly within the control of the Secretary of the Navy, and its application only limited by his sense of justice and expediency.

Without urging that this discretion has, at any time, been improperly or unjustly exercised, it may be said that it unquestionably offers the means of committing great abuses by extravagant grants or allowances to some, while these benefits may be wholly withheld from others.

As far as it is practicable, these allowances, now contingent, should be specifically designated, securing, without the abuse of the fund, a just return to the parties for the sums necessarily expended for such incidental purposes.

This, in many cases, may be effected by legislative enactments, particularly as relates to travelling expenses, attendance on courts martial, either as members or witnesses, the pay of Judge Advocates, and to officers engaged on extra duty beyond the limits of their stations, &c.

In the absence of precise legal provision on these points, the allowances in future will be confined strictly to the sums believed to be necessary to meet the expenses of officers so employed.

In the report made to the honorable the Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives, on the 21st of January last, a recommendation was offered, proposing some modification in the powers and duties of the Board of Commissioners of the Navy.

The Department has not found cause to change the opinion then expressed, that a division of the duties of the Navy Board would have a tendency to secure the discharge of its various duties more for the public benefit; that it would especially favor this, by directing “the undivided attention of the officer to the class of duties which may be confided to his management;” “that this exclusive devotion of his time and talents to a single train of services would enable him to attain a more intimate knowledge of their interest,” to adopt a better system for their execution; and “that it would secure a stronger individual responsibility for their faithful discharge.”

The considerations enumerated above offer their own recommendation; and being in concurrence with the sentiments of the Board itself, a body which, from experience, has derived the means of forming correct opinions on the subject, it may be fairly presumed that the adoption of the measure will result in much public utility.

The documents marked H, I, K, show the number of deaths, dismissals, and resignations, which have occurred within the present year.

The estimates for the year 1831 are herewith transmitted, marked L.

The appropriations for the present year have been found more than sufficient for its current expenditures; and there will remain of them an unexpended balance, probably exceeding one million of dollars.

It has been doubted by many able and observant officers of the Navy whether the marine corps, as constituting a part of the naval force, might not be dispensed with, without materially diminishing its efficiency. On this point, the opinions of many of the superior officers of the Navy were called for, and presented to the honorable Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, during the last session of Congress. These, it appeared, were by no means in accordance with each other; and this diversity of sentiment amongst persons best qualified to determine the question has induced the Department to withhold any recommendation on the subject.

The laws authorizing the establishment of this corps provide that it shall be governed by the “same rules and articles of war as are prescribed for the military establishment of the United States, according to the nature of the service in which it shall be employed,” &c. Under this provision, it has been determined that marines, while serving at Navy Yards, shall be governed by military regulation. By this decision, two systems of discipline are brought into operation on persons employed on duty at the same establishment. The inconveniences of such an arrangement must be apparent. The perfect preservation of good order at the Navy yards demands that the commander should have the exclusive government of all persons employed in service within the limits of his command.

As a measure tending to give reputation and efficiency to the Navy, the cultivation of the minds of those who are to compose its active members is a subject of great national interest. It is a fact which will not be questioned, that the early education of the officers of the Navy is entirely unequal to the character they have subsequently to sustain.

Few appointments under the Government involve a necessity for more general and scientific attainments.—As officers of the Navy, they are required to act as judges of the law and evidence, on trials of their brother officers for offences affecting the lives and characters of the accused; as commanders of ships, they should possess not only a practical acquaintance with seamanship, but an accurate knowledge of those branches of mathematics connected with the science of navigation, with astronomy and geography, and, as commanders of fleets or squadrons, they must be well informed on all points of international law, having reference to the rights of neutrals and belligerents, the often recurring question of the rights of blockade, and other interdictions of intercourse between powers standing in this relation to each other; to possess an accurate acquaintance with the modern languages, to enable them to enter into discussions on points of difference which may arise with the representatives of foreign States speaking such foreign languages; and it may often happen that the communications can only be advantageously made in the language of the party with whom the subject of dispute may exist. The sons of the wealthy may obtain these advantages from the bounty of their parents; but, without the aid of public instruction, how are the sons of the less affluent to become qualified to command in the naval service?

It may be further remarked, that, while a school, on the most liberal and comprehensive plan of instruction, has been provided for the military talent of the country, and has been endowed with every attribute for the advancement of the education of the youth who aspire to a share in the toils or honors of a military life, the only provision which has been authorized by law for the instruction of the midshipmen in the Navy is to be found in the allowance of $25 per month to the schoolmasters retained on board the larger vessels of war.

The reports on the concerns of the Navy Hospital and Navy Pension funds will be transmitted as soon as the accounts of the several Agents are received. The remoteness of the residence of some of the Agents of the Pension fund makes it difficult and inconvenient to obtain complete statements of their transactions to be rendered within the time prescribed by the act of 23d April, 1800.

In presenting views of the policy which it may be for the public interest should be pursued in reference to the naval establishment, it may be observed that the rapid increase of the population and general resources of the nation, which has already taken place, and is daily advancing, leaves little to be dreaded from invasions of its territory by an external foe, detached as it is from the great warlike powers of the world.

It will be on the ocean, and in the transit of its mercantile enterprise to distant markets, that the nation may be regarded as most vulnerable; and to this point should its efforts for defence be chiefly directed.

The great expense attending the support of so large a naval force as may be occasionally required to give securit to the commercial pursuits of the country, and to protect the accessible portions of the coasts from invasion and attacks of a foreign foe, makes it a matter of leading importance that a system be pursued which shall place the resources of the country in a condition to be readily brought into action whenever the necessity presents itself, without incurring the expense of maintaining such large force when its services are not wanted.

This, doubtless, will be found to be a task of much difficulty. It may, however, it is believed, in some measure be attained by steadily adhering to the course suggested to you in a former communication—to provide for the collection of supplies of all the materials for the construction of a Navy, which require much time to put them in a condition for use, and which can be preserved without material deterioration or decay; to the preparation of these by seasoning and other processes, and the preservation of them after being so prepared, until required to be used; to retain no more vessels of war in commission than are required for the immediate wants of the service, and to cause those which it may be judged proper should be built to be reserved on the stocks, properly sheltered, until their services are called for by the national wants; to provide for the effectual repair and preservation of the vessels in ordinary; to appoint to the service no larger number of junior officers than can be kept actively employed, either at sea, at the stations on shore, or in the acquirement of a knowledge of the various branches of their professional education. On this latter point, it may be remarked, that, to keep in the pay of the Government a greater number of these officers than can be usefully employed, is not only a prodigal waste of the public money, but a prodigal abuse of the character of the youth of the country. When thus appointed to the Navy, and taken from the guardianship of their natural friends, and thrown, without restraint or occupation, upon society, it can rarely happen that they escape the dissolute and enervating habits incident to a life of idleness and indulgence.

Every day's experience gives confirmation to the opinion, that the worst effects to the moral and professional characters of the Midshipmen of the Navy result from this state of emancipation from parental guardianship, unrestrained by the active discipline of the service to which they nominally belong.

Should the exigencies of the nation demand a sudden increase of the corps, it would be far safer to resort to appointments made for the occasion, than to rely upon supernumeraries thus become negligent and insubordinate, and who, if brought into service, would rather tend to weaken than to augment its strength.

Other subjects believed to have a claim to consideration are, the state of the unsettled accounts of the disbursing officers, a general survey of the coasts, harbors, &c. The former was brought to your notice during the last session of Congress: the latter, as a measure affording information on the geographical positions of the principal capes and promontories, the depth and direction of the channels of the bays and harbors, &c., is a subject intimately connected with the security and prosperity of the United States Navy. To these your attention is again respectfully invited.

JOHN BRANCH.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, 30th Nov. 1830.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the transactions, condition, and prospects, of this Department.

The expenditures of the Department, for the year commencing with the 1st of July, 1827, and extending to the 1st of July, 1828, were	$ 1,623,893 80
The receipts, being the amount of postages returned for the same period, were	1,598,877 95
Showing an excess of expenditure beyond the revenue, for that year, of	25,015 85
The expenditures, from the 1st of July 1828, to the 1st of July, 1829, were	1,782,132 57
The amount of postages returned for the same period, was	1,707,418 42
Showing an excess of expenditure, for that year, of	74,714 15
The total expenditures from the 1st of July, 1829, to the 1st of July, 1830, were	1,932,707 95
To wit: for compensation to Postmasters,	595,234 95
Transportation of the mail	1,274,009 98
Incidental expenses	63,463 04
The amount of postages returned for the same period, was	1,850,583 10
Exhibiting an excess of expenditure beyond the revenue, for this last year, of	82,124 85
This deficit of the current receipts of the last year to meet the expenditures of the department, it will be observed, has not increased, above that of the preceding year, in so great a ratio as that of the preceding year increased beyond the deficit of the year anterior to the 1st of July, 1828. The inference deduced from this fact, as well as the increasing prosperity of the Department, will be shown more distinctly in an exhibit of the receipts and expenditures of the Department, by half years, for the two preceding years. Thus the regular increase of the revenue of the Department will sufficiently demonstrate its ability, by its future receipts, to fulfil its extensive engagements, should no considerable charges be created, for a few years more, in addition to those incident to the present establishment.
The expenditures for the latter half of the year 1828, were	$ 851,190 96
The receipts for the same period	826,255 36
Excess of expenditure	24,935 60
The expenditures of the 1st half year of 1829, were	930,941 61
The receipts,	881,163 06
Excess of expenditure	49,778 55
The expenditures of the second half year of 1829, were	948,366 74
The receipts	892,827 60
Excess of expenditure for that half year	55,539 14
The expenditures of the first half year of 1830, were	984,341 21
The receipts	937,755 50
Excess for the last half year	26,585 71

(It should be noted that the excess of this last half year would have appeared, as it actually was, but $17,019 16, had not a portion of the current expenditures that were made in the preceding year been entered in the accounts of the first half of the present year.)
The whole amount of postages from the 1st of July, 1829, to the 1st of July of the present year, as presented in the foregoing statement, is	1,850,583 10
The amount of postage from the 1st of July, 1828, to the 1st of July, 1829, was	1,707,418 42
Giving an increase in this one year, of	143,164 68
The amount of available funds at the disposal of the Department on the 1st of July, 1829, was reported to be	230,849 07
Deduct the excess of expenditure for the last year	82,124 85
Leaves this amount of surplus	148,724 22

The system of financial operations, as mentioned in my report of last year, has fulfilled all the anticipations of its efficiency. The promptitude evinced by the "depositing Postmasters" in general, and the entire certainty of the accounts, both with the banks and those postmasters, exclusive of the security in all these transactions derived to the public from this system, have, in no small degree, contributed to the ability of the Department to meet its extensive demands.

In the several States, improvements in mail facilities have been loudly called for; and, in many instances, the growing population and extending settlements of the country have absolutely required them. In making such improvements, care has been taken so to extend them as to give the greatest possible accommodation at the least expense, and in such a manner as would be most likely to increase the revenue. It is in part owing to these improvements that the amount of revenue is so much augmented, though they have, at the same time, considerably increased the expenditures of the Department.

Between the 1st of July 1829, and the 1st of July 1830, the transportation of the mail was increased, in stages, equal to 745,767 miles a year;
On horseback and in sulkies 67,104 do. do.

Making an annual increase of transportation, equal to 812,871 miles a year beyond the amount of any former period.

The annual transportation of the mail, on the 1st of July last, was about 9,531,577 miles in stages; and the whole yearly transportation in coaches, steamboats, sulkies, and on horseback, amounted, at that period, to about 14,500,000 miles.

The existing contracts for transporting the mail in the southern division, embracing the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and the territory of Florida, will expire with the current year. In the renewal of those contracts, provision has been made for extending stage accommodations over 1,502 miles of post roads, on which the mail has hitherto been carried on horses only, or in sulkies, and on which the annual transportation in stages, will, from the 1st of January next, amount to 278,656 miles. The frequency of trips will also be increased on 894 miles of existing stage routes, to the annual increase of 138,358 miles; making, together, an increase of stage transportation of the mail, from the 1st of January next, of 417,014 miles a year.

Provision is also made for the more frequent transportation of the mail on different routes, as follows:

Increase of trips on horse routes	- 31,824 miles a year
Increase of trips on existing routes, changed from horse to stage routes	- 118,456	do.
Increase of trips on stage routes	- 138,358	do.

Making, together, a total increase of 288,638 miles of transportation of mails, in a year, beyond the amount of present transportation in that division, besides the improvement of substituting stages for horse transportation.

Among these improvements are included, a line of stages from Edenton to Washington, N. C.; from Newbern to Wilmington, N. C.; a steamboat line from Wilmington to Smithville; & a line of stages from Smithville, N. C. to Georgetown, S. C.; all of which are to run twice a week each way. These arrangements will complete the regular communication, by steamboats and stages, between Baltimore, Md., and Charleston, S. C., along the sea-board, by way of Norfolk, Va., Elizabeth City, Edenton, Washington, Newbern, Wilmington, and Smithville, N. C., and Georgetown, S. C.—an accommodation desired alike by the public and the Department.

Provision is also made for expediting the mail on many important routes; among which is the whole route between this place and Fort Mitchell, via Richmond, Va. Raleigh, N. C., Columbia, S. C., and Milledgeville, Ga., which line will be traversed in two days less time than at present; so that the mail will run from this city to New-Orleans in 13 days, after the 1st of January next.

Allowing the average expense of transportation, by horse or sulkey, to be five cents per mile, and by stages to be thirteen cents per mile, which is about the mean rate paid in the southern division, the value of these improvements, exclusive of the value of increased expedition, will be as follows:

Annual amount of transportation changed from horses to stages, 278,656 miles, at 8 cents per mile, (the mean difference,)	$22,292 48
To be added for increased number of trips on the same, amounting, annually, to 118,456 miles, at 5 cents per mile,	5,922 80
Increased number of trips on former stage routes, amounting, annually, to 138,358 miles, at 13 cents per mile	17,986 54
Increased number of trips on horse and sulkey routes, amounting, annually, to 31,824 miles, at 5 cents per mile,	1,591 20

Making the total annual value of the improvements,	$47,793 02
--	-------------

The contracts have been made for the ensuing four years, from the 1st of January next, including all these improvements, at a sum less than the amount now paid for transporting the mails in that division, by $25,047 87. To this sum add the estimated value of the improvements, as before stated,

And the actual saving to the Department, in the renewing of the contracts, will amount annually to	72,840 89
--	-----------

Besides the very considerable amount gained in the increased expedition of the mails on many routes of great interest to the community, the value of which cannot be well estimated.

In this saving in the expense of the contracts, and the additional revenue which may be anticipated from the improvements they secure, together with the general increase of postages, which is still progressive, will be seen a foundation for the belief which has been expressed, that the current revenue of the Department for the succeeding year, will be sufficient for its disbursements.

The rules that have been adopted in relation to the conduct of postmasters, placing the investigation of all official delinquencies under the immediate superintendence of an Assistant, and subjecting them to the strict scrutiny of an able and vigilant officer, has been productive of the happiest results. There are, at the present time, in the United States, 8,401 post offices; and among that number, scattered over the whole Union, it is not possible to prevent disorders, to the great loss of individuals, and sometimes of the Department, without the unremitting and undivided attention of a competent officer. The duties of this branch of the Department, under its present organization, have, however, been so discharged as to secure as great a degree of confidence in the fidelity of its officers, generally, as could have existed in any former period, when the number was comparatively small.

I have the honor to be,

With great respect,

Your very obedient servant,

W. T. BARRY.

MAJOR GENERAL MACOMB'S REPORT.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

Washington, Nov. 30, 1830.

SIR: In conformity with the instructions of the War Department, of the 7th of August last, I submit the following statements and returns:

1. A statement exhibiting the organization of the Army.
2. A return of the actual state of the Army.
3. A return exhibiting the strength of the Eastern department, designating the posts and garrisons.
4. A return exhibiting the strength of the Western department, designating the posts and garrisons.
5. A general map of reference, exhibiting the relative situations of the military posts occupied by the troops.
6. A statement showing the number of recruits enlisted in the Army, from the 1st of January to the 30th of September, 1830.
7. An estimate of funds required for the recruiting service for the year 1831.
8. An estimate of the expenses of the head quarters of the Army, for the year 1831.

The Army continues to maintain its character for discipline and efficiency. The reports of the Inspectors General and of the Colonels of Artillery, represent the garrisons and arsenals which they have visited, to be in good order.

Since my last annual report, the following movements and changes in the positions of the troops have been directed:

Owing to the threatened hostilities among the several tribes inhabiting the country around the Prairie du Chien, and which might eventually have led to unpleasant consequences, not only to themselves, but to our citizens on the frontiers, a detachment of four companies of the 3d regiment of infantry, in conformity with your instructions, was ordered from Jefferson barracks, to co-operate with the troops already at the Prairie and in its vicinity, in interposing the authority of the United States, and obliging the parties to desist from carrying into effect their hostile intentions. The appearance of the troops among them produced the desired effect, by enabling the commanding officer at the Prairie du Chien to exhibit a force sufficiently powerful to induce the Indians to listen to the friendly advice which he was directed to communicate to them concerning their own interests, and to respect the intimation made to them that the Government would not behold with indifference any disposition on their part to enter into a war that would involve, not only their own immediate welfare, but also the safety of our own citizens established near their borders. About the same time, advices were received that a number of unauthorized persons had entered the country about Du Buque Mines in search of lead, in violation of the laws. The same detachment was employed in removing them. After fulfilling that duty, the detachment relieved the garrison at Rock Island, and returned to its quarters at Jefferson barracks.

Misunderstandings having been manifested among the tribes on the frontier of the Territory of Arkansas, the commanding officer at cantonment Gibson was, in conformity with your instructions, directed to use his endeavors in pacifying the Indians in his vicinity, and, if necessary, to employ the force under his command for that purpose. The Indians were informed by him of these instructions, and they yielded to his counsel and advice.

The troops which had been previously assembled upon the frontiers of the Creeks and Cherokees, in Georgia and Alabama, in consequence of the disorderly conduct manifested among those tribes, and to prevent collisions between them and the white people, were eventually marched into the Cherokee Nation, in conformity with your instructions, to guard against the difficulties which, it was apprehended, would grow out of the conflicting operations of the Cherokees and the lawless intruders upon the mineral district within the limits of the State of Georgia. Having fulfilled the instructions of the Government, the troops were directed to retire, for the winter, to their respective quarters.

In conformity with the appropriation for that purpose at the last session of Congress, preparations have been made for the military occupancy of Key West, and a company of the fourth regiment of infantry has been ordered to take post on that island.

Fort Jackson, at the Balize, near the mouth of the Mississippi, having been reported to be so far completed as to be in a condition to receive a garrison by the beginning of January next, a company of the second regiment of artillery has been ordered to occupy it. The tower constructed last year for the defence of the Bayou du Prê having been finished, it has, in like manner, been garrisoned by detachments of the same regiment from forts Wood and Pike.

Agreeably to your instructions, two companies of the third regiment of infantry from Jefferson barracks have been ordered into the Choctaw nation; and four companies of the same regiment, and from the same station, have been directed to proceed to the Red river, to strengthen our positions, and to preserve quiet amongst the Indians in that quarter.

In consequence of the application of the Governor of Louisiana, the troops stationed at Baton Rouge, and at the posts within Louisiana, had been directed to co-operate with the authorities of that State in suppressing any insurrectionary movements that might be discovered. A battalion of the fourth regiment of infantry assembled at New Orleans, and made a demonstration along the banks of the Mississippi, which produced a salutary effect.

Some of the principal fortifications on the sea-board being in a condition to receive their armament, I feel it my duty to bring the subject to your consideration, as they are, at present, without any means of defence, and but little preparation made towards a supply of ordnance and ordnance stores. As the guns required for these fortresses must principally be of very heavy metal, and few or none of which are, as yet, cast, it must naturally require not only large appropriations, but a considerable time, to furnish them. At the rate at which the Ordnance Department is now proceeding, many years must elapse before a sufficient supply can be furnished for the defence of the sea coast: in the mean time, circumstances may arise which would place us in a very awkward predicament; for, if our strong holds should fall into the hands of an enterprising enemy, bringing with him the necessary means for completing their defence, the works will become, instead of our protection, the means of our annoyance. It appears from the report of the Ordnance Department, of November 30th, 1829, that the usual annual appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars would not complete the armament of the new fortifications short of twenty years, while most of the works will have been completed in 1832.

It was my intention to have noticed, in this report, the evil consequences resulting from the allowance of ardent spirits to the troops, as a part of their daily ration, but your late order, directing the abolishment of the issue of that portion of the ration has anticipated all my wishes in that regard. The most sanguine hopes are entertained that, as soon as the excessive use of ardent spirits can be restrained, the most happy result may be anticipated in the incineration of the physical and moral condition of the rank and file of the army.

Respectfully submitted,

ALEX. MACOMB,

Major General, Commanding the Army of the U. S.
To the Hon. JOHN H. EATON,
Secretary of War.

REPORT OF THE CHIEF ENGINEER

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT,

Washington, November 19, 1830.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions from the War Department of the 7th August, I have the honor to present the following report and statements, relative to the operations of this Department during the year ending on the 30th September last.

1. FORTIFICATIONS.

The construction of the several fortifications enumerated in my last annual report has been actively and successfully continued.

Fort Hamilton, in the harbor of New York, and Fort Jackson, at Plaquemine Bend, will, in a few months, be ready to receive their garrisons; and the tower at Bayou Dupre, near New Orleans, is completed, and was, on the 31st July last, reported to receive a guard.

Of the appropriation for contingencies of fortifications, the balance of last year's appropriation, and about $7000 of that of the present year, have been drawn from the Treasury, to be applied chiefly to repairs at Fort Trumbull, Connecticut; Fort Columbus and Bedloe's Island, New York; Fort Delaware, Delaware river; Forts McHenry and Washington, Maryland; Fort Moultrie, South Carolina; and Fort Wood, Louisiana. A small portion of that sum has also been applied to defray the expenses of the Board of Engineers for fortifications, and those incident to a resolution of the Senate relative to an examination of sites for an armory on the Western waters, a report on which was presented to the Senate at the last session of Congress.

2. CIVIL CONSTRUCTIONS.

1. Huron River, Ohio.—The western pier at the entrance of this river having been completed, there remains to construct only a part of the eastern pier, about 60 yards in extent, across the outer bar. The depth of water in the channel of entrance has increased to nine feet at the shallowest part.

2. Black River, Ohio.—At the mouth of this river, about 300 yards of pier work have been constructed during the past year, the effect of which has been such as to warrant the most favorable anticipations from the completion of the proposed plan.

3. Cleveland Harbor, Ohio.—This harbor, at the mouth of Cuyahoga river, which is of great importance to the navigation of lake Erie, as being the outlet of the Ohio canal, has been greatly improved by the works erected for removing the obstructions at its entrance, and it will now admit the largest class of vessels which navigate the lake. To secure this advantage, a further extension of the western pier into deep water is required.

4. Grand River, Ohio.—The piers at the mouth of this river sustained some damages from having been left in an unfinished state, as mentioned in my last annual report, for want of funds to complete them during the year 1829, in consequence of which, the appropriation made this year for their completion has not been sufficient to effect that object. These works, like the others of a similar character on the lake shore, have been productive of great improvement in the navigation which was to be benefitted by them.

5. Ashtabula Creek, Ohio.—The operation of dredging a channel through the bar at the mouth of this creek has been continued with success during the past year. In order to render the entrance more accessible, it is proposed further to extend the piers which form the channel, and an estimate for that purpose has been submitted to you.

6. Conneaut Creek, Ohio.—To the piers at the mouth of this creek, which were commenced last year, there has been added a length of 358 yards of pier work, the effect of which, and of the dam across the former outlet, is already manifested by an increased depth of the channel, which has now six feet water.

7. Presque Isle Bay, Pennsylvania.—The improvement of the channel of entrance into this harbor still continues, and there is now not less than nine feet water on the bar. The object of the estimate presented this year is to obtain the means of repairing damages sustained, during a gale last winter, by a dike constructed by the State of Pennsylvania.

8. Dunkirk Harbor, New York.—In completing the pier constructed as a breakwater to protect this Harbor, and securing it against the injury to be apprehended from leaving it, during the winter, in an unfinished state, the cost has exceeded, by about $700, the appropriation for this year; and that sum is, therefore, required to pay the arrearages due on account of the work.

9. Buffalo Harbor, New York.—During the past year the south pier and mole, forming the entrance to this harbor, have been completed to within 100 feet of their intended termination on the pier head proposed to be constructed as a foundation for a beacon.

10. Black Rock Harbor, New York.—The pier and mole enclosing the western side of this harbor have been completed; but the cost of the work done during the last year, has exceeded, by about $1,800, the amount of the appropriation. This expenditure was considered absolutely necessary, in order to avoid jeopardizing the safety of the whole work, by leaving an important part of it in an unfinished state.

With regard to the three harbors last named, viz: those of Dunkirk, Buffalo, and Black Rock, it is proper to remark that their protection is not completed by the construction of the works already commenced; but, as appropriations for the remaining works at these and other points were contained in a bill which was passed at the last session of Congress, but did not become a law, no notice is taken of them in the estimate for next year.

11. Genesee River, New York.—To the piers designed to facilitate the entrance into this river, there has been added, during the last year, a length of about 270 yards; and they will have been extended, by the close of this quarter, as far as the means afforded will allow. The benefit of the works, though incomplete, is already felt by those engaged in navigating Lake Ontario.

12. Big Sodus Bay, New York.—The first appropriation for improving the entrance into this Bay having been applied to constructing a portion of the pier on the western side of the Bay, a corresponding pier on the eastern side has been commenced, and extended to a distance of 423 yards from the shore; and it is expected that an equal quantity of work will be done next year, the estimate being based on that supposition.

13. Oswego Harbor, New York.—The balance which remained of the appropriation made in 1829 for improving this Harbor, has been applied to the construction of 164 yards of the eastern pier, to complete which, according to the original plan, an additional length of 60 yards is required. To finish this pier, and pay a balance due the contractors, according to agreement, an estimate which was submitted last year, but on which no funds were appropriated, is again included in the general estimate.

14. Lovejoy's Narrows, Kennebeck River, Maine.—A contract has been made for completing the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Kennebeck river at this point, and the operations have been attended with such success as to warrant the belief that the funds available will be sufficient to effect the object by the close of next year.

15. Kennebunk River, Maine.—The new pier at the entrance of this River has been completed, as was anticipated in my last annual report.

16. Berwick Branch of Piscataqua River, Maine.—The operations for deepening the channel of this river have been successfully carried on during the last year. The shortness of the season for working in the water, and the occurrence of frequent rains during the summer, have prevented their completion, which may, however be expected during the next year, the balance of funds available being thought sufficient for the purpose.

17. Merrimack River, Massachusetts.—The small appropriation made at the last session of Congress for the works at the mouth of the Merrimack, was sufficient only to enable the agents to give a greater degree of stability to the work previously constructed, which stands well. An appropriation for completing their construction was embraced in the bill of the last session, "for erecting light-houses, &c." which did not become a law, the same amount will, therefore, be required for the ensuing year.

18. Deer Island, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.—The sea wall for the preservation of Deer Island is nearly completed, and is represented by the inspecting officer as a fine piece of masonry, with regard both to materials and workmanship.

19. Plymouth Beach, Massachusetts.—The security and growth of this beach, though aided by artificial means, are chiefly the result of natural causes, the beneficial effects of which continue to be perceived.

20. Provincetown Harbor, Massachusetts.—An agent has been employed to apply the funds appropriated for the preservation of this harbor to the planting of beach grass, and such other measures as the available means may enable him to take, for effecting the object in view. Additional funds are requisite for this purpose, but no estimate is presented, as an appropriation was included in the bill which passed at the last session of Congress, "for erecting light houses, &c."

21. Hyannis Harbor, Massachusetts.—On the breakwater intended to protect this harbor, there have been deposited since the 30th September, 1829, between 5,000 and 6,000 tons of stone, by which the work has been extended about 250 feet, in a substantial manner.

22. Nantucket Harbor, Massachusetts.—The dredging machine used in cutting a channel through the bar at the entrance of this harbor has been kept in constant operation, whenever the state of the weather would admit of it; and it is expected that the channel will be carried quite through by the close of the working season. That part of it already excavated preserves its depth, and seems to increase in width, from which circumstance it is thought, that, on completing the cut, the action of the current will be sufficient to keep it open.

23. Stoughton Harbor, Connecticut.—The materials for constructing a breakwater to protect this harbor having been procured on very favorable terms, considerable progress has been made towards its completion, which will be effected next year, by means of the funds now available.

24. Mill River, Connecticut.—The breakwater and dike for improving the navigation of this river are completed. The excavation of the channel, commenced this year, but interrupted by the approach of cold weather, will be continued next summer.

25. Harbors of New Castle, Marcus Hook, Chester, and Port Penn, Delaware River.—Under an appropriation made at the last session of Congress, a dredging machine has been contracted for, and will be applied to deepening these harbors; but, owing to the lateness of the period at which the law was passed, the machinery was not finished before the 30th of Sept. last; a hired machine has, however, been in operation during the summer.

26. Ocracock Inlet, North Carolina.—The dredging machine to be used for deepening this inlet was completed and put into successful operation on the 7th August, proving capable of excavating 24 cubic yards per hour. In consequence, however, of the tempestuous weather between that date and the end of September, but little progress has yet been made in opening the channel. Sufficient funds remain to carry on the operations next year.

27. Cape Fear River, North Carolina.—Considerable progress had been made in the construction of jetties designed to improve the navigation of this river below the town of Wilmington, when the occurrence of a gale of unusual violence in August, caused the destruction of a greater part of the works. The materials have, however, again been collected, without much loss, and the injury will be repaired as soon as practicable.

28. The Inland Passage, between St. Mary's and Georgia, and St. John's, Florida, has been opened so as to admit, at high water, vessels drawing not more than $5\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 feet.

29. St. Mark's River, Florida.—The operations for improving the navigation of this river have been confined to the removal of trees overhanging the channel, and of the logs in the bed of the river—work which has been performed by common labourers. The chief obstructions, being oyster reefs near its mouth, can be removed only by the aid of machinery, which will be procured during the ensuing winter.

30. Appalachicola River, Florida.—The sum of $2,000 appropriated for improving this navigation, has been found insufficient to procure such machinery as would produce any considerable benefit. A part of it has, however, been applied to the removal of snags from some of the most difficult passes of the river; and an estimate of funds required for further operations has been presented to you.

31. Harbor of Mobile, Alabama.—A dredging machine for deepening the channel through Choctaw Pass, in this harbor, was in operation from the 1st of April to the 10th of September, when it was withdrawn for repair; but the excavations not having the depth required by contract, no payments were made to the contractor prior to the 30th September.

32. Pass au Heron, Alabama.—The machinery employed in the operations at this pass having been much injured in a gale last autumn, it was not until late in the summer that the work could be resumed. The engineer anticipates the opening of the pass by the 1st December.

33. Pascagoula River, Mississippi.—About 3,000 cubic yards of earth have been removed from the bar at the mouth of this river. The operations were suspended on the 15th of August, the prevalence of easterly winds rendered it impracticable to continue them in such an exposed situation, and the dredging machine was transferred for a time to Pass au Heron.

34. Red River, Louisiana.—The operation of opening a channel round the Great Raft of Red river has been commenced, since my last annual report, on the section of the river at the upper part of the Raft, between the outlet of Red Bayou and Clear lake, a distance of about nineteen miles, twelve of which have been cleared out and rendered navigable for boats.

35. Mississippi River.—The steamboat and other machine boats employed on this river have operated, during the past year, between the mouth of the Missouri and Bayou Sarah, a distance of more than 1,000 miles, in removing snags and fallen timber; and a large force has been, at favorable times, engaged in cutting snags from the sand bars that are dry at low water, and, at some points, in cutting the timber from the shores of the river, to prevent the formation of new snags. By means of the steamboat alone, more than 2,000 snags have been removed from the channel between the points above designated.

36. Ohio River.—The work at the Grand Chain has been actively carried on during the low stage of the water; and the Superintendent reports that all the dangerous rocks in the Chain have been removed by blasting, and buoys prepared to designate the channel thus formed.

The operations on the Mississippi and Ohio rivers were carefully inspected, last summer, by an officer of the Corps of Engineers, whose report is highly favorable as to the skill and industry of the Superintendent.

37. Cumberland Road in Ohio, West of Zanesville.—For this branch of the national road, the annual report of its condition on the 30th of September last is not yet received, which precludes the possibility of stating what its condition was at that time; but, from an inspection report made in August last, it is stated that the arrangements adopted by the Superintendent for its progress were judicious, and conducted with zeal, and that the instructions of the Department in relation to it were strictly observed.

38. Cumberland Road in Indiana.—Under the contracts of last year, this road has been opened and grubbed the whole distance through the State, and the operation of grading it is now in progress. Stone being scarce, bricks and wood will be chiefly used in the construction of the bridges and culverts, which will not be commenced until next year.

39. Cumberland Road in Illinois. Contracts have been made for opening and grubbing this road between the eastern boundary of the State and Vandalia, a distance of 66 miles, of which the 59 miles east of Vandalia are to be finished by the close of this year; the remainder by the 1st of April, 1831. The contracts are made on very low terms, involving an expenditure of about $11,000.

40. Road from Detroit to Chicago, Michigan.—The contracts which were made last year for constructing the unfinished parts of this road, between Detroit and the 64th mile, have been in most cases complied with, as anticipated in my last report, a few quarter-mile sections only remaining to be completed. Under the appropriation for 1830, contracts have been made for continuing the road to the 86th mile, before the 15th July, 1831.

41. Road from Detroit to Fort Gratiot, Michigan.—The construction of $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles of this road, as reported last year, was contracted for in 1829, has been completed, with the exception of some repairs, which the contractors are bound to make; and to cover the expense of which, 19 per cent. of the value of work done is reserved. Further contracts have been also made for continuing the road to the end of the 32d mile from Detroit, being as great an extension as the funds will authorize.

42. Road from Detroit to Saganaw, Michigan.—The progress made in the construction of this road is nearly the same as that on the fort Gratiot road; 17½ miles having been completed, and contracts made for continuing the work to the end of the 1st quarter of the 33d mile.

43. Road from Detroit to Maumee, Michigan—Is completed. A balance of $14 75 remains due to the Superintendent, as stated in the general estimate for 1831.

3. Surveys ordered by Special Acts or Resolutions of Congress.

The surveys for which appropriations were made at the 2d session of the 20th Congress, and which are enumerated in my last annual report, were completed and reported to Congress during the last winter.

A survey of the Wabash river, with a view to improving its navigation, and an examination of certain proposed sites for bridges over the Ohio river, have been made; but the officer charged with these surveys having been necessarily assigned to other duty, his reports on these subjects are not yet completed.

In pursuance of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 6th April last, a survey of the obstructions to the navigation of the Delaware and Raritan rivers, about the proposed points of junction with a canal across New Jersey, has been made, and the maps and report are in preparation.

The act appropriating funds for the location of a canal across the peninsula of Florida was passed too late in the season to permit of any thing being done towards effecting the object before this autumn, when arrangements were made for commencing the survey.

4. Surveys under the act of 30th April, 1824.

Under this head the following surveys have been in progress during the summer of this year:

1. Surveys, with a view to connect the waters of lake Champlain with those of the Connecticut river, by the valleys of Onion and Wills rivers, Vermont.

2. Survey, with a view to unite the Connecticut and Pemigewasset, by the valley of the Oliverian, New Hampshire.

3. Survey of a canal route from Taunton to Weymouth, Massachusetts.

4. Survey of the Connecticut river, with a view to the improvement of its navigation by canals or otherwise.

5. Survey of a route for a rail road from Catskill to Canajohare, New York.

6. Surveys, with a view to connect the waters of lakes Erie and Michigan with those of the Ohio, Indiana.

7. Survey of a route for a canal from lake Michigan to the Illinois river, Illinois.

8. Survey of the falls of the Ohio at Louisville.

The field work of all these surveys is completed, except those of the Taunton and Weymouth canal, and of the lake Michigan and Illinois canal: the completion of the latter was prevented by the illness of the engineers employed on it.

At the request of the Pennsylvania Canal Commissioners, a topographical engineer has been associated with engineers appointed by them to make certain examinations concerning the best mode of crossing the Alleghany summit of the Pennsylvania canal. The Baltimore and Susquehanna Rail Road Company have been likewise aided in their surveys by some of the officers of this Department.

5. The Board of Internal Improvement.

After completing the duties on which it was engaged at the date of my last report, has been occupied chiefly in preparing a plan and estimate for improving the navigation of the Tennessee river, at the Muscle and Colbert shoals.

6. Military Academy.

For the condition of this institution, and the measures required for its further improvement, I beg leave to refer you to the very full report made by the Board of Visitors, at the last general examination.

7. Office of the Chief Engineer.

On the several resolutions of Congress, and other subjects, from time to time referred to this office, I have had the honor to make special reports. The map of the United States, required by the House of Representatives, for the use of the Committee on Commerce, is in progress, and nearly completed.

The resolution of the House of Representatives, requiring a survey at or near the outlet of lake Champlain, with a view to preparing a project of defence for that part of the frontier, has not been complied with, in consequence of the unsettled state of the question of boundary between the U. States and Canada, at that point.

A lithographic press for the War Department, for the purchase of which an appropriation was made at the last session of Congress, having been attached to this office, has been used in printing maps, circulars, &c.

The completion of several of the fortifications now under construction being near at hand, it is respectfully recommended that arrangements be made for continuing the system of defence by commencing others. An estimate of the funds that will be required for these and other new objects will be submitted to you.

The fiscal concerns of the Engineer Department are fully exhibited in the annexed statements, A and B.

Statement C shows the fortifications remaining to be constructed, in order to complete the projected system of defence of the sea-board.

Respectfully submitted,

C. GRATIOT,

Brig. Gen. & Chief Engineer.

To the Hon. JOHN H. EATON, Sec'y of War.

REPORT OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington City, Nov. 23, 1830.

SIR: In compliance with your order, I have the honor to report the operations of this Department during the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters of the present year, to which I have added the 4th quarter of 1829—thus presenting the results of an entire year.

The balance in the hands of the several officers, on the 30th of September, 1829, amounted to $46,367 68

Leaving to be accounted for

$62,679 35

The accounts of five officers for the 3d quarter are yet to be received, which, it is believed, will reduce the balance about $7,000; and it has been ascertained from the statements already received for the month of October, that more than $48,000 of the balance was applied during that month to the public service. I entertain not a doubt that the whole amount will be accounted for at the close of the present quarter. The large amount of public property under the administration of the Department, whether in the hands of its officers or those of companies, is regularly and promptly accounted for.

I have been able to make a reduction in the estimates for the Department proper of about 14,000 dollars: with judicious administration, the sum asked for will be sufficient for the service of the year.

Of the works under the direction of the Department, the barracks at fort Crawford, authorized by appropriations made at the two last sessions of Congress, are in such a state of forwardness as to leave no doubt of comfortable accommodations being prepared for four companies during the present year; and it is believed the appropriation will be sufficient, or nearly so, to complete the works contemplated.

The officer charged with the improvements at Jefferson barracks, authorized at the last session of Congress, reported on the 1st instant that they would be entirely finished by the 15th instant. The appropriation will be sufficient.

The barracks and quarters authorized at New London, Connecticut, by appropriations made at the two last sessions of Congress, have been completed. A small tract of land adjoining the post is necessary for the accommodation of the garrison, for the purchase of which I have submitted an estimate.

The barracks authorized at fort Severn have been completed as far as the appropriation would admit: about three hundred dollars are required to finish them, and an appropriation is necessary for officers' quarters, for which an estimate has been submitted.

Under an appropriation made at the last session of Congress for barracks and quarters at fort Gratiot, operations were commenced early in the season, and, at the date of the last report, the work had so far advanced as to leave but little doubt of its completion during the ensuing winter.

The title to the land occupied by the military at fort Howard, Green bay, being unsettled, it was considered advisable to defer, for the present, the erecting of the barracks and quarters authorized at that place by an appropriation made at the last session of Congress.

At the date of my last annual report, about one-third of the military road in the State of Maine had been put under contract. Owing to the difficulties encountered by the contractors, only a small portion of the work was executed in the last year. It has, however, been completed in the present season; and the remainder of the road through to Houlton has been put under contract, and is in progress of execution. Operations were delayed in the early part of the year by the extravagant nature of the proposals which were received in the first instance. The prices offered were so unreasonable as to induce the determination to reject the bids, and extend the time for completing the road to another season; by which course, contracts have been formed on more favorable terms.—The road is now in such a state of forwardness as to be passable for carriages a greater part of its course, and will form an excellent winter communication between Bangor and Houlton. The great number of streams which require bridges will increase the expense somewhat beyond the estimate of last year, and will render a small additional appropriation necessary.

Operations were commenced early in the year on the road leading from St. Augustine to New Smyrna, in Florida, and were continued until the sickly season set in, when they were necessarily suspended. The section lying between Tomoka and Spruce creek, a distance of twenty miles, and comprehending several bridges and many causeways, has been completed. The work was resumed on the 1st instant, and the officer charged with its superintendence reports that the remainder of the road through to New Smyrna will be finished by the middle of the next month.

The military road from Pensacola to Tallahassee, and thence to St. Augustine, has been repaired as far as the appropriations made for that object would authorize. The eastern section, however, lying between Alachua court-house and Picolati, on the St. John's river, a distance of about sixty miles, has not received any repairs. The inhabitants in that vicinity represented that the road leading from Alachua court-house to Jacksonville would afford greater convenience to the settlements, and it was deemed advisable to apply the appropriation exclusively to that portion of the military road lying between Alachua and Tallahassee.

Instructions have been given, under the provisions of the act of the 31st May last, to repair the road from Alachua court-house to Jacksonville. The bridge authorized to be erected over the St. Sebastian river, near St. Augustine, where the military road crosses that stream, has been finished during the present year.

The road from Alachua to Marianna, in Florida, for which an appropriation was made at the last session of Congress, has been chiefly put under contract, and is progressing satisfactorily. Operations have been suspended on a portion of it, with a view to a better location of the route, by which the distance will be shortened.

The operations for the improvement of Sackett's Harbor, suspended during the last winter, were resumed on the 13th of April, and the officer charged with the work reports that every thing required to be done will be accomplished during the present season, and that no further improvements will be necessary for many years to come.

Operations were resumed at the Delaware breakwater about the first of April, and have been attended with a success beyond our most sanguine expectations.

The contractors were bound, by the terms of their contract, to deliver seventy thousand perches of stone, positively, and twenty-six thousand perches, conditionally; but, in consequence of the loss of all their fixtures at their quarries on the Hudson by the ice, they were not only subjected to a heavy loss, but were delayed in their operations. We had the power to declare their contract void, but permitted them to go on and deliver as much as they had it in their power to furnish during the season. As the public interests, however, required that the work should be vigorously prosecuted, we availed ourselves of the act of the contractors to purchase from others. The contractors delivered about forty thousand perches, and we purchased from others upwards of seventy thousand; making the whole quantity deposited equal to one hundred and eleven thousand five hundred and nine perches. This, added to twenty-three thousand five hundred and seventy perches, deposited last year, makes the whole quantity deposited to the present time one hundred and thirty-five thousand and seventy-nine perches. The length of the deposit of stone on the breakwater is upwards of one thousand feet, or more than one fourth of its intended length; and that of the deposit on the ice breaker is upwards of eight hundred feet, or more than one half of its proposed length. The lower point of the ice-breaker and the upper point of the breakwater are brought up quite to the level of high water, and comprise each an area of seventy by one hundred feet at the plane of low water.

The effect of the deposit already made, as a barrier to the force of the ocean, has been experienced by vessels in several instances during heavy gales of wind which prevailed in the latter part of the season; for, although there is but a small part of each dyke above the plane of low-water, the remainder being but a few feet below that plane, has contributed to make a harbor. By limiting the deposits of the ensuing season to the present foundations, the works can be brought up to their destined height, and made to afford shelter to a number of vessels, particularly those engaged in the execution of the work. The numerous wrecks that took place in August last, have proved how much such a shelter is required.

The whole of the appropriation applicable to the work during the present season will be required to meet the public engagements to the close of the year; and, in addition to the sum of sixty-two thousand dollars, appropriated for the first quarter of the next year, a further appropriation of two hundred and eight thousand dollars will be required for the service of that year; and it is respectfully recommended that an appropriation be asked for the year 1852.

Having been called on at the last session of Congress for an estimate of the expense of mounting a portion of the infantry for the defence of the western frontier, I take this occasion, as a western citizen, to remark, that the nature of the country south of the Missouri river, and the character, habits, and resources of the Indians who inhabit or range on it, are such as to render it impossible to secure that frontier by infantry alone, how numerous or well appointed soever they may be, unless horses be provided to mount them. As well might we leave the defence of our maritime frontier, and the protection of our foreign commerce, to the artillery stationed on the sea board. The means of pursuing rapidly, and punishing promptly, those who aggress, whether on the ocean or on the land, are indispensable to complete security; and if ships of war are necessary in the one case a mounted force is equally so in the other. Were we without a Navy, depredations might be committed upon our commerce with entire impunity, not only on the high seas, but within our harbors, and in view of our forts. So, without a mounted force south of the Missouri, the Indian, confident of the capacity of his horse to bear him beyond the reach of pursuit, despises our power, chooses his point of attack, and often commits the outrages to which he is prompted, either by a spirit of revenge or a love of plunder, in the immediate vicinity of our troops; and the impunity of the first act invariably leads to new aggressions. To compel him to respect us, we must make him feel our power, or at all events convince him that the guilty can have no security in flight.

I would therefore respectfully recommend that provision be made to mount at least one company at each of the posts south of the Missouri; and I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP, Quartermaster General.

The Hon. JOHN H. EATON,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

REPORT OF THE PAYMASTER GENERAL.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, 2
Washington City, Dec. 1, 1830. 5

SIR: I have the honor, herewith, to submit a tabular statement of the funds advanced to paymasters, from the 1st day of October, 1829, to the 30th of September, 1830; the balances unexpended, and deducted from the estimates for the fourth quarter of the present year; and the balance yet to be accounted for; also exhibiting the period to which the troops in each district have been paid.

From this statement it will be seen, that, of the $1,205,100 drawn from the Treasury, there remains but $13,084 45 to be accounted for; and I have information that the payments for which this last sum was advanced have been made, but the accounts have not yet reached me; they will probably be received before the close of this week, when the whole will be accounted for without the loss of a cent.

I have the satisfaction to add, that on no former occasion have the payments, generally, been brought to such late periods, or the accounts so fully rendered.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant.

N. TOWSON, Paymaster-General.

The Hon. J. H. EATON, Secretary of War.

REPORT FROM THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

ORDNANCE OFFICE,
Washington, November 30, 1830.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith a general report of the operations of this office during the year past.

Statement marked A exhibits an account of the moneys drawn from the Treasury, and remitted through this office, during the year 1829, to disbursing officers and contractors; and, also, the amount of accounts rendered, and the balance remaining in the hands of each at the close of the year. By this statement, it appears that the remittances, during the year 1829, amounted to

That the accounts rendered and settled,	$ 991,496 48
during the same period, amounted to	957,094 55

And that the unexpended balances remaining in the hands of the several disbursing officers at the close of the year, amounted to

Statement B shows the amount of funds transmitted to the several disbursing officers of this Department, and to contractors, during the three first quarters of the present year; by which it will be seen that the total amount transmitted was	$ 34,401 93
And that the accounts rendered amounted to	$ 708,087 91
	620,423 25

Leaving an unexpended balance in the hands of disbursing officers, on the 30th September, of

$ 87,664 66

Statement C exhibits an account of some of the principal articles made at the several armories and arsenals, during the year ending 30th September, 1830; by which it will appear that 26,125 new muskets, with their various appendages, have been made at the armories; and that 20,956 small arms have been cleaned and repaired: 2,101 holsters, about 700 sets of accoutrements for small arms, and 90 new gun carriages, have been made at the arsenals.

Statement D exhibits the number and description of arms, artillery, and other ordnance supplies, issued by this Department to the Army, and to the Engineer Department, during the year ending 30th September, 1830; by which it will be seen that 955 small arms, 16 gun carriages, and about 1,000 sets of accoutrements for small arms, are among the principal articles issued to the army: 937,700 pounds of lead were issued to the Engineer Department.

Statement E exhibits an account of the expenditures made, and of the arms, and artillery carriages and equipments procured, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia, during the year ending 30th September, 1830; from which it will appear that the arms procured are, 11,240 muskets, 361 repeating and Hall's rifles, 2,101 holsters, and 86 field artillery carriages, with their various equipments; and that the amount expended was 187,520 39 dollars.

Statement F exhibits an account of the arms apportioned to each of the several States and Territories, for the year 1829; and of the artillery, arms, and other military equipments, distributed to the militia, during the year ending September 30, 1830.

Statement G exhibits the general results of the operations of the public lead mines, during the year ending 30th September, 1830; to which is appended a brief statement, showing the quantity of lead made at these mines, in each year, from 1821 to the present time. By these statements it will be seen that the rents which accrued during the year past amount to 563,567 pounds, being 890,564 pounds less than the rents of the previous year. The quantity of lead made at the public mines, during the last year was 8,332,058 pounds, being less than the product of the previous year by 6,209,252 pounds. This falling off in the quantity of lead made is to be attributed to the low price which the article has borne in the market for two years past. The same cause has diminished the rents, but these have been further reduced by the lower rates at which rents have been charged since the 1st of January last.

The quantity of lead which has accrued to the United States, for the rent of the mines, during the year past, if sold in the market, would barely suffice for paying the expenses of collection.

It is not probable that any considerable extension of the mining operations will be made for years to come; for it is now satisfactorily ascertained that our mines have yielded, for a few years past, a much larger supply than the consumption of the country requires; and, unless a market for the excess be found in foreign countries, it is not to be expected that even the present rate of production can be sustained. During the past year, a great number of miners have abandoned the business, because the low price of lead did not afford an adequate compensation for the labor of procuring it.

It appears, upon a careful examination of the Treasury statements for a number of years past, that the whole quantity of lead, in all its various forms, which was imported during a period of ten years, commencing with 1819, amounted to an average, per annum, of

And that, during the same period, the quantity exported averaged	1,338,218
--	-----------

Leaving for domestic consumption an average of	6,497,705
--	-----------

Which consisted of the following kinds, viz :

Of white and red lead, and litharge	2,786,639
Of pig, bar, and sheet lead, and lead pipes	2,855,828
Of shot	853,238

Average quantity derived from importations of foreign lead	6,497,705
--	-----------

Prior to the year 1828, the product of the public mines had not been so considerable as materially to affect the market; but, during that year, the product was suddenly increased to more than twelve millions of pounds; and during the same year, the excess of importations was 8,603,439 pounds, exceeding the average of previous years more than two millions. This, with the product of the public mines, supplied the market with an unexpected excess of fourteen millions pounds, being equal to a supply for two years in advance.

During the year 1829, the public mines yielded fourteen and a half millions pounds, and the importation ceased. There was an excess of exports, in that year, of nearly one and a half millions.

The average annual product of the public mines, during the three last years, is 12,728,366 pounds, being about double the quantity usually received from foreign countries, prior to the year 1829.

The public lead mines in Missouri were offered at public sale in October last, under the act of March 3, 1829.

The section of country in which the mines on the Upper Mississippi are situated, having been ceded to the United States by the treaty of Prairie du Chien, of August, 1829, and the value of these mines having been fully developed, it is believed that the time has arrived for surveying and selling these lead mine lands. It is supposed that the principal object of reserving these lands from sale was to prevent a monopoly of them, while their extent and value were but little known to the public. They have now been so extensively wrought, and are, at present, so well known, that this object has been accomplished; and no reasons can be perceived why a survey and sale of them should be longer deferred.

Independent of the mineral riches of these lands, the climate is represented as remarkably salubrious, and the soil as fruitful, and well adapted to support a dense population; and it may be considered of national importance to encourage the settlement of this remote and exposed frontier. I would, therefore, recommend that measures be taken for causing these lands to be surveyed and sold.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient,

G. BOMFORD, Br. Col. on Ordnance service.

Hon. J. H. Eaton, Secretary of War.

REPORT FROM THE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE.

OFFICE OF THE COM. GEN. OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, 11th November, 1830.

SIR: In compliance with instructions from the Department of War of 7th August ultimo, I have the honor to submit a statement, in duplicate, of the moneys remitted and charged to contractors, and the disbursing officers of the commissariat, in the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters of the year, amounting to $233,013 16, and the monies accounted for by them, amounting to $208,716 64, leaving a balance outstanding of $24,381 18, from which is to be deducted $2,808 42, charged to contractors, not as advances, or remittances out of the annual appropriation for 1830, but as the difference between the prices of provisions previously contracted for, and the purchases made by agents of the Department in 1829, to supply deficiencies at several posts, and totally unconnected with the fiscal operations of the present year, leaving $21,572 76 actually in the hands of the assistant and acting assistant commissaries, at the expiration of the 3d, applicable to, and which will be entirely accounted for in, the 4th quarter of the year.

The sum originally charged to contractors on their failure is, by this statement, $4,502 31, of which $1,010 11 has been liquidated; and there is little doubt, from the solidity of the securities in the cases of the $2,808 42 unsettled, and from the disposition already evinced, that the whole will be promptly paid without resorting to suit.

It affords me great gratification to state, that of the moneys remitted and charged in the period embraced, there has not been one cent lost to government; and of 91 officers disbursing in the commissariat, only three accounts have not been received; and although these are at the most remote posts, they will in all probability reach this office during the present month: it is, however, believed, that if received, the result of the statement would not be materially affected.

Very respectfully, your most obt. servant,

GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. J. H. Eaton, Sec'y of War.

REPORT FROM THE SUPERINTENDENT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, Nov. 26, 1830.

SIR: In compliance, in part, with the order of the Department of the 7th August last, I had the honor, on the 22d ultimo, to submit an estimate, in detail, for the current expenses of the Indian Department in the year 1831, amounting to $160,600.

In further compliance with said order, I now have the honor to submit the statements herewith, marked A and B.

Statement A exhibits the amount remitted for disbursement under each head of appropriation, in the Indian Department, during the three first quarters of the year 1830; the amount for which accounts have been rendered under each head, for the same period; and the balances remaining to be accounted for, according to the books of this office. It will be seen that the whole amount remitted for disbursement within the period mentioned is $528,734 18; that the whole amount for which accounts have been rendered, is $401,342 09; and that the amount remaining to be accounted for is $127,392 09. It will be seen, also, that, of the balances remaining to be accounted for, those alone, under the heads of pay of superintendents and agents, sub-agents, interpreters, and blacksmiths, and annuities, when added together, amount to the sum of 62,914 dollars, and 31 cents; and which, if deducted from the aggregate balance, to wit: $127,392 09, will leave but $64,477 78 to be accounted for under all the other heads. A considerable portion of the disbursements for annuities, as well as for other objects, are made by agents stationed at remote posts, and often, owing to the Indians prolonging their absence from their villages on their hunting excursions, at so late a period of the year, that sufficient time has not elapsed for their returns for the 3d quarter to reach the Department. When these are received, the balance, if not wholly accounted for, will be reduced to a very small sum, especially when compared with the whole amount remitted, or with that of the security held by the Government of the officers through whom the disbursements are made.

Statement B exhibits the number of schools in the Indian country, where established, by whom, the number of teachers, the number of scholars, and the amount now allowed a year to each school from the annual appropriation of $10,000 for the civilization of the Indians. This statement shows an increase in the number of scholars over that embraced in the report from this office for the last year, of 242.

The amount remitted in the three first quarters of the present year, from the appropriation for the civilization of the Indians, for school allowances, is $6,693, as will be seen by reference to statement A. The amount of these allowances to the several schools, as arranged to take effect from the 1st of July last, and exhibited by statement B, is $6,650; which, deducted from the annual appropriation of $10,000 applicable to this year, will leave a balance, (without taking into view any balance that may remain of former years,) on the 1st of January next, of $3,350, to be added to the annual appropriation that will then be applicable to 1831, (making, together, $13,350,) and disposed of, during that year, as the Secretary of War may deem it expedient to direct.

It is believed that the disbursements in the Indian Department for the years 1829 and 1830 have been confined strictly within the appropriations applicable to them, and that no arrearages have or will accrue on account of disbursements made in either of those years. But the arrearages which it was ascertained (and so stated in the report from this office for the last year,) had accrued to a considerable amount in the Indian Department prior to the year 1829; are still pressing on the Department, and it yet remains without any means to meet them. Impressed with the importance of some adequate provision being made for these arrearages, I have made this reference to them here, under a hope that the attention of Congress might again be called, at the ensuing session, to the documents submitted to them on the subject at last, and an act be passed making such appropriations as, from the circumstances of the case, may appear to be proper.

There are some other documents and estimates, which were submitted at the last session of Congress, for appropriations to carry into effect sundry treaty-stipulations for annuities and other objects, for the year 1830; but which, as no appropriations were made, it will be necessary to submit again at the ensuing session, to obtain appropriations both for the year 1830 and 1831. They will, accordingly, be prepared and reported in time to be submitted at an early day in the session.

Our relations with the Indians continue on a friendly footing. Nothing has happened to interrupt them during this year, except it be the acts of hostility which have occasionally been committed against each other by certain tribes bordering on the Mississippi, and which, it was apprehended at one time, were about to assume a character that would seriously disturb the peace of our citizens along that frontier: but, by the timely interference of the Government, peace has been made between the Indians, and our citizens thereby secured, for the present, at least, from the disturbances with which they were threatened by their wars.

The treaties concluded at the conferences ordered to be held by General Clark and Colonel Morgan, with the Indians, for this and other purposes, at Prairie du Chien, have lately been forwarded by General Clark, and are filed in this office. These treaties, with those recently concluded with the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations, under the directions of the President of the United States, towards the execution of the act passed at the last session of Congress, "to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi," are all the treaties that have been made with the Indians since the last session of Congress. They are ready to be laid before the Department when required.

The Commissioners (Gen. E. Root, and James McCall and J. T. Mason, Esquires) appointed in pursuance of a provision contained in the 2d article of the treaty concluded at the Butte des Morts, the 11th of August, 1827, to adjust the difficulty between the Menomonee, and Winnebago, and New York Indians, in relation to the boundaries of their lands in the vicinity of Green bay, have been engaged on that duty, and recently made a report, submitting a proposition for the adjustment of the case, which is subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

By the resolution of the Senate, passed at last session of Congress, conditionally ratifying the supplementary article, concluded the 24th September, 1829, to the treaty with the Delaware Indians of the 3d of October, 1818, certain lines, specified in said resolution, were required to be run and marked. Mr. McCoy, who was employed to make the survey, has been engaged on it, but had not, at the date of the last reports from him, completed it.

The lines of the cessions made by the treaties concluded at Prairie du Chien, with the Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatamie, and Winnebago Indians, on the 29th July and 1st August, 1829, and which were ratified during the last session of Congress, have been run by Mr. Lyon, the surveyor employed for that purpose; and his report, with the field notes and map of the survey, are filed in this office.

A report has also been received from Messrs. J. S. Simmonson and Charles Noble, the agents appointed to value the buildings and other improvements belonging to the Carey missionary establishment on the St. Joseph, in Michigan Territory, under a provision made for this purpose by the treaty with the Pottawatamie Indians, of 20th September, 1828. It remains for the report of the agents to be submitted to Congress to obtain the necessary appropriation to pay for the improvements, as stipulated by the 5th article of the treaty just mentioned.

A few remarks in reference to the existing laws relating to Indian affairs, with a view to some change or modification of the provisions of the same will close this report.

The first act providing for Indian annuities, and which is still in force, was passed in 1796. Other acts for the same object have been since passed, from time to time, as they were required by new treaties, which are limited or permanent, according to the treaty stipulations for which they are intended to provide. A part of the provisions of some of them, though not directly repealed, has been superseded by treaties or acts of more recent date; hence it is difficult (except for persons who are familiar with these changes) to distinguish the provisions that are still in force from those that are not. There are now twenty-one acts under which Indian annuities are drawn, and they require as many accounts to be opened and kept on the books of the Treasury. If the same system be continued, every new treaty that stipulates for an annuity will necessarily increase the number of acts for that object, and, of course, the number of accounts. I therefore respectfully submit, whether it be not desirable to change the system, and adopt one which is more simple, and will require less time and labor to execute it. This, I humbly apprehend, may be attained by repealing all the existing acts of appropriation for annuities, and embodying the whole in one act, to be passed annually, on a statement to be laid before Congress at the commencement of every session, showing the annuities due, and to be provided for in the ensuing year. This would keep Congress annually informed of the state of the Indian annuities, and the actual amount required from year to year to pay them. The appropriation might be made in one sum, equal to the whole amount of annuities due for the year to be provided for, or for the specific sums due, for such year, to each nation or tribe. In either case, it would never require more than one account to be opened on the books of the Treasury. With these remarks, I respectfully submit the accompanying statement of all the annuities that will be due and payable in the year 1831, (marked C,) that, if the object (which is explained by the foregoing remarks) be approved, the same may be submitted to Congress, to be acted upon as may be esteemed proper.

The act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, passed in 1802, is the principal one that governs all our relations with the Indian tribes. Since this act was passed, many treaties have been concluded, which, with other causes growing out of the increase of our population, and the consequent extension of our settlements, have contributed to produce changes in our Indian relations, which, it would seem, required corresponding changes in the laws governing them. It is believed that the line defined by the act of 1802 as the Indian boundary, and to which its provisions were intended particularly to apply, has long since ceased to be so. It is, therefore, respectfully submitted whether the public interest does not also require such a modification of the act of 1802 as would better adapt its provisions to the present state of our Indian relations. A judicious modification of this act, and others connected with it, (embracing some specific provision for the adjustment of the claims for depredations, &c. which are provided for by the 4th and 14th sections) would, no doubt, greatly facilitate and open the way for other improvements in the administration of the affairs of the Indian Department, of which the claims for depredations just mentioned form no unimportant or inconsiderable part. It may not be improper to add, that should the foregoing propositions in regard to the laws relating to Indian affairs be deemed worthy of consideration, much useful and more detailed information may be obtained from the report which was made on this subject by Governor Cass and General Clark, and laid before Congress the session before last; for which, see State Papers, 2d session 20th Congress, vol. 3, Doc. No. 117.

All which is respectfully submitted.

REPORT ON INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 1831.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the committee to which was referred that part of the President's Message [of December 7, 1830] relating to Internal Improvements, made the following Report :

That they have bestowed upon it that deliberate consideration to which its high character and importance are justly entitled.

The essential benefits to a nation from good roads and canals, and the improvement of water courses, are so universally acknowledged, that the Committee will not investigate the subject by tedious reasoning. A brief notice will be all that is necessary. Their object is rather to bring into review the laudable ambition and ardent desire, so long manifested by the people, for the enjoyment of these real blessings.

Mr. Fulton, in his letter of the 7th of December, 1807, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to enable him, in part, to prepare his report of the 4th of April, 1808, remarked that, "it is obvious to every one, who will take the trouble to reflect, that, on a road of the best kind, four horses, and sometimes five, are necessary to transport only three tons, but on a canal, one horse will draw twenty-five tons, and thus perform the work of forty horses ; the saving being in the value of the horses, the feeding, wagons, and attendance." Rail roads, where they can be adopted, being now considered of similar value to canals, like results will follow from the use of them.

The whole saving, on any given line, must, in a great degree, be conjectural, unless resort is made to a very minute calculation. But any one can perceive, from this simple statement, that a very large proportion of the expenses of transportation would be a certain gain to the consumers, and, indirectly, to the whole community.

A barrel of flour can be shipped from Philadelphia to Liverpool, a distance of three thousand miles, for fifty cents, while, on a turnpike road from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, a tenth of the distance, it would cost five dollars.

A few facts will show the enormous expense of transportation in time of war. In the late war, flour, in some instances, cost the Government nearly one hundred dollars per barrel, and pieces of artillery each near one thousand dollars ; and owing to the delay, were useless when they arrived. The first of transportation across the peninsula between the Delaware and Chesapeake bays, a distance of only sixteen miles, amounted in one year to a little less than a half a million of dollars. The saving to the Union by good roads and canals, would be immense, and amount to many millions in a year, besides the wealth gained by the additional quantity of articles from the bowels and surface of the earth, raw and manufactured, which the expedition and cheapness of conveyance to market would inevitably bring into existence.

The internal trade of a country increases with amazing rapidity, and it is considered by the ablest writers on political economy to be the most profitable trade ; customers contract acquaintances, and no sea risk is incurred.

We have already seen between two and three thousand sloops, of upwards of fifty tons each, engaged in the North river. In England, there are more than five hundred ships, none under two hundred tons, and many over three, carrying the single article of coal from Newcastle to London. In China, it is said that, in consequence of the cheapness of their conveyances, their home trade is nearly equal to the whole market in Europe.

The commerce of the United States with South America should attract our earnest attention. The independence of these republics will form an important era in the history of this country. No country can offer to us commercial advantages more rich, or more within our reach, than the Spanish American Republics. Our territories touch.

The ports of Louisiana and Vera Cruz are connected with the same sea. Our access to Mexico will be easy ; and, as regards the importance of this country, it is illustrated by the circumstance, that it is the richest and most extensive of all the Spanish American republics. It exceeds in magnitude Spain, France, and Italy united. All the eastern coast of Mexico, the kingdom of Terra Firma and Paraguay, are nearer to us than the ports of Europe, presenting a wide range for the commercial intercourse of the United States. It must be enlightened policy on our part, as soon as possible, to place the country in a condition to compete with the nations of Europe, and to draw a fair proportion of the South American commerce into our own ports, before its rich channels are pre-occupied, in consequence of their superior facilities and cheapness in the principal transactions of their internal trade.

The idea of improving the country with national aid was coeval with the Government. The "Federalist" noticed it among other advantages of the Union.

In No. 14, written by Mr. Madison, the objections made against the Constitution from the extent of country were answered ; and, with other reasons, it was said :

"Let it be remembered, in the third place, that the intercourse throughout the Union will be daily facilitated by new improvements. Roads will be every where shortened, and kept in better order ; accommodations for travellers will be multiplied and ameliorated ; an interior navigation on our eastern side will be opened throughout, or nearly throughout, the whole extent of the thirteen States. The communications between the western and Atlantic districts, and the different parts of each, will be rendered more and more easy by those numerous canals with which the beneficence of nature has intersected our country, and which art finds it so little difficult to connect and complete."

The same distinguished statesman gave a practical construction to those views of the effect of ratifying the Federal Constitution, by submitting to the House of Representatives, in 1796, seven years after it went into operation, a resolution to cause a survey to be made of a road from north to south, through all the Atlantic States, with a view to the foundation of a system for their improvement. That the capacities of the country for improvement are equal to any on the earth, there is no difference of opinion.

Its vast extent, its variety of soil and climate, its mountains and valleys, intersected with streams of every size ; its geographical separation into distinct natural parts, each inviting the commercial intercourse of the others, by artificial means—the portion along the shores of the Atlantic, and back to the Alleghany mountains, being one ; that on the lakes and St. Lawrence, another ; add that watered by the Mississippi and its branches composing the third.

As soon as the funded debt of the Revolution was nearly extinguished, and Louisiana acquired, the improvements of the country were commenced. Mr. Jefferson caused a reconnoissance and survey to be made of a road between the City of Washington and New Orleans.

In 1806, Congress authorized the construction of the Cumberland Road, thereby assuming the principal power for which the real friends of the policy have ever since contended. In 1808, Mr. Gallatin's celebrated report appeared, exhibiting much solid information on the subject ; but the attitude of our relations soon after with England and France, and the final declaration of war against England, retarded the execution, while it evinced, in the strongest manner imaginable, the propriety of this policy. It was seen from actual experience, that the money wasted in consequence of the want of national improvements, would have been sufficient to construct the chief of those of the most prominent character.

After the war, the spirit of internal improvement again revived. It rose up in the South; and on the 16th of December, 1816, on motion of Mr. Calhoun, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of setting apart the bonus and nett annual profits of the National Bank, as a permanent fund for internal improvements. On the 23d of the same month, a bill to this effect was reported.

On the 6th of February following, a motion was made to strike out all the first section after the enacting clause, and insert a bill differently expressed, "for the construction of roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for the common defence;" the fund to be applied to such objects as Congress, with the assent of the States, might direct.

Mr. Calhoun moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "with the assent of the States;" which being lost, the amendment was carried; and, on the 8th of February, 1817, the bill, as amended, passed the House of Representatives. After being agreed to in the Senate, it was sent for the approbation of Mr. Madison, who, on the 3d of March, 1817, rejected it on constitutional grounds.

On the re-consideration, there was still a majority of the representatives of the people in favor of the bill.

This was the last act of Mr. Madison's administration. Mr. Monroe being then Secretary of State, and President elect, probably accorded with his predecessor in the rejection of the bill, as, at the next session, the first of his administration, he gave his concurrent opinion in advance, without waiting to hear the arguments of the new Congress. On the 3d of December, 1817, this part of the message was referred to a committee, and on the 15th of December a report was made, in direct contradiction of the sentiments of the President. The resolution which closed it resting the power in question on the assent of the States, it was stricken out, and the House finally resolved, by a majority of 90 to 75, that Congress had power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and for the improvement of water courses. Motions to amend, by inserting "with the assent of the States," were negatived. Thus, it appears that, on the first opportunity, after the opinions of two Presidents were declared, the representatives of the people independently expressed their own sentiments to the country.

"During the same session, two resolutions were adopted—one directed to the Secretary of War, and the other to the Secretary of the Treasury, of nearly the same import, requiring them to report to the next session a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress to the purpose of opening and improving roads, and making canals, together with a statement of the undertakings of that nature, which, as objects of public improvement, may require and deserve the aid of the Government; and, also, a statement of works, of the nature above mentioned, which have been commenced; the progress which has been made in them, the means and prospect of their being completed; the public improvements carried on by States, or by companies or incorporations which have been associated for such purposes, to which it may be deemed expedient to subscribe or afford assistance; the terms and conditions of such associations, and the state of their funds; and such information as, in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be material in relation to the objects of this resolution."

"Ill health prevented the Secretary of the Treasury from acting on the subject; but the Secretary of War, on the 7th of January, 1819, made an interesting report: 'A judicious system (he said) of roads and canals, constructed for the convenience of commerce and the transportation of the mail only, without reference to military operations, is itself among the most efficient means for the more complete defence of the United States. Without adverting to the fact that the roads and canals which such a system would require, are, with a few exceptions, precisely those which would be required for the operations of war, such a system, by consolidating our Union, increasing our wealth and fiscal capacity, would add greatly to our resources in war. It is in a state of war, when a nation is compelled to put all of its resources in men, money, and skill, and devotion to country, into requisition, that its government realizes, in its security, the beneficial effects from a people made prosperous and happy by a wise direction of its resources in peace.'

"But I forbear to pursue this subject, though so interesting, and which, the farther it is pursued, will the more clearly establish the intimate connexion between the defence and safety of the country, and its improvement and prosperity, as I do not conceive that it constitutes the immediate object of this report."

After many appropriations for the repairs of the Cumberland road, and other acts of Congress manifesting their steady pursuit of this subject, a select committee, in 1822, was raised, which, on the 2d of January, brought in a report, accompanied with a bill to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, to be made, of the routes of such roads and canals as the President might deem of national importance, in a commercial or military point of view, for the transportation of the mail.

In 1823, it was partially acted on, and, on the 30th of April, 1824, it became a law. The object of this bill was to obtain information, and lay a solid foundation for the improvement of the country by the aid and direct action of the General Government.

Mr. Monroe signed the bill; and, in the same session, he approved of the act authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

At this period, Mr. Monroe seems to have yielded to the current of public opinion, as far as is necessary for most practical purposes.

The survey bill was considered as the precursor to all future improvements. Its design was to obtain an accurate knowledge of the topography of the country, by the examination of scientific men, under the direction of the President, who were to make plans, &c. of such objects as the President should direct, reserving to Congress to select in succession the routes which they might deem the most urgent, and of the highest national importance, to be first executed.

In virtue of this act, many important parts of the country have been explored, of whose capacities for improvement we were ignorant. The spirit of this act accorded with the practice of France and other countries, where every information of this kind is considered valuable, and collected and deposited in their respective bureaux.

It was not expected that every survey made should be acted on immediately; many years, it was known, would pass away, before all could be effected. Still, the information was desirable, and advantageous to the Union, the States, and individual enterprise; it afforded a store of knowledge, at all times accessible, and free of expense.

The proceedings of the engineers produced effects of salutary importance. They were every where welcomed: States were awakened from their lethargy; and, aided by the science of which they were in possession, companies arose, to whom they imparted their valuable as-assistance, and the people became inspired with a desire of enjoying the natural advantages of their country, and, in accordance with this spirit, were acting with increased animation in the promotion of its best interests.

The assistance given by the General Government to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, deserves here especial notice. It had been in contemplation for more than half a century. The first attempt failed; the second had to contend with unforeseen embarrassments; and, notwithstanding the boldness and energy of those conducting it, to say the least, it is probable that individual enterprise would have sunk under the many obstacles which were presented, and the work have been abandoned, had not the United States interposed, and aided, by their liberal subscription, for stock in the Company. The value of this noble improvement to the nation, as a link of the Atlantic canal along the sea coast, cannot be too highly appreciated.

The Louisville and Portland canal, and the Dismal Swamp canal, were equally indebted to the countenance and protection of the Federal Government.

President Monroe deemed an avenue over the Alleghany mountains of such national magnitude that the route of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal was the first which he caused to be surveyed under the act of the 30th of April, 1824. This magnificent undertaking has likewise received the countenance of the United States, by the subscription to its stock of a million of dollars.

Acts passed to improve the navigation of the Ohio river, by removing bars and other impediments; to free the Mississippi from the danger of snags and sawyers, and for the clearing of many other rivers. In accordance with the same spirit, the Cumberland road, without reference to the assent of the State, was continued from Canton, in Ohio, to the Muskingum river, at Zanesville, in that State; and additional provisions were occasionally made for the repairs of this road, and its further extension; a variety of roads in the territories, and for military purposes, had been effected; and at the last session, Congress passed laws to subscribe for stock in the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike Company, by a vote in the House of Representatives of 96 to 87; for stock in the Washington and Frederick Turnpike Company, by a vote of 74 to 39; and for stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, by a vote of 80 to 37.

In the two last cases, there was little if any doubt as to the nationality or expediency of the object; and the principle of the policy alone governed the members. They present the fairest test of the opinion entertained by the representatives of the people, concerning the propriety of subscribing for stock in private companies. Wherein, then, it is most respectfully asked, consists evidence of a change in the public mind on this interesting subject? It may be presumed that the message alludes to those public prints which justified the veto on the Maysville road bill? Is it not a fair answer, that the opinion, thus partially ascertained, was founded on a belief that the road was of a local, and not a national character. Whether it was or was not, is immaterial at the present moment; because it never was pretended, by the friends of internal improvements, that Congress had power over mere local and State objects; and, for this reason, they have always disputed the right to distribute money, generally, among the States, for internal improvements, as the money, in that case, might be expended on local objects, over which Congress had no authority. The act to set apart the bonus and dividends of the Bank of the United States, to be divided among the States according to the ratio of their representation, retained in Congress the control over the objects on which the money was to be expended. This, alone, sustained its constitutionality. Lands have also been granted for the same purpose for specified objects.

The committee are aware of no instance in which Congress can distribute money generally among the States, unless it be in the case of education, which is clearly distinguishable from that of internal improvements.

Congress has established the military academy; it has also agreed with the land purchasers in the new States to allow a certain proportion of the soil in each township for the benefit of schools, without indicating the mode and manner of instruction. Education in every stage is designed to qualify the rising generation for all the ends of citizenship. In the improvement of the mind, whether by common schools or the elevated seminaries of learning, there can be no departure from nationality.

The committee will quote the words of the present Executive, from his message, to show its equal application to the power of the United States over internal improvements.

"The power to impose duties originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry is so completely incidental to that power, that it is difficult to suppose the existence of the one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to the inspection laws. This authority having thus entirely passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and consequently if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct.

"Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a People stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case: this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated."

To apply the above where the object of any internal improvement embraces two or more States, the committee will observe, that, antecedent to the Union, the States, as separate sovereignties, could have entered into negotiations and treaties to execute any extended line of road or canal; but, after its adoption, they were excluded from forming any compact with each without the consent of Congress. The States, then, have wholly surrendered the power under which alone they could have effected great leading and permanent roads or canals, for their mutual accommodation, and cannot regain it by the mere exercise of their own wills. If the power be not extinct it is wholly within the control of the United States; and must fall within the scope of the authority over the subject expressly delegated to Congress, and be directly incidental to them.

Again: the power to regulate commerce among the States is granted in the same words with that to regulate commerce with foreign nations. In the one case, it is agreed that imports can be cheapened by public works; the same reason will apply to the power to cheapen the transportation of inland trade, that being of importance equal to foreign commerce; and the power must be as necessarily incidental to the express power.

This directly incidental power carries with it the full means of execution and protection, and does not rest on the undefined tenor of continued and uninterrupted usage, which is said to have been employed "at the expense of harmony."

The committee will pursue this subject no farther than to say that, in their opinion, the same constitution which legalizes the removal of brambles for the free passage of the surveyor's chain, gives equal right to construct the contemplated work. That there is no partition of power. If Congress can act at all, it can act with effect; if it can make a road or a canal, it can employ the accustomed means of the country to keep the work in repair.

In relation to the subject of internal improvements, that there is a line between national and merely State objects, of a sound and practical meaning, is generally admitted; and where this line is, the wisdom of Congress must decide in each case as it arises.

With no pretension of describing the precise line, the committee will suggest that an object of national improvement may be entirely within a State, as a road to a fortification, such as that from New Orleans to Fort St. Philip, in Louisiana; or perhaps a better illustration is supplied by the Delaware and Raritan canal, lying wholly in the State of New Jersey. The object may embrace parts of two States, as a bridge over a river dividing the States; in this instance, Congress could erect the bridge, if necessary for any national purpose. In every case where the improvement is to take a wide range through many States; in instances within a State where an object is considered as a link of an extended line; and in all cases where its end is to connect, by artificial means, the grand geographical divisions of the country; to draw the line, it must be expected, will sometimes give rise to debate, but not more frequently, nor of a more perplexing nature, than will occur in attempting to draw the line of correct legislation on various other subjects.

The tariff to protect American industry is declared by the President constitutional, but does he prescribe the exact limit required for this object? Congress can impose direct taxes, yet, in the exercise of this power, excesses would be real grievances.

But a road or canal, even of a doubtful character as to its nationality, would benefit the country; so it would seem that no federal power can be exercised with less cause of alarm.

In adverting to the message, the committee will not examine it by paragraphs, for fear of committing any error. A particular part of it can be better interpreted in connexion with the whole; they will only make allusion to some of the ideas conveyed by it, concerning which there can be no mistake; leaving the application of their general observations, where they come in collision with any part of it, to the judgment of the House, to be considered as an answer.

The President, after carefully revolving in his mind the whole subject, has formed these opinions—that it is improper and inexpedient to subscribe for stock in private associations; that, unless an entire stop be put to the practice, certain bad consequences will follow; and that the course heretofore pursued to advance the internal improvements of the country, is the worst, perhaps, that could exist.

Among the reasons for these opinions, it is asserted, that, when an improvement is effected by the funds of the Union, the citizens ought to enjoy it without being compelled to pay tolls; that money so raised ought to be subject to the rule of revenue; that discredit might result from the Government's embarking with its constituents in joint stock associations, and that, in certain instances, the control of a portion of the public funds would be delegated to an authority unknown to the Constitution.

To these objections and reasonings the committee reply, in the first place, that, if it is constitutional to subscribe for the stock of private companies, which does not appear to be controverted, none of the agencies thereunto appertaining can be alien to the Constitution.

In regard to the idea that the citizens, respecting public improvements, ought to be exempt from tolls or any imposition of that character, this doctrine would apply to the States with the same force as it would to the Federal Union. In the States, however, it is the universal practice to receive tolls from those who use the roads of incorporated companies, in which a sovereign State is interested. The traveller gains an equivalent, and is not heard to complain. To say nothing of the consequent ruin of State enterprises, if the citizens should be treated better by any mode of internal improvement, under the auspices of the General Government, than by the laws and institutions of their respective States, their affections might be unwarily weaned from the one and bestowed upon the other. As yet, such favor has not been extended, even to American genius. The inventor of the most valuable discovery has to pay for his patent.

With reference to the rule of revenue, it is provided by the Constitution that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the U. States; but the paying of tolls is clearly a tax of no description. A valuable consideration being received, it is no collection of revenue. It is only a profit on the revenue on hand. It is as much a contract as the purchase of public land, in which case the buyer is to pay for the value he receives; and in like manner the scientific inventor has to purchase his patent. Respecting the impropriety of subscribing for stock in private companies, this committee, and former committees, and both Houses of Congress, have deemed that the most eligible and least objectionable mode of effecting many of the improvements of the country. The opinion has been as generally entertained, that the direct agency of the Government should be resorted to only in cases where States or private companies had not sufficient interest or means to induce them to embark in their execution.

The committee cannot discover how any deception could be practised in this mode of expenditure, more than in the direct application of the public money. No circumstance respecting the former can be better concealed. The United States' engineers can give as accurate information in the one case as in the other. In each, the same inducements will exist for additional appropriations, when the first have proved inadequate. Besides, when subscriptions are made, Congress will have the opinion of State Legislatures, and the guarantee of private subscriptions of stock, as to the importance of the undertaking, before they are begun; and in conducting them afterwards, the advantage of the vigilance and zeal of interested and enterprising individuals. In what manner disguise could be practised, the committee are at a lost to conjecture. It must be admitted that unforeseen obstacles will occasionally obstruct the progress of such improvements, and call for additional aid, in defiance of the skill, foresight, and honesty of man. The Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, and the Louisville and Portland Canal, afford instances of uncommon occurrence. In the first, the embankment for a considerable distance, sunk about one hundred feet; and the latter had to be excavated through a solid rock of unusual and unexpected hardness.

In ordinary cases, the construction of roads and canals is reduced to strict rules, and contracts can be formed with reasonable certainty. Throughout the Union, such works are now executed by such contracts; which incorporated companies are as capable of making as the Government, and much more likely to execute with vigor.

The Committee on Roads and Canals, in 1825, after describing what they considered improvements of the first class, proceeded as follows: "The Committee, however, are of opinion, that there is a secondary class of cases, in which the General Government and States can act conjointly by the subscription of stock on the part of the United States in companies incorporated in the respective States for internal improvements."

"The plan proposed, after much reflection, has been deemed the most judicious of any that can be devised. It is a plan of encouragement, and in its operation will not interfere with objects of the first class. It will excite the States to incorporate companies for such objects as will be sufficiently national to induce Congress to countenance them. It leaves Congress to decide in each case, when presented, upon its own circumstances and merits. The Committee cannot conceive how the General Government can aid in the internal improvements of the country, in most cases, with greater propriety than by subscriptions in companies incorporated by the respective States. Congress will have the opinion of the United States' engineers, who will make the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates; and it will have the opinion of the State in each case, and intelligent stockholders, as to the importance and probable profit of each work; and, finally, Congress will exercise its own judgment on the utility and national character of the work. The prosecution of the works, besides, will be conducted by interested individuals, with less expense and delay than perhaps it could be done by the public."

* The plan of subscribing for stock in companies has, also, the advantage of augmenting the expenditures on public works far beyond the sum invested by the General Government. Congress may adopt the principle, that no subscription shall be made to any incorporated company until a certain proportion, say two-thirds, of the estimated expense be subscribed by a State or by individuals. By this plan, ten millions belonging to the United States would cause the expenditure of thirty millions on public undertakings; and, in time, Congress might dispose of their stock, and use the same fund to aid in other works.

The practice of subscribing for stock in private companies by State sovereignties, has long and extensively prevailed; they have joined their constituents in creating banks, and in promoting improvements. Without any disparagement to the General Government, State sovereignties, in this respect, stand on the same footing, and would be equally subject to inconveniences, if such really existed. The States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, subscribed for stock in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal; Virginia and Maryland subscribed to the stock of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; and the practice has been approved by four or five distinct Congresses. To impair a principle so long acted upon, it would seem to the Committee to require a train of abuses and inconveniences plainly to be laid before the people. How can any discredit result from the Government's embarking with its constituents in the great work of national improvements?

It cannot be expected that the General Government would ever associate itself with companies merely with a view of pecuniary speculation; and by the report of the Committee on Roads and Canals in 1825, and the bill accompanying it, a provision was introduced, allowing the State or States creating the companies to purchase, at pleasure, the stock of the United States in such companies.

Congress, it is believed, will never be disposed to act without the co-operation of the States, except in a national work, in which the States or individuals, for want of interest or adequate resources, are unwilling to embark, or, if commenced, are unable to continue and complete. Such cases, in the opinion of the committee, may be considered as of the first national class, and cannot be included under any specific system.

The action of the Government in the first class will require other direct appropriations, to be expended under the agency of the United States, or subscriptions for stock in private companies. In this class, also, it is obvious, and by none denied, that no rule of equal distribution can be adopted. The localities of the country will require that much larger sums should be expended in some parts of the country than in others. As an illustration of this, the Chesapeake and Delaware canal would absorb the equal distribution to which the State of Delaware would be entitled for perhaps a half century, while this State is far less benefited by the construction of the canal than many other sections of the Union.

Fair and important considerations may, likewise, induce more than a proportional expenditure of money in certain divisions of the country. For instance: while the erection of public works on the seaboard cheapens importation, and diffuses a general benefit among consumers, whether in the exterior or interior of the country, it must be acknowledged that the expenditures on light-houses, beacons, fortifications, &c. afford an additional advantage to those sections of the nation wherein they are erected, by the circulation of large sums, amounting, in fact, to many millions, among the people of those districts.

The new States do not enjoy corresponding advantages; and any degree of equal benefit, in this respect, cannot be effected, unless more than the representative proportion of the funds of the Union be expended among them. As internal improvements are the only objects of magnitude alike advantageous to the new States and to the Union, it is by acting on these alone that Congress can equalize the public benefits of the country. The new States have no unsettled land to constitute a fund for this purpose, and the net proceeds of the sale of public lands will avail very little towards the execution of their leading roads. The rise and condition of the western States have, in an eminent degree, augmented the power and consequence of the Union. The citizens of these extensive regions have purchased our wild lands, and converted them into useful farms. The intercourse between them and the Atlantic States is daily increasing. For the mutual enjoyment of the internal commerce thence arising good roads and canals are indispensable. It is true, the old States, with few exceptions, have prosecuted their own improvements to a great extent without federal aid; but many of these States possessed funds derived from the sales of public lands, and other sources not attainable in the West. It will be no more than an act of generous and good feeling in the Atlantic States to aid their younger sisters. A passage from the late message of the Governor of Pennsylvania we admire for its public spirit and truly American patriotism. It is as follows:

"Although extensively engaged in the construction of works of internal improvement within her own limits, and at her own individual expense, Pennsylvania has uniformly, with a magnanimity and a spirit of patriotism which does her honor, advocated and maintained the constitutional right of the General Government to aid in the construction of works of internal improvements of a national character, tending to bind, and to connect more closely together, the remote parts of our widely extended territory; to multiply the facilities of communication between the different parts of the Union; to diminish time and distance in the intercourse of its citizens with each other; to beget, by means of such intercourse, feelings of amity, kindness, and friendship, instead of those sectional jealousies, local prejudices, and unkind and uncharitable prepossessions, which a want of free and friendly intercommunication is always seen to produce; and generally to increase the comforts and promote the prosperity and happiness of the people of the United States."

If we descend from this elevation, and confine ourselves to the narrow, parsimonious pursuits of gain, no policy more substantial could be devised. What roads or canals, except cross roads for neighboring purposes, can be made in the west, which will not benefit the States on the Atlantic?

In what direction will they look for their sales and barter? It must certainly be towards the seas and manufacturing districts. All their national highways will be calculated to meet the eastern improvements, namely, those of New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Georgia. The Cumberland road, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the canals of James river, of Roanoke, and others, yet farther to the south, are all designed to conquer the mountains between these two great sections of our common country.

In the secondary class of cases, Congress can appropriate money to national objects with as judicious arrangements among the States as the true interest of the country will demand. They can, as in the bill of 1816, for the gradual increase of the Navy, set apart a fund for the gradual improvement of the country, and appropriate so much per annum to be applied to national undertakings to be completed or towards the discharge of expenses incurred on national objects already executed by the several States. Under such a provision, States which have led the way in improving the face of the country can, in part, be reimbursed for their valuable exertions.

No tribunal can be so competent to regulate these national concerns as Congress; they bring intelligence from the various parts of the nation, and can impart to each other a knowledge of the course of trade, and of the bearings which particular improvements will have on each other, for the good of the whole.

Internal improvements accommodate themselves to all the leading interests of the nation; by their facilities the farmers will be enabled to produce more and sell cheaper; by them foreign imported articles will reach the consumers in the interior at reduced prices. But with none are they more intimately connected than with the manufacturing interest, as they will cause a diminution of the expenses of transportation to and from their factories; and, in time, will enable the proprietors to bear, without injury, a reduction in the tariff. Thus, while the duties on imports supply, in part, the means of internal improvement, those improvements, good roads and navigable canals, to a still greater extent, lessen the cost of those imports to the consumer, and, in enhancing the value of his produce, enlarge his means of comfort and enjoyment.

The opponents to the immediate execution of internal improvements, speak, repeatedly, of judicious plans and systems, without disclosing their ideas upon any practicable scheme to supplant that which they condemn. The sincerity of their motives is not questioned, although the tendencies of their scruples cause only procrastination, and leave us equally as unenlightened. What system have the States adopted to regulate improvements between the different parts of their respective territories, better than that hitherto pursued by the United States?

The wisdom and experience of the legislative bodies constitute the tribunals which govern as the objects are presented.

It has also been urged that the project of national improvements with the funds of the Union creates corrupt passions and excites vicious practices. If the mere allegation of corruption is to check the prosecution of internal improvements, it will interpose a barrier against all public works; for it is equally applicable, whether the improvements are to be completed by the States or by the Federal Government. The human heart will remain unchanged, and the motives of influence can never be eradicated. If a road is to be located for sixty or one hundred miles, the individuals interested in the route will be actuated by the same zeal, and practice the same means of gratifying their wishes, whether the improvement is to be effected by a county, by a State, or by the United States. Whenever a State engages largely in public undertakings, motives of interest can, with equal propriety, be ascribed to the members of the State Legislatures, as to the representatives of the same people in Congress.

The following passage in the President's message early attracted the attention of the committee: That "the expenditures heretofore made for internal improvements amount to upwards of five millions of dollars," and that the estimated expense of works of which surveys have been made, together with that of others projected and partially surveyed, amounts to more than "ninety-six millions of dollars." The committee, apprehending some mistake on this head, directed their chairman to offer a resolution requesting the President to transmit to Congress a statement of the expenditures heretofore made for internal improvements, specifying the several works, and the expenditures of each; also, a statement of the estimated expense of the works of internal improvement for which surveys have been made; together with a like statement of the estimated expense of other works projected and partially surveyed.

In compliance with this request, the President transmitted a report from the Secretaries of War and Treasury, from which it appears that the meaning of the President comprehended objects which the committee, heretofore, had not included under the head of internal improvements. Their idea was, that the term internal improvements did not embrace works affording facilities to foreign commerce; that the popular acceptance confined it to roads and canals in the interior of the country, and to the clearing of rivers above tide water.

It appears from the Treasury documents, that the item of "five millions of dollars and upwards," for internal improvements, embraces not only expenditures for roads and canals, but also the expenditures of the Government, since its commencement, "in building piers, improving and preserving ports, bays, and harbors, and removing obstructions to the navigation of rivers."

The latter objects, and others of a similar character, made up nearly one half of what is called "expenditures for internal improvements."

In reference to the item of ninety-six millions of dollars and upwards, the communication, in answer to the call of the House, arranges the works into three distinct classes—works commenced by the General Government; works not commenced, for which surveys and estimates have been made; works projected and partially surveyed; the estimates for the last class being conjectural. The first class includes all the works commenced by the General Government, and amounts only to three millions seven hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars, embracing altogether about fifty distinct works; forty-three of which are building piers, improving bays and harbors, and removing obstructions to the entrance and navigation of rivers. The other works contained in this class are roads now under construction, all of which, except the Cumberland road, are in the territory of Michigan.

The estimated expense of the second class is near fifty millions. It embraces fifty-four works, of which thirty-seven are for the improvements of harbors, opening the navigation of rivers, and the erection of piers and breakwaters. The other seventeen are surveys and estimates of routes for roads and canals.

With reference to the remaining class, estimated also at about fifty millions, it is made up of all the variety of works embraced in the other two classes. It is conjectural, and founded on no ascertained data.

The works executed or commenced for the benefit of foreign commerce have emanated from the Committee on Commerce.

As to internal improvements proper, the President is authorized by the act of the 30th April, 1824, to cause the necessary surveys and estimates to be made, and most of them have originated from this Executive source. There are but few instances in which Congress would be expected to bear the whole estimated expense. Under the head of the second class, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal is put down at an estimate of near twenty-two and a half millions of dollars. The eastern section of this canal, a space of one hundred and eighty-nine miles, between Washington and Cumberland, and more than half the length of the entire canal, computed separately at eight millions and a quarter of this sum, is now in progress under the direction of an incorporated company, with no other aid from Congress than the subscription of a single million of dollars, and with resources, acquired or anticipated, adequate to its completion without further assistance from the General Government.

Under the same head, a canal from Baltimore to the Potomac river is estimated at nearly three millions of dollars; but the project is abandoned: and, in lieu of it, a rail-road is projected, and contemplated to be made with private funds.

When we consider that all the works now in progress on the seaboard, and in the interior, only amount to three millions seven hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars, no fears need be entertained of the caution which Congress will always observe in making appropriations of money.

The committee consider the detailed communication from the President as very important; and lest any erroneous impressions be made concerning it, they have deemed it proper to have it annexed to this report.

As to the "five millions of dollars and upwards," expended on internal improvements, the committee refer to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 20th December, 1830, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th of May, 1830, which is also appended to this report.

On the subject of the Maysville road, the Louisville canal, and the Washington and Frederick turnpike, the committee will barely remark, that the two latter, in their judgment, are clearly of national character. The one connects the seat of Government with the whole Western country, and the other is greatly interesting to nine or ten States. The Maysville road lies in the heart of a fine country, and the travelling on it is continual. It is calculated to facilitate the trade of a rich portion of the Union with Pittsburg, the lakes, and the towns and villages lying on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, onwards to New Orleans.

It is represented "that the present state of the road requires about thirty-six hours for the transportation of the mail from Maysville to Lexington, a distance of sixty-five miles, and that, too, on horseback, exposed to every incident of weather. This state of things generally continues about six or seven months during the year, making an average of about thirty hours, or a little over two miles per hour, for the transit of the great western mail; the tardy, and frequently impeded progress of which, the people of the West have long considered a national grievance." A good road, it is believed, would reduce the transit of the mail from Maysville to Lexington, from thirty to six hours, in all seasons of the year; and create a saving in carrying the mail, nearly equal to the interest of the money proposed to be subscribed by the United States.

This is but a limited view of this improvement. It is in a direct line, and designed as a link in the contemplated national road through the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Alabama, and Mississippi, to the great southwestern mart in the State of Louisiana, passing by many towns; traversing States abounding with iron ore, and the various productions of the soil calculated for military defence and internal trade. In a case thus circumstanced, the committee think that the immediate representatives of the people were the appropriate judges. The veto power had been exercised, in cases of expediency, but two or three times in the last forty years. The committee will pass over those recently made, and confine themselves to the principle which the power contains.

The presidential veto, considering the difficulty of obtaining two-thirds, is nearly as absolute here as in England. No cause of alarm is here suggested, as either actually existing, or shortly to arise; still we may fall on evil times, when a vain and ambitious man, armed with his constitutional patronage, would seize on the example afforded by a popular President in days of political calmness. Should the people become familiarized with the exercise of this power, it would lessen respect for themselves and their immediate representatives, and be a virtual change of the spirit of the constitution. It would enable a designing man, with but ordinary address, to ingratiate the favor of the people, even in opposition to their own representatives; and, as soon as the sacred spark of confidence in the capacity of the people for legislation, through their representatives, shall be dimmed or extinguished, then, indeed, fears for the liberties of the country should be seriously entertained. This, of all other powers delegated by the constitution, ought to be most cautiously exercised.

In similar views on this subject, the committee have been preceded in the report to the House of Representatives on President Monroe's message of 1817, which grew out of a difference of opinion between the Legislature and the Executive on the constitutional powers of Congress. Mr. Tucker, of Virginia, as chairman of the committee, made a report, in which the following passage occurs in relation to this contested power:

"Involving, as it is supposed, a great constitutional question on the one hand, and intimately connected on the other with the improvement, the prosperity, the union, and the happiness of the United States, it presents the fairest claims to candid and diligent investigation. Nor is it without additional interest from the division of opinion to which it has heretofore given rise between the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government; a difference which, in the indulgence of the rights of free opinion, will be still found to exist between the sentiments promulgated in the message of the President, and those which will be advanced by your committee in this report; nor do they conceive that the expression in the message of the President, of an opinion unfavorable to the constitutional powers of the General Government, should be permitted to have any influence on the disposition of Congress to legislate on this interesting subject. For, if the constitutional majority of the two Houses should differ with the Executive Department, the opinion of the latter, however respectable, must yield to such an expression of their will. On the other hand, if, from deference to an opinion promulgated in an Executive communication, Congress should refrain from entering upon the consideration of a question involving constitutional doctrine, it might happen that the opinion of the President would prevent the enactment of a law, even though there should be the constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses in its favor. Thus, by the introduction of such a practice, the presidential veto would acquire a force unknown to the constitution, and the Legislative body would be shorn of its powers, from a want of confidence in its strength, or from indisposition to exert it. Whilst your committee are perfectly aware that nothing like this is contemplated by the Executive branch of the Government, they presume the House of Representatives will scrupulously avoid a course which may be construed into a dereliction of their privileges."

In reviewing the ground over which we have gone, the committee cannot perceive the "wrongs of the past," or "the evils to be arrested." Who, among those most unfriendly to national improvements, could rejoice in the annihilation of what has been already accomplished? The Cumberland road, admitting its great expense, growing out of want of experience in the construction of such works at the time, has been of inestimable benefit to the country. Who would wish its advantages destroyed, and the dilapidation of the dwellings and flourishing villages to which it has given rise? Who would desire ignorance of the topography of many important parts of the Union, in preference to the accurate knowledge of which we are now in possession? To whom would it give pleasure to behold the impediments in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers replaced? Would any patriot resist the efforts of the nation in the assistance given to effect a communication over the Alleghany, from the Chesapeake to the Ohio, which General Washington had so much at heart, and to which, in his opening message of 1823, President Monroe invited the attention of Congress? And, lastly, could any citizen desire the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and the Dismal Swamp canal, to be monumental ruins of the enterprise of their countrymen?

The committee do not propose to meddle with "the discharge of the public debt," as now provided for by existing laws. But, even supposing an interference, should its trivial amount retard the rising prosperity of the country? If we desire to be an example to the other nations of the earth, let us not fold our arms. It is the employment of the mind, and the activity of the body, that bestow true glory on a nation. We can perform no action more beneficial to ourselves and posterity, or afford no precedent of more valuable instruction to others, than to improve the natural advantages of a country which the beneficence of Providence has given us to dwell upon, and which is surpassed by none within the compass of the globe.

When can we expect a more favorable opportunity to pursue this great and good cause on a scale intrinsically worthy of its importance, and of the extensive resources of this powerful nation? If station gives influence to individual opinions, the committee are fortified with those of the President's two predecessors, who agreed in sentiment that the time had arrived to prosecute national improvements with the funds of the Union. Mr. Monroe used these emphatic words when the public debt was more than double its present amount: "It is of the highest importance that the question should be settled. If the right exists, it ought forthwith to be exercised."

The committee will trouble the House with only a few additional remarks.

A change of public sentiment by the great body of the people is intimated, and made, in part, the foundation of future action. The people, ever watchful of the true interest of the country, embarked early in this cause and persevered in a manner the most remarkable and praiseworthy. Although checked by the vetoes of two Presidents, and not cheered heartily by the countenance of any, they never abandoned the pursuit of this important object; and, at the commencement of the present administration, after the severest contest the country had ever witnessed, the representatives of the people, coming fresh from among them, and acquainted with their feelings and wishes, manifested again their unrelaxed zeal in favor of promoting their country's prosperity by national improvements. If there is any change of public opinion, it is important that it should be known. No citizen reveres the voice of this tribunal more than our Chief Magistrate, and none can give more accurate information on the subject than the immediate representatives of the people. The committee, therefore, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the General Government should continue to prosecute internal improvements by direct appropriations of money, or by subscriptions for stock in companies incorporated in the respective States.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE FINANCES.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1830.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report prepared in obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department."

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the PRESIDENT of the Senate U. S.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES.

In obedience to the directions of the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department," the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report.

I. OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES.

The receipts into the Treasury, from all sources, during the year 1829, were - - - $24,763,629 23

The expenditures for the same year, including payments on account of the public debt, and including $790,069 40 for awards under the first article of the treaty of Ghent, were - - - 25,459,479 52

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1829, was - - - $5,972,435 81

The receipts from all sources during the year 1829, were - - - 24,827,627 38

Viz: Customs - - - $22,681,965 91
Lands - - - 1,517,175 13
Dividends on bank stock - - - 490,000 00
Incidental receipts - - - 138,486 34

Making, with the balance, an aggregate of - - - 30,800,063 19

The expenditures for the same year, were - - - 25,044,358 40

Viz: Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous, including $9,033 38 for awards under the first article of the treaty of Ghent - - - 3,101,514 87
Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, pensions, arming the militia, and internal improvements - - - 6,250,230 28
Naval service, including the gradual improvement of the Navy - - - 3,308,745 47
Public debt - - - 12,383,867 78

Leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1830, of - - - 5,755,704 79

And leaving the total debt on the 1st of January, 1831	-	-	-	-	-	39,123,191 68
Viz: Funded debt	-	-	-	-	-	39,082,461 88
Unfunded debt	-	-	-	-	-	40,729 80

Of the sum applied to the public debt in the year 1830, $10,000,000 were the amount of the appropriation for the year, under the second section of the Sinking Fund act of 1817; and the remaining $1,354,630 09, taken from surplus moneys in the Treasury, were, with the approbation of the President, placed at the disposal of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and applied under the first section of the act of 24th May last.

The five per cent. stock subscribed to the bank being at all times subject to redemption, and the high market price of other stocks not offering any inducement to purchase, the discretionary authority given to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, by the second section of the act last referred to, has not been exercised; and, from the large amount of debt that is redeemable in the year 1831, and within the first two days of 1832, it is not probable that it will be necessary to resort to it in the year 1831.

The debt which will remain unpaid on the 1st of January, 1831, will be redeemable as follows:

At the pleasure of the Government, . . .	$13,296,397 57	of 3 per cents.
And . . .	4,000,000 00	of 5 per cents., subscription to Bank of U. S.
After six months' notice, . . .	1,539,336 16	of 4½ per cents.
After 31st Dec. 1831, . . .	5,000,000 00	of 4½ do.
After 1st January, 1832, . . .	5,000,000 00	of 4½ do.
And . . .	999,999 13	of 5 do.
After 31st Dec. 1832, . . .	56,704 77	of 5 do.
And . . .	2,227,363 97	of 4½ do.
After 31st Dec. 1833, . . .	2,227,363 98	of 4½ do.
After 1st January, 1835, . . .	4,735,296 30	of 5 do.

As the means for the redemption of those portions of the public debt which are redeemable at the commencement of any year are to be provided at the close of the previous year, and are actually drawn from the Treasury at that time, such stocks may be considered, for the purposes of this report, as redeemable in the previous year.

3. OF THE ESTIMATES OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE, AND EXPENDITURES FOR THE YEAR 1831.

The amount of imports into the United States for the year ending on the 30th of September, 1830, is estimated at $68,500,000, and the amount of exports at $73,800,000; of which $59,400,000 were domestic, and $14,400,000 foreign products.

The amount of custom-house bonds in suit, on the 30th September last, was $6,865,420; which sum includes all that remain in suit since the establishment of the Government, and exceeds, by $273,706, the amount in suit on the corresponding day of the last year.

The amount of duties on imports and tonnage, which accrued in the first three quarters of the year 1830, is estimated at $20,570,000, and in the fourth quarter at $5,610,000.

The amount of debentures issued during the first three quarters of the year 1830 is estimated at $3,331,895; and the amount outstanding on the 30th September last, and chargeable upon the year 1831, at $1,411,801.

It is estimated that the accruing duty on coffee and cocoa imported in 1830, and remaining in store on the 1st of January, 1831, will be reduced about $500,000, by the operation of the acts of the last session, reducing the duties on those articles; and that the duties on coffee, cocoa, salt, and molasses, accruing in 1831, and payable within that year, will, upon a like consumption to that of 1829, be further diminished by those acts about $600,000. The repeal of the duties on tonnage, which will take effect on the 1st of April next, will further reduce the revenue of the next year about $75,000. The subsequent reduction of the duties on tea, coffee, and salt, on the 1st of January, 1832, will probably lessen the usual importation of those articles for the demand of 1831. But the influence of these circumstances upon the revenue will be, in some degree, counteracted by the increased capacity of the country for consumption, as evinced by the enlarged amount of domestic exports, the general prosperity of mercantile business, and the favorable state of exchange with foreign countries; to which may be added the opening of the trade with the British colonies in the West Indies, and on the North American continent.

The revenue arising from the sales of public lands will be improved by the same general causes which tend to improve that from the customs.

From a view of all those facts and considerations, the receipts for the year 1831 are estimated at $23,340,000, viz:

Customs, . . .	$21,000,000 00
Lands, . . .	1,700,000 00
Bank dividends, . . .	490,000 00
Incidental receipts, including arrears of internal duties, direct tax, and canal tolls, . . .	150,000 00
	$23,340,000 00

The expenditures for 1831 are estimated at $23,228,065 86, viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous, . . .	$2,585,152 68
Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, pensions, arming the militia, and internal improvement, . . .	6,789,317 89
Naval service, including the gradual improvement of the navy, . . .	3,853,595 29
Public debt, . . .	10,000,000 00
	$23,228,065 86

In the estimate of expenditures for 1831, are included $1,375,154 77 of the appropriations for 1830, which were not required for the service of that year; and are applicable for the service of 1831, without being re-appropriated, viz. civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous, $40,833 18; military, $815,921 10; and naval, $518,400 49.

In respect to the duties on imports and tonnage, the estimate above presented will not apply for the succeeding year; for, when the reduction made at the last session shall have gone into full effect, the revenue will, according to the average of the last four years, viz. from 1826 to 1829, inclusive, be diminished $3,664,435.

The proceeds of the sales of public lands will probably be somewhat increased; but the amount of these sales will be limited by the ability of those who purchase lands for their own cultivation, adventurous speculation having ceased with the credit system. This source of revenue, therefore, except so far as it may be affected by future legislation, may be relied upon hereafter to sustain the estimate made for 1831.

The reduction in the receipts from the customs will be partially made up by an increased importation of the articles on which the duties have been reduced, at least so far as the consumption of them may have been hitherto restrained by the amount of the duty; but the reduction in the rates of duty is so great, that no increase in the consumption can be looked for so extensive as to make up any considerable portion of the deficiency; and, although the income and expenditure of the community may continue to bear the same relation to each other as heretofore, the amount of the duty saved to the consumer, instead of being applied wholly to the purchase of an increased quantity of those articles, will be distributed upon all the articles of consumption, domestic and foreign, dutiable and free.

In looking forward to the probable changes in the fiscal operations of the Government, when the public debt shall be completely extinguished, it is worthy of observation, that, with the exception of a single year, (1828,) there has been a gradual reduction of imports since the year 1825, and a continued reduction in the exports of foreign merchandise during the same period. These facts suggest various considerations, to be taken into view in estimating the future revenues of the Government; they also show, among other matters worthy of notice, that the navigating interest employed in foreign commerce, and particularly in the carrying trade, must have suffered a material depression. That portion of the carrying trade which is unfettered by navigation laws will necessarily fall into the hands of those who can navigate cheapest; and this falling off gives reason to apprehend that the superiority, heretofore claimed for American skill and economy in this pursuit, is yielding to more fortunate rivalry, and suggests the expediency of considering how far that interest may, without injury to others, be relieved from its depression.

The annexed paper, marked M, exhibits a detailed statement of the quantity and value of imports and exports liable to specific duties, and the value of those paying ad valorem duties, and of those free of duty, from the year 1821 to 1829 inclusive; and will furnish the means of ascertaining the increase or decrease of each branch of import and export trade, and the probable effect of any proposed change, as well upon the revenue as upon the various interests with which they are connected.

Should it be contemplated by Congress to make any further reduction of the revenues preparatory to the period of the final extinguishment of the public debt, it is respectfully suggested, that, in order to avoid impairing the necessary means for the ordinary expenditures of the Government, or encroaching upon the sinking fund, it will be proper that such reduction should take effect at a period sufficiently remote for the payment of the entire debt, as the reduction made at the last session will barely leave sufficient revenue for those objects during the ensuing four years. But there are some articles on which the duty may be reduced without injury to the revenue, and with advantage to other interests. The most striking example of this nature will be found in the duty laid on spices. If the imports and exports of these articles, known to be extensively consumed, but not produced, in the United States, be compared, it will be seen that, during the seven years preceding 1828, the nominal exports have exceeded in value the nominal imports by the sum of $168,155. Whether the consumption has been supplied by fraudulent importations, or whether debentures have been paid on fraudulent exportations, the fact is conclusive evidence that nothing can be lost by imposing a lower duty on those articles. The comparison for the last two years exhibits a more favorable result; but the difference is still much less than the actual consumption: and where such extensive frauds have been so successfully practised, it is scarcely to be hoped that any degree of vigilance sufficient to prevent them can be permanently maintained under the same temptation.

The attention of Congress is respectfully invited to the operation of a clause of the 3d section of the act, entitled "An act for the more effectual collection of the duties on imports," passed 28th May, 1830. The rule therein prescribed for appraising certain goods in packages, by adopting the value of the best article in each package as an average for the whole, went into effect on the 1st of October last. The notice was too short to allow of new orders being given in all cases; and some embarrassment has arisen in the appraisement of such articles as had, for the convenience of trade, and without any intent to defraud the revenue, been usually put up in mixed packages. In anticipation of this difficulty, directions were given to the Collectors to ascertain, until the 1st of January next, the difference, in each case, between the amount of duty imposed according to this mode, and that which would have accrued according to the customary mode; but, as the bonds have been taken for the duties on the average value, some legislative provision will be necessary to afford the proper relief. It may also be expedient to except some articles from the operation of the clause before referred to. Laces, in particular, are represented to be almost necessarily imported of different qualities in the same package; and some permanent inconvenience will be incurred to the trade in these articles, if the importer is obliged to have them assorted. It is also desirable that the character of the package for each description of goods required to be appraised upon the average of the best article, should be defined by law. The Department has endeavored to obviate some of the inconveniences arising from the change, and at the same time to secure the objects of the act, by allowing the parcels of such goods, which were put up separately, and designated as packages on the invoice, though enclosed in one general package, to be regarded as packages for appraisement within the meaning of the law. But the constant efforts to abuse this regulation on the part of some of those for whose benefit it was adopted, and the intrinsic difficulty of fixing, without specific legislation, any positive limit to the extent of the parcel to be deemed a package, will probably render it necessary, should no alteration of the law be made, to rescind the order, and to recognise no other package than the entire quantity put up in one exterior box or envelope. The general operation of the clause is found, however, to be beneficial: it facilitates despatch and uniformity in the appraisement of goods, as well as prevents frauds on the revenue; and, with the aid of the modifications suggested, mercantile ingenuity will, no doubt, find means, by conforming the packages to the objects of the law, to avoid its inconveniences.

Efforts have been made to give greater efficiency to the revenue cutter service; but it has become manifest that the compensation allowed by law to the officers is inadequate. The office of third lieutenant may, without injury to the service, be abolished; and, if an equivalent of the compensation now allowed to that officer, were divided between the other officers, and some addition made to the compensation of the warrant officers, to whom important trusts are confided, the service would be essentially improved, with but little increase of expense.

The regulations adopted for carrying into more complete effect the laws in relation to the revenue arising from customs, will be hereafter communicated, in obedience to the directions of the 10th section of the act in alteration of the several acts imposing duties on imports, passed 19th May, 1828. There is reason to believe that material benefit has already been derived from them, and that the measures adopted will improve in their effect with the increased experience of the officers.

The reduction of the duty on salt, made at the last session, which will take place on the 1st of January, 1831, and 1st January, 1832, respectively, would seem to render it proper to make a corresponding reduction in the drawback allowed on the exportation of pickled fish, which is fixed by the act of 29th July, 1813, at twenty cents per barrel, that being at the time the duty charged on one bushel of salt. Unless the law allowing the drawback shall be previously modified, the exporter will begin to receive, after the 1st of January next, a greater amount of drawback than the duty previously paid on the salt.

It is of great importance, as well to the revenue as to all the interests involved in the importation of foreign merchandise, that the action of the custom-houses should secure, as nearly as possible, a uniform payment of duty upon the proper value of imports, as contemplated by law; but there are insuperable difficulties opposed to the accomplishment of this object, under the present system of impost duties, to which the Secretary of the Treasury would respectfully invite the serious attention of Congress.

The valuation on which the ad valorem duties are now laid, is ascertained from the true or current value of the goods in the market of the foreign country in which they were manufactured or produced, with the addition of certain charges, and ten or twenty per cent., as the case may be, when imported from this or the other side of the Cape of Good Hope. The aggregate of these items on which the duties are laid is presumed to be the value of the goods when offered for sale in the United States market; but such is rarely the fact. It is not possible for the officers, even at any one custom-house, to ascertain the current value in the foreign market with such precision as will render it an item of uniform ratio to that of the current value in the United States; and, whatever approach might be made to this point by one set of officers, aided by long experience and superior skill, it is not to be expected that the officers of nearly one hundred separate custom-house establishments can be so well informed of the value of goods at all the places of exportation, or so equally qualified by ability and disposition for the performance of this difficult duty, as to secure any reasonable degree of uniformity in the imposition of the customs at all the places of importation. These difficulties, added to the general repugnance of the officers to be drawn into collision with the importers, will always render the invoice prices of merchandise the chief standard of current value in the foreign market; and corrections will only be made in cases of palpable error. This defective operation is the highest perfection which the present system appears to be capable of; but there are other important objections to it, which are worthy of great consideration. All impost duties are intended to be paid by the consumer. The present plan frequently obliges the importer to pay them, and probably as often compels the consumer to pay more than the proper charge upon his consumption. When goods are bought at high prices in the foreign market, and brought into a depressed market at home, the duty may greatly exceed the advance which the importer is able to sell for; in which event, a part or the whole of it falls on the importer: but if the goods are bought at prices below the usual current value, and brought into a market where the demand is brisk, the consumer pays not only the duty, but nearly as great a price for the goods as if the duty were laid on their true value at the place of importation. In the first case, the operation may prove ruinous to the importer; and, in the last, he receives in his profits a portion of what ought to accrue to the Government. By these operations, manifest injury is often done either to the Government, the consumer, or the importer; the uncertainty and hazard of commercial enterprise are increased; and, whatever failures ensue, the Government will generally incur a considerable portion of the loss.

As long as the current value, or rather the invoice price of goods in the foreign market, is made the basis on which duties are laid, peculiar advantages will be given to those who have the best opportunities of purchasing or making up invoices at rates below the current value. The purchaser who lays in his goods low not only derives a profit directly from this circumstance, but from the difference in the amount of duty paid on them at the custom-house. For instance, a difference of ten per cent. in the cost of an article paying a duty of fifty per cent. gives an advantage of fifteen per cent. to an importer who can purchase his goods at ten per cent. lower than another. This advantage is greatly increased under the operation of the classification of woollen cloths. These are now necessarily imported at prices near the minimum points; and those who can manage, either by making better purchases, or by disguising the current value in the invoice, to introduce cloths under a class of duty below that to which they belong, derive a much greater advantage than above stated. The cloths so transferred on the scale of duties may pay in one case forty-five cents per yard, instead of one dollar twelve and a half cents; and such importers may monopolise the supply of an extensive part of the market for that article, to the entire exclusion of those who have less favorable opportunities for purchasing, or will not resort to unfair means in preparing their invoices. The necessary effect of the system is, therefore, to throw an extensive branch of the importing business into the hands of foreign merchants, who can always lay in their goods on better terms than American houses having no connexion abroad, and into the hands of those who, whether foreign or American, are the least scrupulous of the means of gain. Under ordinary circumstances, the advantage which the American merchant has in selling is equivalent to that which the foreigner has in purchasing; but he cannot also compete with a different rate of duty. Such a system, therefore, must either corrupt the American merchant, or expel him from all those branches of business in which these operations can be carried on with success. It is believed that an effectual remedy for this serious and growing evil, is to adopt the current value of all goods (subject to ad valorem duty) in the United States as the true dutiable value—disregarding, of course, the cost in the foreign market, and excluding all charges and additions. Such a change, though important in its consequences, will not vary the principle on which impost duties are now presumed to be laid, and is in conformity with that which has long been practised in the most commercial nation of Europe. According to this plan, instead of resorting to vague and arbitrary rules to ascertain the value of goods in the United States, this object may be attained by direct means. Ordinary experience, skill, and attention on the part of the proper officers, will enable them to determine, with all necessary accuracy, the current value in their own vicinity; and the mass of information which might readily be collected to correct error, if any should be made by them, could not fail to secure a just and equal appraisement. This being accomplished, the Government will receive the whole duty paid by the consumer, and no more; the price of goods will be more steady; merchants will be exposed to less hazard; and the opportunity of fair competition between the American and foreign merchant, so far as it can be effected by the action of the Government, will be restored to that equality which a liberal policy cannot deny to foreigners, and which a wise Government will always desire to secure to its own citizens.

An additional reason for the proposed change may be found in the difference between the relative values of gold and silver, as established by different nations, and the liability to error in estimating by law the value of foreign moneys of account in those of the United States. This may be illustrated by referring to the money relations of the United States with Great Britain and with Portugal. The English pound sterling is fixed by law at four dollars and forty-four cents, United States money, while it is worth about four dollars and eighty cents; hence, the importer of goods invoiced in sterling money pays a duty on seven and a half per cent. less than they have actually cost. The millrea of Portugal is established by law at one hundred and twenty-four cents; its actual value in United States money is 111 $\frac{22}{100}$ cents, consequently, the importer of goods from Portugal pays duty on about eleven and a half per cent. more than their actual cost; which makes the difference between the valuation on which duties are imposed at the custom-house, on goods imported from England and Portugal, about nineteen per cent. in favor of the importations from the former. These discrepancies, as well as all those which arise from the occasional introduction of paper and other currencies in foreign countries, whose proportional value to gold or silver cannot be accurately ascertained, will be avoided by adopting the value of the goods in the United States market as the basis for charging duties. This effect of the monetary system should of course be taken into consideration in fixing the amount of duty in conformity with the proposed change.

It cannot be doubted that a rate of duty imposed in this form somewhat lower than the present, exclusive of the allowance for the difference in the money, would not only produce more revenue, but give more stable and substantial security to the interests of manufactures and commerce.

The only objections to this change which appear to have weight, are, first, the difficulty of making so minute an appraisement as would be necessary of all the articles of importation, without a considerable increase of custom-house officers; and, secondly, of making the appraisement uniform at all the ports. The first may, it is believed, be obviated by arranging the goods into classes according to value, in such manner as to render the appraisement not more laborious than at present. These being so adjusted as not materially to vary the rate of duty between contiguous classes, and yet sufficiently distinct to enable the appraisers to assign each article, with reasonable accuracy, to its proper class, aided by an invoice of the goods at their value in the United States, to be furnished on oath by the importer, would secure all the facilities desired for expedition and accuracy in the appraisement, with but little addition to the number of officers or the expenses of the custom-house. The second objection applies to the present system with more force than to that proposed; but this difficulty may be removed by establishing a regular intercommunication and transmission of prices current and samples between the custom-houses, which could not fail to prevent abuses, and secure a more uniform appraisement than when the valuation is based on prices in the foreign market, inasmuch as it will be easier to ascertain the current prices at the principal marts of commerce in the United States than in those of foreign countries.

In recommending these important modifications in the impost system, as well as those suggested in the last annual report, it may be proper to remark, that it is deemed by the Department very undesirable to make frequent changes in measures of public policy which affect so extensively individual as well as public interests, and that proceedings of this nature should be subjected to a careful scrutiny, and ample time given by way of notice to all who may be affected by them, as well foreigners as citizens of the United States, before they are carried into effect. But, notwithstanding this indisposition to change, it is proper to remark that much of the legislation upon this subject, since the act of 2d March, 1799, has been adopted chiefly with a view to promote particular objects of special interest pressing upon the Government at the moment of its action; and hence some necessary precautions for guarding the revenue, and avoiding the injuries liable to be inflicted by the changes upon those engaged in commerce and other pursuits, seem to have been overlooked. The approaching crisis in the fiscal policy of the United States will require a revision of an important part of the system; and the opportunity will be propitious for a general review of its defects. The proposed modifications are, therefore, now presented to the consideration of Congress. To afford time for mature deliberation, and for collecting all the information that may be necessary, if their adoption should be determined on, to reconcile individual interests with those of the Government.

All which is respectfully submitted.

S. D. INGHAM,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 15, 1830.

UNITED STATES' MILITARY ACADEMY.

West Point, June 24, 1830.

SIR: The Board of Visitors to the Military Academy of West Point, having completed their examinations, I have with transmit their general report, upon the various subjects to which their attention was called; together with the sub-reports of the committees, upon which the general report was founded.

I have the honor to be, &c.

MONTFORT STOKES, of N. C.

President of the Board.

The Hon. JOHN H. EATON, Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES' MILITARY ACADEMY,

West Point, June, 1830.

Honored by an invitation to visit the United States' Military Academy at West Point, we have continued some weeks industriously occupied in the arduous, important, and delightful task assigned to our care. You requested us to be full and free in our investigation of every department; we have literally obeyed that injunction, and now come respectfully to present the result of our labors, not in a strain of formal applause, but in candidly discussing, on their separate merits, a few of the leading topics which have presented themselves.

Whoever has closely viewed this noble institution, must feel a pride in its existence and prosperity; and we trust it is reserved for your hands, by a few judicious alterations, to model into perfection this cradle of future warriors and statesmen.

The true value of any institution can be appreciated, only by comparing it with the results which it was intended to produce; we consider, then, that this academy is expected to furnish to the army a supply of efficient officers; to the militia, an intermixture of well trained citizens, qualified on emergency to discipline that last and best arm of republics; to internal improvement, a corps of engineers, capable of giving wholesome direction to the spirit of enterprise which pervades our country. It ought to furnish science for exploring the hidden treasures of our mountains, and ameliorating the agriculture of our valleys; nor is it upon inert matter alone that it ought to extend a vivifying influence. Inheriting from our varied ancestry the discordant characteristics of every people on the globe, it yet remains to form a specific and all-pervading character for the American nation; nor do we conceive any surer method of stamping upon the yet glowing wax a more majestic form, than by sending into every district young men, emphatically the children of our country, trained to the manly exercise of arms, and imbued with the tastes of science and literature; instructed in the principles and action of our political system, and the living exemplar from which sound education may rear the social edifice.

These preliminaries being adjusted in the vestibule, permit us to conduct you into the interior of the Academy, where we have attended the examinations with assiduous diligence.

It would stretch this report to inordinate length, were we to detail the multifarious points examined: they can be found on the programme of the professors. Suffice it to say that, on all branches, the answers were ready, thorough, evinced a fundamental understanding of the subject, and proved that the judgment of the pupils had been cultivated, rather than their memory superficially extended.

The art of war is, and ought to be, the grand object of attention. It naturally divides itself into three branches—engineering, artillery, and tactics. The theory of each is explained on mathematical principles, whether for attack or defence, in works or in the field. The construction of permanent or temporary fortifications; entrenchments, with their various uses and positions; movements and manœuvres; the effects and manufacture of various projectiles; in short, every thing that could impress the principles, or illustrate the practice of war, was minutely insisted on. Objections were raised, difficulties were proposed, searching questions were asked; on each and every point, the answers evinced the subjects to be well understood.

The Board, however, without pretending to the knowledge of military men, would suggest whether the great and almost exclusive attention devoted to military engineering and the science of fortification, does not retrench what is due to the "art militaire" in its most comprehensive sense: that is, to grand tactics, and what may be termed the strategy of war. A competent course of instruction in this department we conceive would require an additional text book, and a regular course of lectures on the art of war; embracing for illustration descriptions of remarkable battles, showing how they were fought, what excellence of generalship or stroke of genius won, or what errors lost them. Admirably situated, also, as the school is, with regard to its topographical advantages and adaptation to the purpose, it would be highly useful in perfecting the military education of the cadets, if they were occasionally taken into the field, and trained in the practical application of the science of engineering and topography, in which they are so well instructed in theory.

An astonishing proficiency in drawing proves that no ordinary praise is due to that department. But its character is entirely civil, and confined to the imitation of pictures and models. Is it not essential that military surveyors should be accustomed to sketch nature readily and accurately from the surrounding mountains?

Civil engineering has been also well taught, and we listened with much pleasure to a discussion on the properties and analysis of various materials; with all the details of arches, bridges, canals, locks, inclined planes, roads, tunnels, railways, embankments, harbors, &c. We predict that pupils of West Point will deliver the country from that quack engineering which has, in divers instances, inflicted deep wounds upon our system of internal improvement. Architecture receives due attention: Grecian and Roman models have been procured, and our country may be embellished by the taste of the cadets, provided they abstain from imitating the buildings in which they are taught that science.

We have made a patient and minute inquiry into the police, discipline, and fiscal concerns of the Military Academy at West Point. Considering it to be of the utmost importance to the welfare and stability of this valuable institution, that its management, in these respects, should exhibit fidelity and sound judgment; and various circumstances having conspired to render it desirable at the present time, that the Department of War, and the public generally, should be fully satisfied whether or not this is the case, we have felt called upon to devote our best attention to this branch of investigation. We feel much pleasure in acknowledging that every facility has been given to us by the superintendent. Books and documents have been freely thrown open to our inspection, and every individual concerned has fully and readily answered our interrogatories.

For the sake of precision, our observations will be arranged under the three specific heads: Police, Discipline, and Fiscal Concerns.

1st. Police.—We visited every part of the institution that properly comes under this head. In the tailors' and shoemakers' shops, we examined the style of making the various articles of clothing provided for the cadets. We also visited the shop of the store-keeper, and are satisfied that these establishments are placed under regulations well adapted to secure the cadets from all impositions, and, at the same time, to restrain them from any needless extravagance. The mess hall and the kitchen were visited several times during meals, and while the food was under preparation: the bill of fare and the other regulations were examined. We were of opinion, that all the details of the establishment are so arranged as to secure a cleanly, wholesome, and abundant supply of food; and that the duties of the steward are performed in a most exemplary and faithful manner. We are no advocates of the Spartan black broth; yet it seems a question, whether youths ought to be accustomed to a fare more generous than they will probably find on returning to the parental household. In the house assigned for the hospital service, the rooms and the apothecary's shop were found in perfect order, and under excellent regulation. The building, however, was esteemed to be inadequate to the accommodation of the post; we were, therefore, much gratified in visiting the new hospital, for which an appropriation was recently made by Congress, and which is now almost ready for occupation. It contains sufficient accommodation for the sick, together with houses for the surgeon and his assistant, under the same roof. With the neatness and solidity of the building, the convenience of its internal arrangement, and the beauty of its location, we were greatly pleased. While pursuing our inquiries in this department, we learned, that although the cadets are not liable to violent and fatal diseases, yet their general health does not appear to be as good as would be expected from the salubrity of the place in which they live, and the attention paid to their food, cleanliness, &c. A very great amount of medicines, such as are administered in a torpid state of the digestive organs, and in other diseases incident to persons of sedentary and studious habits, is used at this post. The proportion is believed to be much greater than that required for any other military station belonging to the United States. We esteem this to arise from a want of sufficient bodily exercise, and that it exists principally during the winter season, and in the spring. In summer and autumn, the daily drills and other excitements to bodily exercise are sufficient for the purpose of health, and the beneficial result is very obvious: but for nearly half the year, the military exercises are suspended, and the severe winter climate, in some measure, precludes those of a voluntary nature. The young men are consequently obliged to pass at once from an active state to habits sedentary and studious in no common degree, and the evils just intimated must follow of course. In order to alleviate, or entirely remove them, we are convinced that a building should be erected adapted to winter drills and gymnastic exercises; and that they should be regularly required.

The sutler's establishment fell under particular examination. Although it is to be regretted that there is one at this station, yet we are fully convinced that its strict regulation prevents any injury resulting from it to the cadets; and that the soldiers and laborers, for whom alone it is wanted, are much less exposed to evil than if they were tempted, for want of such a place, to encourage the secret introduction of spirituous liquors, and the establishment of shops for selling in the neighborhood, which would be under no control. We are glad to learn, that, through the instrumentality of a temperance society, recently formed among the soldiers, and by other measures prudently adopted, the consumption of spirituous liquors has manifestly decreased.

The hotel, the erection of which was authorized by the Department of War, has been occupied for a year past, and it is at once an ornament to the Point, and a great accommodation to the numerous visitors who resort to it. For many years the want of such an establishment has been seriously felt by the inhabitants of the Point, and by the many persons who were constantly landing there from motives of curiosity, or to visit cadets—their friends or relatives. Upon the farm, purchased some time since by the United States, there was, indeed, a tavern, but it was useless, being altogether out of the way of persons arriving at the station, and its purchase was rendered expedient, because it was sufficiently near the barracks to entice the cadets to resort to it. The present hotel is placed in the best possible position for the accommodation of visitors, and it is under such judicious regulations, that no inconvenience can be reasonably apprehended from it.

2d. Discipline.—We at first experienced some little hesitation at entering minutely into this part of our investigation, lest it might bear the appearance of an unwarranted distrust of the superintendent and the academic staff; but, considering the Department of War and the country at large have a right to full and explicit information upon this, as upon every other point connected with the management of the Academy, and that the Board of Visitors are sent here for the purpose of obtaining and communicating this information, we esteemed ourselves under obligation to proceed. We regard it as no more than justice to the superintendent to say, that, so far from having any unwillingness to being interrogated upon this head, he solicited, in the most frank and honorable manner, a full and minute inquiry. He made a lucid statement of the principles upon which every part of the discipline of the academy is conducted, and also exhibited the books and registers in which all the proceedings relating to it are preserved. These we examined, and asked and received full information upon every point which required elucidation. The deliberate judgment at which we have arrived is, that no discipline could be established upon sounder principles, nor administered with greater kindness, discrimination, justice, and decision, than that of the Military Academy at West Point. Certain rules for conferring approbation or administering reproof are laid down, well known, and understood by the corps of cadets. It is believed to be impossible that any one of them should fall under censure without having had previous and ample warning. Whether or not the custom of instituting courts martial to try the cadets for certain offences, should be continued, or, whether it would not be better to give this authority entirely to the academic staff, we are not prepared to express a sentiment. We have no hesitation, however, in giving the decided opinion, that sentences passed, after a full and impartial investigation, should be sustained; and, that a case must be extreme, indeed, to warrant its being suspended or reversed. We are satisfied that such occurrences have a tendency to weaken discipline, and bring wholesome authority into contempt, and that if frequently repeated they would produce effects the most injurious to the true interests of the Academy.

There is in successful operation a very thorough system of classifying the cadets, and registering their relative standing, both as it respects general deportment and proficiency in the various studies. This information is transmitted to the Department of War, in the former case, every month, and, in the latter case, every week. By this effective and judicious system, the public authorities are almost as fully and minutely informed of the relative merits of the cadets, and of the general condition of the national school, as they could be were it established at the seat of Government. The only suggestion which the committee has to offer, under this head, is, that, if practicable, the parents and guardians of young men at the Academy, should have official information concerning their conduct and standing at stated periods, and especially that timely warning should be given when cadets exhibit a tendency to such neglect of study, or irregularity of deportment, as will subject them to censure, or such natural incapacity as renders them unfit to receive the public patronage. We are satisfied that, whenever such information has been requested by parents or guardians, it has been given by the superintendent promptly and frankly. But, if given universally and statedly, it would impose upon the superintendent an amount of correspondence which, in addition to his other weighty and responsible duties, it would be next to impossible to execute, even under the impulse of his well known and devoted zeal to the best interests of the Academy. If the present suggestion then be entertained, some general plans must be adopted for carrying it into effect, and the superintendent must have the requisite assistance. It may be worthy of the serious consideration of the Department of War, whether such a measure would not be just in itself, as alleviating the anxieties of parents and guardians, and also expedient, as having a tendency to prevent or remove such prejudices against the academy as have been excited in the minds of those to whom the information of the serious delinquency of their children or wards has been communicated without previous warning.

3d. Fiscal concerns.—We have not been less diligent and minute in our inquiries under this head, than under those which have preceded; on the contrary, if investigations have been more thorough upon any one point than upon another, they have taken place upon that now under consideration. Having learned that the attention of previous Boards had not been specially called to this subject, we thought that a time had arrived when, with advantage to the service, and with satisfaction to those particularly concerned, and to the country generally, the fiscal concerns of the Academy, not only for the past year, but for a number of years, might be thoroughly examined.

We have visited the office of the quartermaster, and, as far as his department is connected with the Academy, (and to this only could our attention be directed with propriety,) we are fully satisfied that it is well conducted; the system by which the various books are kept is very complete; and we have no opinion to express but that of entire approbation. The office of the treasurer and paymaster more fully employed our attention, as in this office are kept the accounts of expenditure amongst the cadets, and of receipts and disbursements relating particularly to West Point. We will first express, in general terms, not simply our approbation, but our admiration of the accuracy and neatness with which the whole business of this office is conducted. In the circular letter received from the Secretary of War by the members of the Board, it is suggested to inquire particularly into the fiscal concerns of the Academy: as, however, the receipt and disbursement of the pay of the cadets, and of other appropriations made by Congress, is regularly examined in another quarter, we supposed that it was principally incumbent upon us to examine relatively to the moneys which might arise from the property of the United States at the Point itself. As regards the cadets, their accounts are kept with great precision; they have to pass such repeated examination, and are so effectually checked, that it seems hardly within the limit of possibility that any individual of the corps should suffer loss, or be permitted to indulge in extravagance. Each one has a pass book, being a transcript of his account on the books of the office; he has, also, a similar book for his running account with the different tradespeople. No bill is discharged unless it has the signature of the cadet himself, in testimony of its correctness; nor can he procure any article of dress, or otherwise, except by express permission, under the hand of the superintendent. We were fully satisfied in these particulars. Our attention was then directed to the state of the public property at this post. We found in the books accounts opened with two different funds, called the land fund and the school fund. The former was commenced by virtue of authority derived from the Secretary of War, and communicated to the superintendent from the Engineer Department, in a letter from General Macomb, bearing date December 20, 1822. It appears that the present superintendent, finding that a considerable saving might be made of small amounts derived from the public domain, which had previously been lost or thrown into the treasury without discrimination, suggested to the Engineer Department the expediency of raising a fund from the same. The idea was communicated to the Secretary of War, was approved by him, and the superintendent duly authorized to make the proceeds arising from the public domain at West Point, by selling wood, hoop poles, &c. &c. a separate fund, to be applied to the benefit of the institution. From this source, and from the rent of certain public buildings occupied by persons living at West Point, this fund was accumulated. We examined the books relating to its very origin, and followed up the accounts to the present period. We believe that every single article of receipt and expenditure came under our notice and inspection. The wood was sold to persons who, under contracts regularly entered into, and communicated to the Engineer Department, bought it on condition of receiving half the proceeds for cutting it down and carrying it to market. These proceeds are regularly entered in the books. In some instances this wood was purchased from the contractors by the quartermaster for the United States' service, and upon reasonable terms. On this point we have to observe, that the fuel purchased for the use of the station, during the administration of the present superintendent, has been procured upon terms considerably more favorable than at any previous period. By strict economy and good management the amount of sixteen thousand three hundred and forty-six dollars and eighty-four cents has thus been secured to the United States. It has been expended in erecting a kitchen to be attached to the cadet's mess room; in constructing barracks, which were much needed for the musicians of the band; and the balance, of eight thousand seven hundred and thirteen dollars, has been appropriated to building the hotel above mentioned.

The school fund has been raised from the profits accruing from the sutler's establishment. It has been expended in erecting two school houses, and in partly maintaining teachers for the children of the soldiers upon the Point, and others connected with the public service. A small amount of this fund has been transferred, for a time, to the land fund; but is to be returned when the charge for building the hotel is liquidated.

The station at West Point has been greatly benefited in several respects, and especially by the erection of a large, commodious, and handsome hotel, which commands the united approbation of all who have seen it, and which every person, at all acquainted with the situation, regards as having been a measure of indispensable necessity. The whole cost of the hotel is seventeen thousand two hundred and twenty-six dollars and twelve cents; of this sum, five thousand eight hundred and ninety-five dollars and thirty-seven cents are yet unpaid. This balance, however, is rapidly decreasing by the proceeds of the land fund, and the rent of the hotel. When this balance shall have been entirely liquidated, the whole rent of the hotel, which can never be less than one thousand dollars per annum, and perhaps more, will be available to meet expenditures for the post schools, the library of the academy, and for other valuable objects connected with it. From this statement it will be obvious that no common degree of credit is due to the superintendent, for his watchful care over the public interests, and for the good judgment with which they have been managed. For these important objects the Government has not been called upon to make a single appropriation, nor have been exposed to any expense whatever. The whole has been accomplished by a rigid economy of resources which might have disappeared by neglect, without the knowledge of any one, and which in some degree had disappeared, until arrangements were made by the present superintendent to preserve and increase them, until they amounted to a fund adequate to the accomplishment of the above valuable purposes.

We therefore cannot satisfy our feelings without expressing our unqualified approbation of the faithful and judicious conduct of the superintendent. We would esteem it an insult to his well earned and well sustained reputation, as a gentleman and a man of honor, to give him our public meed of approbation for his integrity in conducting these measures. This can never for a moment be impeached, from any quarter reputable in itself or deserving notice, from its information upon the subject. We, however, with propriety, can repeat our judgment, that the land fund and the school fund have been raised and increased by the exercise of strict economy, and have been disbursed for valuable and substantial improvements, with good taste and sound judgment.

Having, as you will perceive by the preceding review, minutely examined the police and fiscal departments of the institution, we consider it due to the gentlemen filling these departments, to express our unanimous and warm approbation of the system, order, and efficiency, with which the duties of the military staff of the post are discharged.

We have the satisfaction of declaring that, after a patient and minute investigation of the internal police, the discipline, and the fiscal concerns of the Military Academy at West Point, we find nothing to disapprove, little to suggest, and very much to commend.

Warfare, commencing on the ferocious onset of savage barbarians, rose gradually with civilization into an art, and, since the invention of gunpowder, has assumed the dignity of a science, based upon mathematics and natural philosophy. As such it is treated at West Point. Without troubling you with a detail of the numerous ramifications through which the study is followed, we shall only state that we have heard with interest and pleasure a very protracted examination upon all the leading topics of algebra, surveying, shades and shadows, perspective, spherical projections, and the calculi. These, with a long list of other performances, form a mathematical exercise, surpassing in extent and accuracy the course (we believe) of any other academic institution. While we pay a merited tribute to the learning and assiduity of the preceptors, and the talent and diligence of the pupils, we must remark that this appears to us a pursuit of somewhat all-engrossing character. To a certain extent, mathematics are indispensable, and must occupy much time, but beyond that universal test, utility, we think they ought to give place to studies of equal importance. Mechanics, optics, electricity, astronomy, and other branches of natural philosophy, next occupied our attention; and we consider them taught with a success as great as possible with a very limited apparatus. Considering the high importance of these subjects, an appropriation for this specific purpose would be well judged liberality.

We think that some modifications might be beneficially adopted in the apportionment of attention allotted to each branch of study. Mathematics are indisputably the basis of military science, and we would by no means disparage a branch of study of such pre-eminent importance. But mathematics are not the alpha and omega of the art of war. Few minds are competent to grasp, and still fewer to carry into their highest application, the recondite propositions of that science. Nor is this probably requisite. To a certain extent, such inquiries are of paramount importance; but we doubt whether it be essential to the formation of an efficient officer, that he be able to solve every question on the equation of osculatory circles. Let full scope be still afforded to genius of this species, as often as it is discovered, and, when sufficiently matured, let its claims be allowed a preference in the engineer and artillery corps; but let us not destroy talent, in its other beautiful and useful forms, by clipping it into triangles and parallelograms. There are other qualifications of the citizen-warrior, characters never to be separated,) to which we recommend increased attention; convinced, as we are, that, in the conduct of war, genius of the highest order frequently exists, without that peculiar bent which leads to excellence in mathematics.

Destined to become depositaries of a power, in its nature arbitrary, ought not these interesting youths to be early taught to appreciate the principles, and venerate the authority of law; and through the kindly medium of philosophy, to view their duties and relations towards friends and country? Circumscribed by quarters, garrisons, and camps, ought not the studies of language and literature to afford them, in the pursuits of cultivated taste, some refuge from the tedium of indolence, or the excitements of conviviality? Are history and geography as nothing amongst the qualifications of an accomplished soldier? Under such impressions, we have passed, with undiminished interest, from the laws of matter and motion, to the mental fields of ethics, rhetoric, and language. Upon international law, as well as upon the spirit, provisions, and operation of the federal constitution, the cadets have exhibited a very competent knowledge; but this branch might be pushed with advantage into a much wider inquiry—the philosophy of government in its elements, and political economy in its administration. In ethics, the answers were accurate, spirited, and gave earnest that their duties, as men and citizens, are well understood. We find no fault with the selection of words, the turn of expression, or the grammatical construction, under which ideas were expressed; yet some little attention might be directed to these particulars. In the place of rhetoric, there is a chasm to be filled up, as far as any useful purposes demand, with a very succinct course. Facility and grace in English composition are the results of habit; and young men ought to be exercised in committing their thoughts to paper. We therefore recommend, that subjects for short essays be given weekly to students of the first class.

Although the dead languages may not form an object of primary importance, nevertheless they whose previous education had proceeded upon this basis, ought not to be suffered to throw away acquirements costing so much time. Greek may be superfluous, but, following the example of English military schools, Latin, if known, ought not to be forgotten.

Our institutions contemplate the soldier as something better than a mere machine for fracturing human limbs. Peace is the genius and natural state of the American Government; war is only an exception to the general rule: the cadets ought, therefore, to be trained to maintain their rank in civil as well as military life. But this cannot be accomplished without some school library of cheap editions of English classical, historical, and miscellaneous works, which might be made to circulate. A slight monthly examination in geography and history would enable the professor to give proper direction to this branch.

Another difficulty is here encountered. No professor can thoroughly discuss his subject without reference to authorities, and no student can successfully follow a chain of reasoning, if all inquiry be limited within the narrow precincts of a text book. At every step collateral views arise, which cannot be pursued without access to a library—an arsenal, which ought to contain every intellectual weapon. A library there is, rich in all that regards military or physical science; but we seek in vain for the volumes of intellectual knowledge. The professor has done much, but he has done it from private funds; and we submit whether public liberality should not afford a small appropriation for books on moral and literary topics. To read the French with tolerable distinctness, and to translate it with facility, are, perhaps, all that is necessary in that language; and these objects have been successfully pursued. Accurate pronunciation and ready expression can only be acquired by long intercourse with natives, and are neither absolutely requisite nor entirely attainable at the Academy; but, as the language is taught by the most competent instructors, such increased attention to pronunciation as will not materially augment the time consumed in the study, is deemed expedient.

Having recommended some extension of the scheme of instruction, we naturally look for the means by which it can be accomplished. The cadets are already tasked to the extreme of their powers, and it would be unreasonable to impose additional studies, unless some modification be adopted in the mathematical department, or higher qualifications be exacted for admission, or the course be prolonged to five years. A union of the first and last of these alternatives might be salutary, and would grant an additional hour daily for those exercises, on which the bodily, nay, mental vigor of youth, so essentially depend. Perhaps a school for preparing boys, during one year before their admission to the rank of cadet, would meet every difficulty—care being taken to admit none whose extreme youth renders it improbable that they can readily imbibe instruction. Sixteen years seems the lowest age at which a boy should be admitted as cadet.

Considering the disadvantages under which the department of chemistry labors, the examination upon that science and military pyrotechny, was creditable alike to the instructors and pupils. Not only the room appropriated for this department, but the chemical products and materials are insufficient; and these pursuits are of importance sufficient to merit increased consideration. A permanent professor, with adequate rank and emolument, additional rooms, and an increased apparatus, should be allowed: the value of these three requisitions being in the order in which we state them.

The application of mineralogy and geology to the "art militaire," may not be of indispensable importance; but if a large portion of the cadets are destined to act as civil engineers, and to assist in developing the natural resources of the country, then these sciences assume a new aspect. Some of us have seen beds of the most valuable minerals, which had lain neglected and unknown, brought to light and utility by the cursory survey of a well educated engineer.

The senior class of the cadets was exercised in cannon and mortar firing; their shot and shells were thrown with surprising accuracy, and could scarcely have been excelled by veteran gunners. The whole corps was carried through a series of artillery and infantry evolutions, and performed all its movements with a readiness and precision which evinced thorough instruction, practically as well as theoretically. The muscular steadiness and machine like uniformity of a disciplined regiment are unattainable by youthful limbs, but in their celerity and accuracy of movement are visible the elements of future proficiency. Although divested of much of the pomp and circumstance of war, the general effect was truly military. Having reviewed the pupils, we now turn to the preceptors; and the first consideration which presents itself is the vital importance of commanding the services of men qualified in the highest degree. In this happy country the field is unbounded for the employment of talent and industry; and if any institution refuse an adequate remuneration, others are ready to attract able men by more liberal offers. In this respect, there is ground to apprehend a deterioration subversive of the credit and value of the Academy. While the institution at West Point exacts duties more extensive and more harassing than perhaps any other seminary, we are constrained to say that the emoluments of its instructors are below the general scale. Of these truths a practical illustration arose before us in the distinguished professor of engineering, who, it is probable, quits the establishment for the employment of a private company.

A short inquiry will satisfy you on these points, as well for the increase, as for the equalization of salaries. Here let us add, that, after a strict inquiry into the manner in which the authority of the superintendent is exercised over the cadets, the Board is gratified to find that authority administered in a manner as parental and indulgent as would comport with a proper enforcement of the laws of the academy, and with the true interest of the pupil. In this point of view, as well as in all others, the United States have been peculiarly fortunate in the gentleman who presides over the institution.

If health and vigor be necessary to the prosecution of any object, it is peculiarly indispensable that the early training of a soldier should conduce to the primary qualities of endurance, strength, activity, and hardihood. While we pay a tribute of applause to the mental discipline of the Academy, we think that the zeal of science has overlooked somewhat of the attention due to that homely adage that a sound body is most frequently the domicile of a sound mind. We would therefore renew the recommendation to a former Board, that provision be made for proper instruction in horsemanship, and that increased attention be directed to the exercise of the sword. These are parts of a regular training in many private academies, and seem peculiarly indispensable in a military establishment. It may be true that most boys can ride and handle a weapon with tolerable dexterity; but the fate of a battle frequently depends upon the horsemanship of an aid-de-camp; and an officer's only weapon of offence and defence is his sword; and we submit, that qualities upon which may frequently depend the success of an operation, or the life of an individual, ought not to be left to the hazard and awkwardness of self instruction. These are attainable in perfection only by the flexible muscles of youth, and might be so arranged as to form a healthy relaxation from sedentary occupations. We therefore recommend that a building be erected for horsemanship, the sword, and gymnastic exercises. Eight thousand dollars appear to us an indispensable provision for that object.

In this place we may cursorily remark, that, for a situation so highly favored by nature, and intended to become one of our monuments of national greatness, some architectural design is much wanted. When a new building is erected, it should be upon a site and after some model which may form part of a general effect; whereas, under the present system, the eye is greeted only by the appearance of a somewhat irregular village.

West Point is an academy strictly national, founded for the benefit, and supported by the liberality of the people at large. We have scrutinized with jealousy, and perceived no ground for insinuating that the distribution of cadetships is the appendage of power or the tool of political patronage. Yet it must not be concealed that from such a prejudice, widely disseminated, has originated much of the dissatisfaction manifested towards the institution. An evident method presents itself to obviate such objections, and place the establishment upon its proper popular basis. Let a youth be selected from each Congressional district, a bona fide inhabitant within that geographical circle, and in all cases never to be replaced but by one similarly qualified. But a wide margin should be left for the sons of deceased officers and the discretion of the War Department.

Let this be represented by two cadets from each State and territory. Thus the Academy will form a portrait of Congress; the distributions will be in the same ratio as our population; every portion of our country, however remote, will enjoy a fair share of its benefits, and general justice and satisfaction will be felt.

We shall not descend from general remarks to minute details; but we should do injustice to the Academic Staff, and to the various departments, civil and military, of this noble institution, and an equal violence to our own feelings, were we to close without expressing, in broad and unqualified terms, our sense of the fidelity, diligence, and ability, with which their respective avocations are conducted. Such preceptors and such pupils are worthy each of the other. Nor is this a scanty praise. We see before us the flower of American youth, the guardians of their country in war, its ornaments in peace, congregated from every region of our wide-spread republic, the destined warriors and statesmen of a future generation. May the friendships of their early life grow into ligaments binding together the giant members of our confederation, and giving perpetuity to those political institutions which form the best earthly hope of man!

In fostering this institution by all the means placed within your control, you will render one of the best services to your country which your high trust can enable you to perform. The extension of its benefits, either by the enlargement of the capacity and resources of this school, or by the establishment of a second, in a different and distant part of the Union, would be one of the most substantial public benefits which could mark your distinguished administration, or be conferred upon our country by the National Councils.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

MEMORIAL OF THE CHEROKEE INDIANS.

PRESENTED TO CONGRESS JANUARY 18, 1831.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the undersigned, delegation from the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi, thereto especially instructed by their nation, respectfully sheweth unto your honorable bodies the afflictive grievances which it has been their unhappy fate to endure for some time past.

They would respectfully call your attention to the memorials submitted before you during the last session of Congress, embracing subjects of great importance to the interests and welfare of their people; some of which they beg leave, at this time, again to repeat.

The State of Georgia, in its earnest desire to acquire the extent of her chartered limits, set forth a claim to a large portion of Cherokee lands, as having been purchased under the treaty of the Indian Springs, made with the Creek nation, and which, it is well known, was rendered null and void by a subsequent treaty, entered into in 1826, in this city, with the same nation. Under the authority of said State, a line has been run by commissioners, comprehending more than a million of acres of land, lying north of the established boundary between the Cherokee and Creek nations, and to which the latter disavowed any pretension of right, claim, or interest. The subject was brought before the President of the United States, who has caused a third line to be established, never contended for by any of the parties, and unauthorized by any existing treaty with either nation, though officially declared shall be the line between the lands ceded by the Creeks in 1826 to the United States, and the Cherokees. On the portion of territory we have thus been deprived of, were the houses and homes of many Cherokees, who have been compelled to leave them, with the farms that afforded their families subsistence. "The tract of land," says Governor Gilmer, in his late message, "from which the Cherokees have been removed by order of the President, is supposed to contain four hundred and sixty-four thousand six hundred and forty-six acres, and now subject to be disposed of," &c. From the decision of the President on this subject of boundary, your memorialists, in behalf of their nation, beg leave to appeal, and to question the legal and constitutional powers of the Chief Magistrate to change or alter, in any manner, the established line between the Cherokees and Creeks, without their consent. A difference of opinion had arisen in 1801, between the same nations, relative to a certain part of their boundary; and when the subject was introduced at the War Department by a deputation of Cherokee chiefs, and the interference of the Government solicited, the following reply was given by direction of President Jefferson: "It will be very difficult for the President to ascertain the lines between the several countries of the red people. They must settle all such controversies among themselves. If you cannot agree, how shall we be able to decide correctly. [See minutes of conferences holden at the War Office, between the Secretary for the Department of War, on behalf of the United States, and a deputation from the Cherokee nation of Indians, on behalf of the said nation, on the 30th of June and 3d of July, 1801.] During the administration of the same eminent lawyer and statesman, the treaty of 1806 was made with the Cherokees, by the third article of which the right of Indian nations is admitted, to settle and determine questions of boundary among themselves, viz: "It is also agreed on the part of the United States, that the Government thereof will use its influence and best endeavors to prevail on the Chickasaw nation of Indians to agree to the following boundary between that nation and the Cherokees," &c. "But it is understood by the contracting parties, that the United States do not engage to have the aforesaid boundary established, but only to prevail on the Chickasaw nation to consent to such a boundary between the two nations." By these references, we believe the position of our nation to be fully and clearly sustained; and that its agreement with the Creek nation in 1821, on this subject, is binding to all intents and purposes, and that the sanction of this Government was not essential thereto, to make it so; and that they alone, by voluntary surrender of their lands, have the right to alter that boundary.

By the treaty made with the Arkansas Cherokees in 1828, inducements were held out to the individuals of our nation to remove west of the Mississippi, and join their brethren, who had withdrawn from their connexion with us in 1817 and 1819, and established for themselves a separate and distinct Government, thereby absolving all the political relationship which had previously existed as citizens of the same community. That treaty was never presented to the authority of our nation for its assent, nor the right of the Arkansas Cherokees ever admitted to interfere with, or affect, in any manner, the rights and interests of our people. Under its provisions, however, individuals have been induced to emigrate; and, in pursuance of the stipulation contained in one of the articles, that the Government would make to every individual so emigrating "a just compensation for the property he may abandon," appraisers were appointed by the President, who has extended the term "property abandoned" to embrace the houses, farms, and lands upon which situated, claimed by emigrants, and who have valued, agreeably to instructions, the improvements so claimed or occupied by them; and it is now contended that the United States have acquired a title to the lands as well as to the improvements valued, and permission given by the Executive to citizens of the United States to enter the nation, and occupy them to the exclusion of the natives. The lands are, it is well known, not held in severalty by the Cherokees, but as a nation; and this right has been solemnly guaranteed to them by treaty with the United States. The right of individuals to cede or transfer any portion of their territory has never been admitted, either by themselves or the Government; and in point of justice and law, all such citizens of the United States who have thus been permitted to enter and settle upon the territory, are intruders, and the faith of this Government is pledged for their removal. We protest against the right of the Arkansas Cherokees, or the Government, to enter into any arrangement to affect our rights contrary to the will of the nation, and also against the introduction and continuance of a population in our country, so detrimental to the interests and peace of our citizens, the security of their persons and property from insults and outrage; and so utterly at variance with the plighted faith of this Government, for our territorial protection and promise of good neighborhood.

It is further contended by the Executive, that the United States have acquired a title to lands within the present acknowledged bounds of the nation, under the seventh article of the treaty of 1817 with the Cherokees, which stipulated that the United States should lease to the Indians improvements that had been abandoned by emigrants, and who had received compensation for the benefit of "the poor and decrepit warriors" of the nation, and which was to be continued until such improvements were "surrendered by the nation or to the nation." By the treaty of 1819, the leases under that of 1817 were declared void, which is of itself sufficient evidence of a surrender to the nation of all such improvements as fell within its limits agreeably to the boundary then established; and it is moreover declared, that the treaty of 1819 is a final adjustment of the treaty of 1817, and the lands then ceded to the United States are in full satisfaction of all claims which the United States have on that nation on account of a cession of lands on the Arkansas, for the benefit of the emigrating Cherokees; yet a claim has been asserted by the Executive, on the part of the United States, to a title to lands within our present bounds, acquired under an article in the treaty of 1817, which, by the treaty of 1819, was rendered void, and fully satisfied, which, it is said, enure to the benefit of Georgia, and is made another plea to allow intrusions. Added to all these are many other intruders, who, without any other pretext than to trespass upon our possessions and our rights, contrary to existing laws, are allowed to annoy and harass our peaceable citizens to an almost insufferable degree. In many instances they have by violence forced the natives out of their houses, and taken possession; while others, less daring, have erected buildings for their own use, upon the premises of the objects of their oppression. The frequent complaints made through the agent, and otherwise, to the Government, failed to produce the desired relief from circumstances so well calculated to produce excitement and disturbance between the whites and the red people. To such an alarming extent had intrusion been indulged, that the authority of the nation, relying on an article of treaty, and the former advice of the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, when a General of the southern division of the United States' army removed a few families who had penetrated far into the country, and of the most exceptionable character—a measure demanded by the security of the persons and property of the Cherokees. It was seized upon and declared a hostile movement, and an armed band of intruders, in retaliation, wreaked their vengeance upon a few peaceable individuals. One was cruelly murdered, another wounded, and a third led a prisoner into Georgia, and thrown into jail, whence he was subsequently released, after much trouble, by a writ of habeas corpus. A report of these transactions was made to the Government by the United States' Agent, which, however, resulted only in calling forth language of exception against our chiefs; and the perpetrators of the murder are still trespassing, in open day, upon our rights and our territory, which has drank the blood of an innocent victim to their outrages. During the past summer, the United States' troops were ordered into the nation, as we believe, for the purpose of redeeming the pledges of the Government for our protection; they removed the intruders, who had flocked in thousands to our gold mines, and a few also along the frontier settlements; many, however, were not molested, and others returned in a short time after, placing at utter defiance the authority vested in the United States' Agent, and heretofore exercised by his predecessors. All the Cherokees who had been engaged at their gold mines were removed with the intruders, and experienced much injury and inconvenience, under an order from the Department of War, and during the stay of the troops in the nation were not permitted to re-engage at their mining operations. The troops have been suddenly withdrawn, and our country again left exposed to the ravages of intruders. An act has recently been passed by the Legislature of the State of Georgia authorizing the Governor thereof to take possession of our gold mines, and appropriating twenty thousand dollars for that purpose; and another providing for the survey of our country into sections, and for the appointment of magistrates therein; against which we would most solemnly protest, as a departure from the obligations of good faith, and the desire to secure and promote the peace and friendship so often repeated in our treaties. The language of the great and illustrious Jefferson, through the Secretary of War, to our chiefs, recurs to our memory with peculiar force: "The President listens willingly to your representations, and requests you and your nation to be assured of the friendship of the United States, and that all our proceedings towards you shall be directed by justice and a sacred regard to our treaties. You must be sensible that the white people are very numerous, and that we should therefore be desirous to buy your land when you are willing to spare it; but we never wish to buy except when you are perfectly willing to sell. The lands we have heretofore bought of you have been marked off by a line, and all beyond that line we consider absolutely belonging to our red brethren. You shall now receive the map of the last line, which has heretofore been promised to you, to stand in evidence between your people and ours, and to show which lands belong to you and which to us." (See document before referred to.) We would most earnestly pray that the kind assurances of the friendship of the United States, by one whose examples are so worthy of imitation, may never be passed over with an unfeeling heart for the unfortunate Cherokees; and that all proceedings towards them may be directed by justice and a sacred regard to treaties.

The Executive of the United States, during the past summer, issued an order to the Agent for our nation, changing the mode of paying the annuity, and providing for its distribution amongst the individuals, averaging about forty-two cents each, contrary to the well known wishes of the Cherokees, and their solemn protest against the measure, the stipulations of existing treaties, and the uniform practice of the Government, down to the payment of the last annuity in 1830. It is a stipend due to the nation, and has ever been controlled by its authority. The Cherokees have a treasury into which it is placed for the support of their Government—"a Government of regular law," modelled agreeably to, and in pursuance of, the kind and parental advice of President Jefferson, contained in a written address to the Cherokees, 9th of January, 1809--and other national objects, by which means all are enabled to enjoy, in some degree, the benefits arising from its application; but of what possible advantage will it be, if paid as contemplated, when hundreds will have a hundred or more miles to travel, neglecting all other business, to obtain the small sum of about forty-two cents? But it cannot be: we protest against any alteration, and humbly hope that you will direct the payment as heretofore, and in conformity with the treaties under which the fund is stipulated. We are aware that it has been asserted that the chiefs and others speculate upon this fund; but it is not so: even if it were, would it justify a departure from the course which the pledges of the United States have bound its officers to pursue? The language of one so truly the friend of the weak and the oppressed as the Chief Magistrate of the United States in 1808, is too explicit to pass unnoticed on this occasion. To the Chiefs of the upper Cherokee towns he spoke as follows:—"You complain that you do not receive your just proportion of the annuities we pay your nation--that the chiefs of the lower towns take for them more than their share. My children, this distribution is made by the authority of the Cherokee nation, and according to their own rules, over which we have no control. We do our duty in delivering the annuities to the head men of the nation, and we pretend to no authority over them, to no right of directing how they are to be distributed." (See Address, signed Th. Jefferson, to the upper Cherokees, dated 4th May, 1808.) That the same mode may be still continued, is all we ask, and it is anxiously desired by the whole nation. Since that year there have been no complaints on the subject; why, then, at this late period, when civilization has taught better the manner in which this small sum should be applied, is the change in the mode of payment to be made?

During the last session of Congress a bill was passed, whose object, as we understood, was to enable the President of the United States to comply with the compact of 1802, between the United States and the State of Georgia, and afford means to the Indian tribes, whose great desires were represented, by the advocates of its passage, to effect their removal west of the Mississippi. It is not desirable for us to remonstrate upon this occasion, but we hope that the kind indulgence of your honorable bodies will be extended, while we state some of the many cases of affliction and oppression which have occurred since the passage of the act. A ray of hope, in the midst of great apprehension, seemed to shed its glimmering light on the minds of the Cherokees, to learn, from the speeches of the Georgia delegation and others, in Congress, that nothing should be practised on the Indians in the operation of the bill, or in connexion with it, that benevolence and humanity could censure; that neither force nor injustice was contemplated by the Government, or the authorities of Georgia; and that they should be left to the exercise of their own free will. But experience has taught us to know that a powerful auxiliary has been afforded to forward the views and the policy of that and other States, and of the Executive of the United States, towards the unfortunate aborigines of this continent. They have looked back upon the scenes and prospects of other days, and the contrast with those of the present time has caused much sorrowful feeling. Georgia, in the recent measures put in force to compel the Cherokees to listen and yield to the eloquence of the Secretary of War, and Government's special agent, has departed from the high and magnanimous pledges of kind dealing toward the Indians, on the floor of Congress, and has frowned and threatened to prostrate their innocent determination to abide on their ancestral territory; but without effect. She has sent armed guards of fifties, thirties, and tens, in time of profound peace, under pretence of executing her laws, and when the occasion did not require a display of "the pomp and circumstance of war." Leaving the Indian children in destitution to mourn their hapless lot, she has led their fathers in captivity to a distant land, to destroy their spirits by immuring them in the walls of her prisons. In one case a white man, who had, a long while ago, taken the protection of the nation, and married a Cherokee woman, and, under the care of the Cherokee nation, had acquired property and a large family, whose interests are identified with those of the Indians, having entered into a mercantile partnership with two Cherokees, he soon fell out with them, and instituted suits against them in the courts of the nation, which decided against him. After this, he filed a bill in the superior court of Gwinnett county, in Georgia, against the two Cherokees, and prayed a writ of ne wheat, before Augustin S. Clayton, judge of the court, sitting in chancery, who awarded the writ, which was served upon one of them in the Cherokee nation, by a deputy sheriff of Georgia, and, under a guard of three men, he was carried about eighty miles to the common jail of Gwinnett county, in the said State, where he was kept in close confinement until the sitting of the court in September last, when he was brought up for trial before his honor A. S. Clayton, who issued the writ, and was discharged, on the ground that the affidavit of the plaintiff was not sufficient to have warranted the issuing of the writ. During the same trip, by the deputy sheriff, he arrested an elderly Cherokee woman, a married lady with a large family, on a plea of debt, and carried her off captive from her husband and children, fifteen miles on towards Georgia, when she fortunately succeeded in obtaining her liberty by giving bail.

In another case, in the name and authority of George R. Gilmer, Governor of Georgia, a bill was filed in chancery, in the superior court of Hall county, in July last, against certain sundry Cherokees, praying for an injunction to stop them from digging and searching for gold within the limits of their own nation; and the bill being sworn to before the same A. S. Clayton, he awarded an injunction against the parties named in the bill as defendants, commanding them, forthwith, to desist from working on those mines, under the penalty of twenty thousand dollars, at a time and place where there were unmolested several thousand intruders from Georgia and other States, engaged in robbing the nation of gold, for which the owners were ordered not to work by the said writ. Under the authority of this injunction, the sheriff of Hall county, with an armed force, invaded the nation, consisting of a colonel, a captain, and thirty or forty militia of the State of Georgia, who arrested a number of Cherokees engaged in digging for gold, who were at first rescued by the troops of the United States stationed near the place, and the sheriff and his party themselves made prisoners, and conducted fifteen miles to the military camp, when a council of examination was held, and the exhibition of their respective authorities was made, which resulted in the release of the sheriff and his party, and a written order by the commanding officer of the United States' troops, directing the Cherokees to submit to the authority of Georgia, and that no further protection could be extended to the Cherokees at the gold mines, as he could no longer interfere with the laws of Georgia, but would afford aid in carrying them into execution. On the return of the sheriff and his party, they passed by the Cherokees, who were still engaged in digging for gold, and ordered them to desist, under the penalty of being committed to jail, and proceeded to destroy their tools and machinery for cleaning gold, and, after committing some further aggression, they returned. Shortly afterwards, the sheriff, with a guard of four men, and a process from the State of Georgia, arrested three Cherokees for disobeying the injunction, while peaceably engaged in their labors, and conducted them to Wadkinsville, a distance of seventy-five miles, before the same A. S. Clayton, who then and there sentenced them to pay a fine of ninety-three dollars cost, and stand committed to prison until paid, and also compelled them to give their bond, in the sum of one thousand dollars, for their personal appearance before his next court, to answer the charges of violating the writ of injunction aforesaid. In custody they were retained five days, paid the cost, gave the required bond, and did appear accordingly as bound by Judge Clayton, who dismissed them, on the ground that the Governor of Georgia could not become a prosecutor in the case. For the unwarrantable outrage committed on their liberty and persons, no apology was made, and the cost they had paid was not refunded.

During the past summer, a Cherokee was arrested in the nation by an officer of the State of Georgia, on a charge for murder committed upon the body of another Indian, in said nation, and carried to Hall county, and placed in jail, to await his trial under the laws of that State. After some months confinement, he was taken out, and tried by the aforesaid A. S. Clayton, and sentenced by him to be executed on the 24th December last. An application was made to the Chief Justice of the United States for a writ of error, in order that the case might be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, to test the constitutionality of the proceedings, and was obtained. The arbitrary manner in which the citation was treated by the Governor and Legislature, then in session, are known to you. The resolutions adopted on the occasion breathe a spirit towards our nation, of which we will not permit ourselves to speak: suffice it to say, therefore, that the writ of error has been disregarded, and the unfortunate man executed agreeably to the sentence of the judge.

One other case: A party of armed men, ten in number, from De Kalb county, Georgia, committed numerous outrages, under the pretence of being Georgia officers, as far as seventy-five miles within the nation. They arrested a Cherokee without cause, and compelled him to pay a horse for his release. Under forged claims, they attempted to arrest another individual, and, with him, his negroes, but failed: arrived at the residence of another, in his absence, they were in the act of driving his cattle off, when they were rescued by his neighbors, though they succeeded in committing some robbery upon the house. At another place they forced from an Indian his horse, without even a pretended claim, and cruelly abused the persons of two aged Cherokees, one a female, causing a flow of blood, because they did not quietly suffer themselves to be robbed of their property. Two of their children, who had felt it their duty to interfere for the protection of their aged parents, from an insult and outrage so barbarous, were led captive into Georgia, and compelled for their liberty to give their notes for one hundred dollars, each, payable in ten days!

Many other cases of aggravating character could be stated, did the nature of a memorial allow, supported by unexceptionable evidence. To convince the United States of our friendship and devotedness to treaty obligations, we have endured much, though with bleeding hearts, but in peace. And we hope enough has been done to convince even the most sceptic that a treaty "on reasonable terms" can never be obtained of our nation, and that it is time to close this scene of operations, never contemplated by the compact between the State of Georgia and the United States. How far we have contributed to keep bright the chain of friendship which binds us to these United States, is within the reach of your knowledge. It is ours to maintain it, until, perhaps, the plaintive voice of an Indian from the South shall no more be heard within your halls of legislation. Our nation and our people may cease to exist before another revolving year re-assembles this august assembly of great men. We implore that our people may not be denounced as savages, unfit for the "good neighborhood" guaranteed to them by treaty. We cannot better express the rights of our nation than they are developed on the face of the document we herewith submit; and the desires of our nation, than to pray a faithful fulfilment of the promises made by its illustrious author through his Secretary. Between the compulsive measures of Georgia and our destruction we ask the interposition of your authority, and a remembrance of the bond of perpetual peace pledged for our safety, the safety of the last fragment of once mighty nations, that have gazed for a while upon your civilization and prosperity, but which now totter on the brink of angry billows whose waves have covered in oblivion other nations that were once happy, but are now no more!

Reduction of the number of Officers of the Army.

The schools where our children learn to read the word of God, the churches where our people now sing to his praise, and where they are taught that "of one blood he created all the nations of the earth;" the fields they have cleared, and the orchards they have planted; the houses they built, are all dear to the Cherokees, and there they expect to live and to die, on the lands inherited from their fathers, as the firm friends of all the people of these United States.

R. TAYLOR,
JOHN RIDGE,
W. S. COODEY,

In behalf of the Cherokee Nation.

WASHINGTON CITY, 15th January, 1831.

To the beloved Chief of the Cherokee Nation, the LITTLE TURKEY, on behalf of the said nation, the Secretary of War of the United States sends greeting:

FRIEND AND BROTHER: The deputation appointed by you to visit the seat of Government have arrived, and been welcomed by your father, the President of the United States, with cordiality; they have spoken, and he has heard all the representations that they were instructed by you, on behalf of the Cherokee Nation, to make to him. In his name, I have answered them in sincerity and truth; and when they shall report to you what I have said, I trust that you will feel all uneasiness removed from your minds, and that you and your nation will experience that satisfaction which must result from a conviction of the certainty with which you may continue to rely on the protection and friendship of the United States.

These can never be forfeited but by the misconduct of the red people themselves. Your father, the President, instructs me to assure you, in behalf of your nation, that he will pay the most sacred regard to the existing treaties between your nation and ours, and protect your whole territory against all intrusions that may be attempted by white people; that all encouragement shall be given to you in your just pursuits and laudable progress towards comfort and happiness, by the introduction of useful arts: that all persons who shall offend against our treaties, or against the laws made for your protection, shall be brought to justice; or, if this should be impracticable, that a faithful remuneration shall be made to you; and that he will never abandon his beloved Cherokees nor their children, so long as they shall act justly and peaceably towards the white people and their red brethren.

This is all that he requires from you in return for his friendship and protection: he trusts you will not force him to recede from these determinations by an improper and unjust change of conduct, but that you will give him abundant reason to increase, if possible, his desire to see you happy and contented under the fostering care of the United States.

I send you by your beloved chief, the Glass, a chain; it is made of gold, which will never rust; and I pray the Great Spirit to assist us in keeping the chain of our friendship, of which this golden chain is meant as an emblem, bright for a long succession of ages.

H. DEARBORN, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, 7th July, 1801.

REDUCTION OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

Letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives, for reducing the officers of the army.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1831.

Sir: At the last session of Congress a resolution was passed by the House of Representatives, directing the Secretary of War to report "whether any reduction in the number of officers in the army of the United States can be made without injury to the public service," &c.

The inquiry presented by this resolution is in reference to the officers, not to the rank and file of the army; and that I should be enabled fully to answer it, inquiries, during last summer, were addressed to the principal officers at the different posts, that their opinions might be obtained, and their experience and observation availed of, upon a subject of so much importance.

A digest of the several reports received by the Major General has been communicated; but amongst them there is no general concurrence, by which any certain conclusion can be arrived at. In reference to the resolution, I am constrained, therefore, to offer such opinions and suggestions, as to the general state and condition of the army, as are the result of my own reflections.

While our regular force is small it is a consoling reflection, that it is in the power of this country to boast of a militia who breathe an ardent love of country, and who are ready to devote themselves to any emergency that circumstances may impose. There is no disguising the fact, however, that they are unskilled in military discipline, and hence incapable of those efforts which should render them valuable and efficient in war. To relieve against this, various attempts have been made. Efforts to give some uniform organization to this force have been essayed, but in vain. The same rule of discipline that might prove operative in one State may fail to be beneficial in another. The system is defective, and must continue so, until some more salutary plan than any yet devised can be adopted.

It occurs to me, (and I suggest it for consideration with great respect,) that, in peace, an organization of the army and militia should take place, based upon principles which look altogether to a state of war. In 1812 this country was thrown into a belligerent attitude, and the disasters at the commencement furnish a lesson which the intelligence of statesmen ought not to disregard. It will not do to be compelled to organize an army ad oro in moments of pressure, and when the public safety is at hazard.

A preparation to be serviceable must take place when time and leisure afford the opportunity. All things being in readiness, should war ensue, a country has only to rely on the zeal, fidelity, and bravery of her citizens, and then every thing will proceed well. But the exercise of all these high qualities will prove of slender avail if the preparatory means for aiding and assisting them be wanting.

It is not the conceded policy of this Government to keep in service a large standing army, though its practice has always been to retain one to some extent. The economy which was practised in 1801 did not suggest the employment of a less force than three thousand men, which were under the command of a brigadier general. Now, our population and resources are three or four times greater than they were at that period of our history. The great desiderata to our army is, to elevate, in some way, the soldier's character, and to infuse proper feelings of pride. Inducements are wanting to allure to the service proper materials. Inasmuch as a soldier, by existing laws, is without the hope of rising above the grade of a non-commissioned officer, the attaining that grade ought to be rendered more desirable than it is at present, by having increased pay and emolument granted, with the privilege to the soldier, after a limited period of faithful service, to retire and become stationary at some vacant ordnance post, where his services could be had by the Government, and an adequate support afforded him. By such an inducement, meritorious men may be brought into the army service, each of whom, aided by proper officers, would be able to give valuable instruction in a few weeks to the militia that should be called out, or to new recruits, as they might be wanted. Properly inspired, every soldier might become a drill officer, the beneficial results of which, at the onset of war, would be sensibly perceived and felt.

The small military force we possess upon the present organization, is based upon principles which, if occasion should require it, may give rise to immediate and beneficial effects. The rank and file, as they stand in relation to the number of officers in command, are of skeleton form, and capable to be multiplied and considerably enlarged, should the circumstances of the country make it necessary. In an emergency, the number of troops might be doubled or tripled, thereby, with the present officers, in a short time, to bring into active and useful service a force of fifteen or twenty thousand men. This was the design had in view by the act of 1821, which reduced the army. Change the organization, and let some future necessity demand an enlargement, and a new recruit, both of officers and soldiers, will be required, the tendency and effect of which would be probable injury to the public service.

For reasons which have been often adverted to, the reliance of this country, in moments of difficulty, must be upon the militia; and the examples which past time presents afford an earnest that on this reliance we may safely depend. But while frequent instances have occurred to prove the value of this defence, that it is capable of high and daring gallantry, it should not be forgotten that, to render it still more efficient and valuable, the militia should be disciplined. To the attaining of this important object, the partial army we possess might materially conduce, when new recruits are wanted. Could we entertain a reasonable expectation that the country would continue at peace for any definite period of time, the propriety of disregarding, in the interim, military preparation, and pride, and feeling, would be questionable.

As it relates to the command of companies, no reduction and no organization of the officers, different from the present arrangement, can be advantageously made, except as to the supernumerary brevet lieutenants. In the annual report from the War Department, which accompanied the President's message, it is stated, that, in the ensuing year, perhaps, but certainly in the succeeding one, there will be one hundred and six lieutenants attached, by brevet appointment, to the army, while the number that may be taken into service, by regular appointment, cannot exceed twenty-two annually; consequently, there will be regularly and constantly in each year, eighty-four supernumerary officers not needed or required by the service, and which will occasion an annual expense of more than sixty thousand dollars to the Government.

With the exception here suggested, I can perceive no beneficial change that can be made as it regards the company officers, nor indeed any as it regards the regimental officers. In relation to these, the present organization is perhaps as perfect and complete as it can be rendered.

The officers retained under the reduction in 1821 were known to be proportionably greater than was necessary to the number of the rank and file upon a peace establishment; but the object of the organization was to present such a force, and under such circumstances, as that, in war, the greatest possible efficiency and activity might be attained at a short notice. But if these principles, then sanctioned, and so long acquiesced in, are to be departed from, and the object of the resolution be to organize the army upon a mere peace establishment, in reference to present exigencies, and without regard to the probabilities of war, and of danger, at some future period, then, by that rule of adjustment, it might, for our present service, be sufficient to place the army under the command of a brigadier general. By such an arrangement, one major general and a brigadier, with three aids-de-camp, could be dispensed with, and thereby a saving to the Government be created of more than fourteen thousand dollars a year.

In this view of the subject, the pay department might also be reformed to advantage, be rendered more serviceable, and less expensive than under the present system.

The law at present authorizes fourteen paymasters to be retained, which cost the Government annually about thirty-two thousand dollars. Not more than six appear to be necessary. The public business could, with that number, be better attended to, and at a saving of eighteen or twenty thousand dollars annually, to the country. The great distances which the paymasters of the army travel in visiting their posts, render the carrying of money hazardous, and occasion large expenses to the Government on account of their transportation. These inconveniences may be avoided by retaining a few of them to be arranged at different points, with a view to disburse the necessary funds to the subordinate agents at posts. Let a quartermaster or commissary, at the several posts where troops are stationed, have the trust confided to them of making payments to the troops, and the expense of eight paymasters and their clerks will be saved, and the public, by the arrangement, be better served. Instead of payment being made to the troops once in six months, as is the case now at some of the posts, it might be done monthly or weekly. The soldier will be better satisfied, and by having only small sums of money in his possession, will have less disposition to desert, and fewer facilities to enable him to do so. Should this suggestion be adopted, it might be necessary to authorize the Secretary of War to demand, from time to time, such bonds, and in such penalties, from the principal and subordinate paymasters, as the exigency of the service might seem to require.

By this arrangement there would be a considerable saving in the expenditures of the Government, even after making to the subordinate paymasters a reasonable compensation for their disbursements, if to grant any shall be considered advisable. But whether the number of paymasters be reduced or not, an authority should be given to the Secretary of War to appoint pay-agents at distant posts, and to place them under bonds for the faithful performance of their duty. The paymaster, for example, who is charged with the superintendence of the troops at cantonment Gibson, resides at Louisville, Kentucky. To visit this post once in two months, as the law requires, will make the transportation account alone nearly equal to eight thousand dollars a year. By an act of the last session of Congress, a post is directed to be established at Key West, not far from the island of Cuba. One company has accordingly been ordered there. Going to and returning from that post to Pensacola, (the residence of the paymaster,) will make his transportation account to constitute a considerable item in the course of the year; when, by the authority asked for, the payments may be as well and safely made (and at a trifling expense) through some selected officer of the company. The same remark is applicable to all our remote and distant posts. Transportation accrues to the paymasters and their clerks, and the expenses of a guard are oftentimes to be incurred, to give safe convoy to the funds in their possession. Subordinate agents being stationed at these distant places, by drafts, to be drawn on the principal paymasters, large expenditures, and particularly the risk of transportation, would be avoided.

The Surgeon General of the army might be dispensed with. He has no disbursements to superintend or make, no bonds to receive, no accounts to revise, or responsibilities to encounter. The principal and material duty to be rendered by him, is in the purchasing and distributing of medicines; a duty which is performed by a quartermaster of the army at New York, at which place medical supplies are obtained, and from which point they are distributed to the several posts.

The two Inspectors General of the army, it occurs to me, are not essential to the service, under a contemplated peace establishment. As these offices heretofore were executed, the incumbents were required to make secret, confidential, communications to the Department, of the conduct of officers, together with the more general duty of reporting the situation of our posts, their condition, arms, and armament. It is not compatible with the dignity, the feelings, the pride, and character of an officer, to have private confidential reports made of him and his command, to be placed privately away amongst the archives of the office. There are some on file of former times, which, if rendered public, could not fail to produce strife and difficulty amongst individuals. Why inspect the conduct of an officer? Reliance must be had on his pride of character. He is unfit to command who deserves not implicitly to be confided in. If, in any thing required by law or regulation, an officer disregards or omits the performance of the trusts confided to him, remedies are at hand, and vigilance for their fulfilment, on the part of his associates, is seldom or ever wanted. The approach of an inspector to a post is nearly periodical. The officer in command can calculate with much accuracy as to the period of the visit, and can well arrange every thing to meet his arrival and the inspection. If disposed to do his duty, the inspector brings no benefit, produces no good. If careless of it, a few days of preparation will place him securely beyond any effect from the inquest.

Harmony is essential to the quiet and well-being of an army; and to this regard should be had, if one is to be retained. Strife and jealousy amongst different branches and departments of it should be avoided, if possible. Their consequences are disagreeable, and their tendency injurious to the public service. To effect so desirable an object, I beg leave to say, as matter connected with the subject of the resolution under consideration, that the administrative branches of the staff of the army should not be connected with the line of the army. The fancied ease and increased emolument which these offices afford, make them the cause of solicitude to those who obtain them, and of jealousy on the part of others, who are less successful in their applications. To avoid this, it has become an object with the Department, in the distribution, to equalize these appointments amongst the respective regiments, as much as possible. It might be preferable to separate them entirely; at least the experiment might be safely and advantageously essayed for the present, by some changed organization in the Ordnance Department.

In peace, or in war, this is a most important arm of our service. Through it are provided munitions of war to be in readiness in moments of danger, and by it are constructed the arms which are required for the defence of the country. Immense quantities (more than ten millions) of public property are in its possession and care. Officers, when composing a part of the army, in justice to themselves, to their own improvement in the lines, and that jealousies may be suppressed, should occasionally return to their commands. Changes must take place, and these changes affect the regularity of the system, and often occasion a waste of public property. A bill was introduced at the last session, which, if properly matured, and acted upon, would contribute to the efficiency of this arm of service, and to the public interest, and at the same time add but little, if any thing, to the present expenses of the army.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. H. EATON.

To the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Letter from the Secretary of War in reply to so much of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant as relates to the Topographical Engineers.

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 20, 1831.

SIR: In answer to that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant, which relates to the topographical engineers, I have the honor to state:

That the topographical corps of the army is of great importance to the country. Recently, its operations have been confined to what may be considered civil purposes; to the surveying of practicable routes for roads and canals, and to the opening and improving of the navigation of our streams, bays, harbors, and inlets. These, seemingly, are all exclusively civil objects, although they are not so in reality, inasmuch as the information thus obtained, may be serviceably used hereafter in military operations. When war shall take place, the benefits resulting from the industry of this corps will be found of incalculable advantage. A knowledge of the relative positions of places, of their elevations and depressions, and of the advantages promised by their occupation, will remain in the War Office, ready, on proper occasions, to be turned to useful account.

The surveys which are now possessed are the work of this useful and valuable corps, and have been obtained by the industrious pursuit of its duties, through successive seasons. If the works to which they have reference should ever be undertaken, the results of those surveys are in readiness, and furnish the necessary data; if not, their value will still be perceived and felt in future military operations. A commanding general may carefully watch, and sedulously guard his army; yet, if he be a stranger to the country, and without information of its relative positions, and of the advantages to be derived from places to be occupied, he will but grope his way in darkness, and be vulnerable to an opposing officer who may have a better knowledge than himself of these facts. No general can operate successfully who is ignorant of the topography of the country, and of its assailable and defensible points, and of the various positions to be taken, which may benefit himself, or produce injury to an enemy.

In this country we have an extensive inland and maritime frontier, and for their security and protection much labor has yet to be performed. Our entire line of frontier, our bays, harbors, and inlets, should be carefully examined and surveyed. Points which are assailable, and the mode of defending these, with all necessary details, should be carefully looked into, and the information so obtained, treasured up with the archives of the country.

Under this aspect of the case, the classification of the duties to be performed by this corps, exclusively military, may be thus stated:

1st. Surveys of military positions for purposes of permanent fortifications.

2d. Surveys of our inland frontier, to ascertain the points best situated for defence, after what manner attacks may be made, and the best modes of opposing them.

3d. An examination of the seacoast generally, and particularly of all seaports, bays, and inlets, the avenues by which these may be approached, and the modes of protecting and defending them.

4th. The surveying of such military roads as may most advantageously connect the several military positions upon our inland frontier.

The foregoing remarks and statement of duties relate to the employment of the topographical engineers during a state of peace; but, in times of war, for which all its peace operations may be considered as preparatory, their labors become more exclusively military, and may be said to embrace the extensive range of duties of the field engineer, and for which their occupation in times of peace qualify them. They are a necessary appendage to every army, and, with propriety, may be called the eyes of the commanding general, and of the Government, as it is upon the results and labors of such a corps that all judicious plans of military operations must be based.

The addition to the present topographical engineers, and the organization required, and which is now recommended, are such as will form a corps, to consist of one colonel, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, ten captains, ten first lieutenants, and ten second lieutenants; which numbers and organization are considered as requisite to meet the present military wants of the country.

All which is respectfully submitted.

J. H. EATON.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

ACCOUNTS IN SUIT.

Report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, of the accounts in suit on 4th July, 1830.

OFFICE OF SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY, Jun. 6, 1831.

SIR: In obedience to the directions of the "Act to provide for the appointment of a Solicitor of the Treasury," I have the honor respectfully to submit, for the information of Congress, the following report:

In the performance of the duty imposed upon the Solicitor, "to obtain from the several District Attorneys of the United States full and accurate accounts of all the causes and actions pending in the Courts of the United States, in which the United States were plaintiffs, on the 4th day of July, and to cause an abstract thereof, showing the names of the parties in each suit, the cause of action, the time of its commencement, and such other matters as may be necessary to full information respecting the same, to be prepared and laid before Congress," soon after I assumed the duties of that office, the circular, a copy of which is herewith annexed, and marked A, containing regulations for the observance of District Attorneys, Marshals, Clerks, and Collectors, was issued, and the several District Attorneys required to report the information called for by Congress. From their returns I have prepared three statements, of which the one marked B exhibits a report of the suits brought on Treasury transcripts; the one marked C exhibits a report of suits brought on custom-house bonds; and the third, marked D, exhibits a report of suits for fines, penalties, and forfeitures; all which were pending on the 4th day of July last.

The returns of some of the Attorneys did not contain "full information" respecting the suits in their districts. Several were little more than copies of the docket entries from the records of the Courts. These defects have in part been supplied, as it respects suits on Treasury transcripts, from the register of such suits transferred to this office from that of the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury; but the suits on custom-house bonds, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, not being under his superintendence, no register of them was kept by him; and of course but little information of those which were instituted prior to the 1st day of June last, is in the possession of this office. Such information, however, as it has been practicable to collect in these several classes of suits, in the short period since this office was established, is contained in the three statements abovementioned.

From these, it appears that the amounts for which suits were pending on the 4th of July last, were as follows, viz:

On Treasury transcripts,	-	-	$1,833,190	57
On Custom-house bonds,	-	-	1,248,686	82
Making a total of	-	-	$3,131,877	39

The third class of suits, for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, being principally in rem, no accurate estimate can be made of their amount.

An amount more than three times as large as the above is probably due to the United States on judgments rendered previous to the 4th of July. With a view to collect information respecting the situation of debts of this description, a circular, a copy of which is herewith annexed, marked E, was directed to the several District Attorneys, requiring them to report what suits prosecuted to judgment remained unsatisfied, in which expectations were entertained of collecting a part of the whole amount of the debt; what process had been issued on such judgments, and what returns had been made; what property, personal or real, was bound by such judgment; where such property is situated; in whose possession it was, either as executors, administrators, assignees, trustees, or otherwise; what were the nature and amount of the liens on such property, if any there were, prior to that of the United States; what was the prospect of recovering the whole amount, or any part of such judgments; what was the amount expected to be realised; what were the obstacles which have heretofore interposed, and which yet prevail, and the prospect of their removal; with all other matters important to be known at this office.

The information called for by these several inquiries, is believed to be essential to the efficient discharge of the duties of this office, so far as they relate to the collection of the outstanding judgment debts. To enable the District Attorneys to furnish it, tedious examinations of records, and frequent resort to the assistance of the clerks of the courts, are necessary. A great proportion of these judgments having been recovered before the present District Attorneys came into office, the legal fees, which, under existing laws, constitute the principal compensation to attorneys, have already been paid to their predecessors. It is manifest, therefore, as no commission is allowed for the collection of money, that, for the services of the present Attorneys, either in procuring the information I have called for in the last mentioned circular, or for further attention in enforcing the judgments, no remuneration whatever is provided. Several Attorneys have asked for compensation, and some of the clerks have refused their aid without an assurance that it will be made.

Some estimate of the importance of the subject about which information is sought, may be formed from the return which was, about a year ago, made by the United States' Attorneys in the several districts, in pursuance of an order of the President, of all the suits on Treasury transcripts. This return comprehended all suits of this description, in which judgments had been recovered by the United States, and remained unsatisfied in part or the whole, together with all such as were still pending.

The aggregate sum due upon them, was $7,742,407 80
Suppose the amount of the suits pending at the period of that return, to be equal to that of the suits pending on the 4th day of July last, to wit: - - - 1,776,526 96

And deduct it from the abovementioned aggregate, and the balance on outstanding judgments on Treasury transcripts, will be - - - $5,645,880 84

The aggregate amount of suits on custom-house bonds, including those which are pending, as well as those which have been prosecuted to judgment, was, on the 30th September last, - - - $6,685,490 00
Suppose the amount due on suits on custom-house bonds pending on that day, to be equal to that of suits of the same sort pending on the 4th day of July last, to wit: - - - 1,241,686 82

And deduct it from the above aggregate, and the balance due on bonds prosecuted to judgment, and remaining unsatisfied, will be - - - $5,623,803 18

This last amount, added to that due on unsatisfied judgments on Treasury transcripts, to wit: - - - 5,645,880 84

Will show the total sum of principal due to the Government on outstanding judgments, to be - - - $11,269,694 02

To this sum may be added several millions for interest; but there ought also to be deducted from it a considerable amount, which consists of judgments against sureties on official and custom-house bonds. The foregoing view, however, though not exact, presents a sufficient approximation to the truth to demonstrate the importance of the subject it embraces.

No remuneration is provided by law to stimulate the zeal of the United States' Attorneys in the collection of this vast amount of debt. The legal fees in almost all the sums having already been paid to their predecessors in office, who instituted them, no inducement but a cold sense of unprofitable duty is left to excite them to exertion. A very great proportion of this mass of debt is due from persons and estates that are hopelessly insolvent. Still, however, it is believed that a large amount, which will otherwise be lost, might be gleaned, if an adequate inducement to encounter the labor of collecting the information called for, and to act vigorously and zealously after obtaining that information, were held out to District Attorneys, in the shape of a liberal commission on collections. It would seem peculiarly proper that the commissions now allowed to collectors of the customs for collections on bonds which are put in suit, should be transferred to the Attorneys, who have the labor and responsibility of making them. This arrangement, while it would create no additional expense to the public, would operate as a stimulus to vigilance and caution on the part of Collectors, in requiring such security as would prevent the necessity of resorting to litigation, and to a zealous discharge of duty by Attorneys, whenever litigation should become necessary. It is believed, also, that a true economy would dictate an allowance of commissions to Attorneys for collection in suits on Treasury transcripts, as well as on custom-house bonds; and that the increase of the sum, which would, in consequence of it, be brought into the Treasury, would be much greater than the amount of those commissions.

The foregoing remarks present an imperfect view of the prominent defects of the present system of collecting the public dues, when suit has become necessary; and the daily discharge of my official functions has so forcibly impressed them on my mind, that I have thought it my duty, in this report, respectfully to bring them to the notice of Congress, who alone have power to provide an adequate remedy.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most faithful and obedient servant,

V. MAXCY,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

To the Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

A.

Circular from the Solicitor of the Treasury, with regulations to be observed by District Attorneys, Clerks of the Circuit and District Courts, Marshals, and Collectors of the United States.

OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, July 27, 1830.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an act passed at the late session of Congress, to provide for the appointment of a Solicitor of the Treasury.

On entering into the relations which that act has established between the Solicitor and the law officers and Collectors of the United States, I cannot but feel a deep sense of the responsibility connected with the superintendence of the multifarious and important concerns committed to my charge. Diffused as these concerns are throughout this widely extended Union, they cannot be managed in a manner satisfactory to the officers or parties concerned, or with a due regard to the interest of the Government, without the establishment and a punctual and exact observance of regulations, which shall form a chain of responsibility, binding each officer to his duty, from the commencement of legal proceedings, throughout their various stages, till the execution of judgment shall place the public dues in the Treasury of the United States. In framing those which I now transmit, I have endeavored to consult the convenience of the several officers whom they affect, as far as is compatible with a just system of accountability.

It would be presumptuous in me to expect that, in the present organization of a new office, I have prepared a system without error, or that experience will not point out new checks or useful modifications and alterations. Such as your reflection and observation may suggest, if communicated, will be considered and examined with the utmost care and candor, with a view to the improvement and perfection of the system; but, until the regulations for the transaction of business now established shall be modified or rescinded, I cannot too strongly urge an exact observance of them. That the mutual dependence and propriety of the various parts of the system of checks now presented may be seen and understood, by being viewed together, I subjoin to this circular a copy of the regulations, established not only for your government, but for that of all the different officers, who must contribute their share of duty in accomplishing the object of the laws herewith transmitted.

I place much reliance for aid, in the discharge of my arduous duties, not only upon the talents and business habits of the law officers and collectors of the United States, but still more upon their cordial and hearty co-operation in devising the means of carrying into complete effect the great objects in view, the punctual payment of the public dues, and the prevention of frauds upon the Treasury; and I cannot doubt that a class of citizens so distinguished for high character, intelligence, and patriotism, will feel with me an ambition to demonstrate, by a faithful and efficient performance of our respective duties, the utility of our several offices, and their adaptation to promote the public weal. On my part it will be my first and strongest desire to reconcile a rigid and exact fulfilment of the laborious and responsible task prescribed to me by law, with such observance of comity and regard to the feelings of all with whom I am connected as shall ensure a continuance of the most cordial and respectful relations between us.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most faithful and obedient servant,

V. MAXCY,
Solicitor of the Treasury.

Regulations to be observed by the Collectors of the customs.

1. Whenever a revenue bond shall not have been paid when it becomes due, you will, to use the terms of the law prescribing your duty, deliver it for suit to the District Attorney "forthwith and without delay," and will take triplicate receipts of the Attorney; one of which is to be forwarded by the first mail to this office, together with a full and exact description of the date and amount of such bond, and of the time when it became payable, and the names of all the obligors thereto; one to be sent with your first quarterly returns thereafter, to the first Auditor of the Treasury, and the other to be retained by yourself. If any part of the bond have been paid, the amount of such payment, and the time when made, must be stated. That the reports of the several Collectors may be uniform, I have sent you a form for them.

2. Whenever any obligor of a bond put in suit shall, before execution is delivered to the marshal, pay the whole or any part of such bond to you, you will give him triplicate receipts, one of which is to be retained in his own hands, and the other two to be delivered to the District Attorney; one of them to be filed as his authority for giving the necessary credit on the bond, and for making the proper entry on the docket, and the other to be forwarded to this office, as the voucher upon which he is to be discharged from responsibility.

3. In like manner, you will give to the District Attorney triplicate receipts for money which he may pay you from the defendant, in discharge of bonds in suit, and specify therein particularly the object for which the money is paid.

4. Whenever, after execution is delivered to the Marshal, he shall pay you a part or the whole amount of the judgment, you will deliver to him triplicate receipts, that he may retain one himself, forward one as a voucher to me, and send the other with his regular return to the first Auditor of the Treasury, to be filed in his office.

5. In compliance with the duty prescribed in the fourth section of the above mentioned act, whenever you shall cause a seizure to be made for the purpose of enforcing any forfeiture, you will, by the first mail, give information thereof to the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Regulations to be observed by District Attorneys.

1. Whenever a bond shall be transmitted or delivered to you for suit by any Collector, you will give him triplicate receipts, and "forthwith and without delay" institute suits against all the parties thereto. By the first mail afterwards, you will transmit information thereof to the Solicitor of the Treasury, together with a full and exact description of the date of such bond, the amount due thereon, the time when it became payable, and the names of all the obligors. I send you herewith printed forms of these returns.

2. In like manner, whenever a transcript of the accounts of any delinquent public officer, certified by the First or Second Comptroller of the Treasury, shall be forwarded to you for suit from this office, you will immediately commence suit thereon, and by the first mail give information thereof to the Solicitor of the Treasury.

3. You will, also, when any suit or action for the recovery of a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, shall be instituted, immediately transmit to this office a statement of such suit or action, specifying the name of the defendant, the cause of the action, the time of its commencement, with such remarks as are necessary to the full understanding of the same.

4. Whenever any obligor of a custom-house bond shall desire to discharge part or the whole of his debt previous to judgment, you will request him to pay the money to the Collector who delivered the bond for suit, and to take triplicate receipts therefor. Two of these receipts you will require him to deliver to you; one to authorize you to give him credit for the amount thus paid on the bond, and to be retained by you; the other you will transmit to the office, to serve as my authority for giving you credit, and discharging you from responsibility. If, instead of paying the money to the Collector, as requested, he should make a tender of the whole amount due the Government to yourself, you will receive the same; forthwith deposit it, to the credit of the Collector who delivered you the bond for suit, in the Bank of the United States, or an office thereof, or some other bank authorized to receive Government deposits, and take triplicate certificates of such deposit from the cashier, designating the object for which the payment was made. One of these you will retain yourself; one you will transmit by the first mail to this office, as a voucher for your release from responsibility; and the third you will deliver or forward by the first mail to the Collector from whom the bond was received. If there be no bank near in which Government deposits are made, you may, if more convenient, pay the amount to the Collector who delivered the bond for suit, and take triplicate receipts from him, designating the object for which the payment was made. One of these receipts you will retain yourself; one you will transmit by the first mail to this office, as a voucher for your discharge from further responsibility; and the third you will forward by the first mail to the First Auditor of the Treasury, to be placed on file by him, and to be preserved as a check in the settlement of the Collector's accounts. You will direct him to pay the costs to the Marshal, and take duplicate receipts. On the defendant's delivering one of these receipts to you, in addition to the Collector's receipt for, or the payment to yourself of, the whole amount due to the United States, you will make such entry on the docket as shall be necessary for the discharge of the defendant.

5. Whenever any defendant to a suit, other than upon a custom-house bond, whether for debt or a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, is desirous of paying a part or the whole of the demand against him previous to the delivery of execution, you will request him to deposit the money, or such part thereof as belongs to the United States, in the Bank of the United States, or some office thereof, or some other bank authorized to receive deposits for the Government, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, take triplicate receipts or certificates of the cashier, designating the object on account of which the payment is made, and deliver two of them to you, upon which you will give them the necessary credit; and on his producing to you, in addition thereto, the receipt of the marshal for costs, you will make, according to the circumstances of the case, the entry on the docket necessary for the security or discharge of the defendant. You will retain one of the certificates of deposit to the credit of the treasurer, and the other transmit to me by the first mail. On the receipt of it, the necessary entry will be made upon the books of this office, to release you from responsibility.

If the defendant, instead of making deposit in bank, as above mentioned, should make a tender of the whole amount due to the United States to you, you will receive it; forthwith deposit it in the Bank of the United States, or an office thereof, or some other bank authorized to receive the deposits of the Government, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and take triplicate certificates of deposit of the cashier, designating the object for which the payment is made. One of these you will, by the first mail, transmit to this office, as a voucher for your release from responsibility; one you will send by the first mail to the Auditor in whose office the transcript on which suit was brought was prepared; and the third you will retain yourself.

6. Whenever a suit shall be prosecuted to judgment, you will deliver execution to the marshal, unless there be, in your judgment, good reasons for delay, such as the hopeless insolvency of the defendant. Whenever execution is thus postponed, you will report the case to this office for instruction. Whenever you deliver execution to the marshal, you will take duplicate receipts: one of them you will retain yourself, and the other you will send by the first mail to this office, as a voucher for your release from responsibility.

7. You will, immediately after the end of every term of the District and Circuit Courts, or of any State Courts in which any suit or suits may have been instituted on behalf of the United States, forward to this office a statement, (which the law requires to be certified by the clerk,) of such cases as have been decided during the term, and such as are pending, together with all the information which may be necessary for understanding the true situation of each case. Your statement will be sent in two different forms, one to contain the suits brought on treasury transcripts, and the other on custom-house bonds, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures. Printed forms for these returns are herewith sent.

8. In all cases in which an appeal is taken, or a writ of error is sued out, you will cause to be transmitted to this office, with as little delay as may be, a transcript of the record, which you will examine with a view to ascertain that it is a faithful copy, and will accompany the same with a report of the argument of the cause in the court below, noting the points made and authorities referred to by the respective counsel.

I take leave to call your particular attention to the eighth section of the act sent with the circular, by which, in addition to the return after each term, you are required to transmit to this office "full and accurate accounts of all causes and actions pending in the courts of the United States" in your district, "in which the United States are plaintiffs, on the fourth day of July" of the present year, in such a manner as shall enable me to prepare an intelligible abstract of all such causes, showing the names of the parties in each suit, the cause of action, the time it accrued, the time of the commencement of the suit, and such other matters as may be necessary to full information to Congress respecting the same. As this abstract must be laid before Congress at the commencement of the next session, it is necessary that your return should be made on or before the tenth day of October next. The forms sent for your statement at the end of each term of court will answer the purpose of this report. Be pleased to state, in a very distinct manner, the cause of action, and let your observations in the column of remarks be full, so that the object and situation of each suit may be clearly understood.

Regulations to be observed by Clerks of the Circuit and District Courts of the United States.

1. Hereafter, you will forward to this office, within thirty days after the adjournment of each successive term of the District and Circuit Courts, respectively, of which you are clerk, a list of all the judgments and decrees which have been entered in the said courts, respectively, during such term, to which the United States are parties, showing the amount which has been so adjudged or decreed, and the costs, and stating the term to which execution thereon has been made returnable. You will divide the list into two parts, to be sent in two separate forms, one to contain the judgments rendered in suits brought on Treasury transcripts, and the other on custom-house bonds, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures. I send you printed forms for these returns.

2. You will examine the statement required by the third section of said act to be made by the United States' Attorney for your district, and, comparing it with the records in your charge, and finding it correct, you will thereto subjoin your certificate.

Regulations to be observed by Marshals.

1. Whenever, before judgment, any defendant to a suit of the United States shall pay you the costs which have accrued, you will give him duplicate receipts, one to be kept by himself, and the other to be delivered to the District Attorney.

2. Whenever, in any suit in which the United States are plaintiffs, the District Attorney shall deliver a writ of execution to you, you will give him duplicate receipts, in which you will state the names of the parties, the amount of the judgment and costs, with the time from which interest accrues, one of which receipts is to be kept by him, and the other to be transmitted by him to this office as a voucher, upon which an entry is to be made to release him from further responsibility, and to charge you. You will, moreover, by the first mail, after execution in any case shall be delivered to you, transmit information thereto to this office.

3. Whenever the judgment has been rendered in favor of the United States on a custom-house bond, and the execution has been issued and satisfied by the defendant, you will give him a receipt therefor. You will immediately thereafter pay over the amount of the judgment to the Collector who delivered the bond for suit, and take triplicate receipts therefor, in which the parties are to be stated, and the amount of the judgment. One of these receipts you will keep for your own protection, one you will transmit to this office, as my authority for making such entry on its books as will discharge you from further responsibility, and the other you will transmit, with your regular accounts, to the First Auditor of the Treasury, to be filed as a check in the settlement of the Collector's accounts.

4. Whenever execution shall have been delivered to you upon a judgment for any other cause than a custom-house bond, and you shall have collected the money of the defendant, you will forthwith deposite the amount belonging to the United States in the Bank of the United States, or one of its offices, which may be nearest you, or any other bank, if nearer to you, which is authorized to receive Government deposits, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. You will take duplicate certificates of deposite from the cashier, designating the object for which the money is paid, one of which you will retain yourself, and transmit the other to this office, as the voucher upon which you will be discharged from further responsibility.

5. Hereafter you will make the returns required by the eighth section of the act of May 15, 1820, for the better organization of the Treasury Department, to this office, in which you will state the proceedings which have taken place upon all writs of execution or other process, which have been placed in your hands for the collection of the money which has been adjudged and decreed to the United States in said courts respectively. I send you printed forms for these returns. You will make these returns in two separate forms, one for executions issued on judgments in suits brought on treasury transcripts, and the other on custom-house bonds, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 13, 1831.

MR. MALLARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred so much of the President's message "as relates to the tariff of duties on imports, and so much thereof as respects manufactures," reported:

That they have taken this delicate subject into full consideration. This was due alike to the source from whence a review was recommended, and to the importance of the subject itself. They feel confident that they have done it without mingling with the operation of their reasoning powers, unreasonable "likes and dislikes," either to the system of protecting domestic industry, or to the views expressed by the Chief Magistrate.

It is not the intention of the committee to present to the House a mass of statistics or labored arguments, in favor of the protecting system. In the recent discussions of the tariff, all that could illustrate theory, or be proved by experience in our own and other countries, has been presented. Our Government has adopted and endeavored to sustain, by repeated legislative enactments, a policy which has had the sanction of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. It has been sanctioned by "the continued acquiescence of the States, and the general understanding of the people." Confidence in its permanent duration is warmly inspired. It is this alone which can give it vigorous and successful action. A system of protection may appear perfect in our statute books, and yet be useless to the country, if exposed to perpetual danger. Skill, already matured, will not venture upon uncertainty. The power of invention will never be exerted, if it has no confidence in the promise, and repeated promise, of support. Capital will never come to the aid of skill and enterprise, if it has no security for investment. It must have confidence, it must find solid honesty in individuals, as well as firmness in Government, or it will not be employed.

During the last session of Congress, the declaration was often repeated, that the system of protection should and would be maintained. It was presumed to have come from the people, and dictated by them to their representatives. This was expressed by the most decisive majorities in Congress, on repeated occasions.

Its effects, so far as they have been developed, have answered the hopes of its most ardent friends. Capital flows widely and freely through our extended country. The genius of our people has been stimulated to greater and more diversified exertion. The useful arts are improving in every form that stern necessity or elegant taste may desire. The committee most cheerfully concur with the President in the animated view which he has taken of the condition of our country. They adopt his language in describing that condition. "With a population unparalleled in its increase, and possessing a character which combines the hardihood of enterprise with the considerateness of wisdom, we see in every section of our happy country a steady improvement in the means of social intercourse and correspondent effects upon the genius and laws of our extended republic." This is the language of truth and justice. It forms a subject of high and deep congratulation to every patriot mind. While other nations are suffering under oppressive burthens, or convulsed with bloody revolutions, we witness among ourselves, in general, a calm and confident repose. We see over all portions of our broad country prosperity and happiness most equally and evenly diffused.

Such is the prospect before us. It is the offspring of our fortunate Government, and the wise policy which has been adopted of cultivating our own resources, by the skill, and industry, and enterprise of our own people. In considering that imperfection must be stamped on the highest and best of human institutions, it is matter of surprise, "that the apparent exceptions to the harmony of the prospect" are so few. They seem to arise rather from the exercise of fervid imagination, than from evils which really exist. It cannot, however, be expected that any code of laws, or any form of government, can dispense precisely the same benefits to every individual under their influence, wherever he may reside, or whatever may be his genius or pursuits. Nature herself has failed to do this. But, when we see a great nation moving on with stately steps, unimpeded, to the height of happiness, opulence, and grandeur; when every portion, however minute, partakes amply of general prosperity, it would seem that the "apparent exceptions to the harmony of the prospect" might be permitted to melt down in warm felicitations, that the "prospect" of our whole country is so nobly gratifying. It is to this wide and comprehensive prospect that we may safely look for substantial reasons to preserve that Union, which it is "most devoutly hoped may prove imperishable."

The committee are much gratified to have the opinion of the President, clearly and fully expressed, that the tariff for protecting domestic industry is constitutional. They think it proper to quote language so clear and unequivocal. He says, that "the power to impose duties on imports originally belonged to the several States. The right to adjust those duties with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry, is so completely incidental to that power that it is difficult to suppose the existence of one without the other. The States have delegated their whole authority over imports to the General Government, without limitation or restriction, saving the very inconsiderable reservation relating to their inspection laws. This authority having thus passed from the States, the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them; and, consequently, if it be not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct. Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people stripped of the right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations. This surely cannot be the case: this indispensable power, thus surrendered by the States, must be within the scope of the authority on the subject expressly delegated to Congress." The committee would recommend this argument to the candid consideration of the House. Most especially would they invite to its calm consideration those of our fellow-citizens who honestly believe that a protecting tariff violates the constitution. If there are any who have become regardless of the rights, interests, and welfare of the great majority of the nation; who are determined that all shall yield to their opinions; who insist that they are infallibly right, and every one else is absolutely wrong; on such, reason and argument can have no influence. Still, the cause which enables our Chief Magistrate to give us such a glowing view of the prosperity of our country as he has done, must and will continue. The States, in their sovereign capacity, as expressed in the message, and cannot be denied, had the original power of imposing duties on imports. It is now transferred to the Government of the Union, in the most ample manner. Had the States retained it, they must have exercised it as they pleased, to accomplish any object they deemed proper. It might have been for revenue alone. It might have been employed solely to counteract the selfish policy of other States or nations. It could have been exercised for any purpose which suited the pleasure of sovereign power. But the States have delegated their whole power over imports to the United States. It would indeed be a strange anomaly if it could not now be exercised by the Government to which it has been transferred, as fully as it could have been by the States from which it was derived.

The President has declared, that, "while the chief object of duties should be revenue, they may be so adjusted as to encourage manufactures." It seems to the committee that this remark is in plain collision with the sentiments which he has previously maintained. He has observed that the authority to impose duties on imports, having passed from the States, "the right to exercise it for the purpose of protection does not exist in them." If it is "not possessed by the General Government, it must be extinct." "Our political system would thus present the anomaly of a people, stripped of a right to foster their own industry, and to counteract the most selfish and destructive policy which could be adopted by foreign nations." If revenue alone is wanted, duties for that object should be imposed. If protection to domestic industry is required, let duties be imposed to "foster it." Why should the chief object be revenue—why protection secondary—when the Treasury may be full? Many now apprehend that our revenue is, and will be, too abundant. But protection "against the most selfish and destructive policy of foreign nations" can be secured by duties on imports. By them alone. Then they should be adjusted to secure protection. This should be the primary object. The protecting power having once belonged to the States, and now transferred to the General Government, it may be used, as the good of the nation demands, for a primary, not a secondary, object. It ought not to be loosely attached to the skirts of revenue. Domestic industry is a single, great, even pre-eminent, interest of the nation. It has been intrusted to the guardian care of the constitution. It now demands the exercise of that power, which the States have surrendered, for its promotion and preservation.

The President, in his message, further observes, that, in the adjustment of protecting duties, the Government should "be guided by the general good." As an abstract proposition this may be admitted. The general interest is the interest of each; and it is only necessary that that interest should be understood to ensure the cordial support of some who think "it encourages abuses which ought to be corrected, and promotes injustice which ought to be obviated." He also advises Congress that objects of national importance ought alone to be protected. Of these, the productions of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, "essential to national defence, occupy the first rank. Whatever other species of domestic industry, having the importance to which I have referred, may be expected, after temporary protection, to compete with foreign labor on equal terms, merit the same attention in a subordinate degree." Suppose the opinion to be correct, "that objects of national importance ought alone to be protected," what then? The President has not, by this general expression, afforded the least aid in adjusting the details of a protecting tariff. If the action of Government could be confined to abstract rules and principles, little difference of opinion would probably exist in the nation. The great embarrassment is found in making an application of excellent theory to practical and useful purpose. The protecting system, the tariff, is composed of humble items. These, united, make up the great mass of national industry. Had the President been pleased to designate a few items only, which he supposed to possess "national importance," or had he pointed out what "comforts of life are taxed unnecessarily high—what are the interests too local and minute to justify a general exaction, which it undertakes to protect, and what kinds of manufactures for which the country is not ripe, it attempts to force," we should then have the light and benefit of illustration.

General theory may be adopted with perfect unanimity. Its application to real use, its coming down to the every day exertion of our farmers and mechanics, is a different affair. Under general theory, any one can make a retreat and maintain that it has been done with consistency and honor. Theory is best explained by its application to the axe, the plough, the hammer, and the spindle. The Chief Magistrate presides over a people, who are engaged in unceasing and untiring industry. Congress has for years, and on repeated occasions, exercised its wisdom on the tariff. Its best efforts have been made. If errors exist, it would seem reasonable to expect, that the Chief Magistrate, looking abroad from his high station over all the interests of the country, and observing their mutual relations and dependencies, should intimate to the representatives of the people, what particular business of life has been too warmly cherished—what too coldly neglected. In adjusting the details of the tariff, Congress has done what it deemed best for the general good. To reach the employments of life, it must go down to particulars. If the President is still dissatisfied, it might have been hoped that he would have designated the precise error. It will always be borne in mind, by practical men, and they compose the mass of the nation, that abstract theory, however splendid, does but little good, unless it comes to the aid of every muscle of labor. In what consists the defect of the existing tariff? Individuals may discover imperfections, but the collected wisdom of the nation has repeatedly declared that material change is not demanded. Nothing better, under existing circumstances, can be done. Then let doubt and uncertainty be avoided. They are evils next to the surrender of the whole system.

The message advises Congress that "objects of national importance alone ought to be protected; of these, the productions of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, essential to national defence, occupy the first rank." It is to be presumed that Congress has not been unmindful of productions "essential to national defence." But the President says, "the present tariff taxes some of the comforts of life unnecessarily high." They are not defined. In the minds of many, what might be essential to national defence, might also promote the comforts of life. If the message meant only guns, powder, and bullets, difference of opinion, even then, might exist, as to the extent of protection which ought to be afforded to the various elements of which they are composed. Its practical meaning is, therefore, obscure. Iron, it is presumed, would be considered essential to "national defence," and, being the product of "our mines," should be protected. But that protection which would produce the material for a musket would also furnish it for axes and ploughs. A duty that would give us domestic bullets, is all that might be required to supply the country with domestic lead for every use. But are muskets, and powder, and bullets, all that may be essential to "national defence?" An army might be most abundantly provided with these, and yet be totally inefficient in the field, if it wanted hats, and coats, and shirts, and shoes, and blankets. The condition of our country, during the last war, furnished a well defined illustration of this sentiment. Various manufactures, then, were considered of national importance, which the doctrines of free trade now erase from the catalogue. But a duty imposed for promoting the domestic manufacture of these articles, for military purposes alone, would be an anomaly in the annals of any nation. That protecting policy which could supply the wants of an army in war must be allowed to operate in peace. Hence the difficulty of any classification of interests, while all are distinctly and equally governed by the same great constitutional power derived from the States. It is also to be remembered that peace with the world is the natural condition of this country. It is not the foreign bayonet that we have the most reason to apprehend: it is the "selfish and destructive policy which might be adopted by foreign nations." To guard against this is an object of "national importance." For peace or war the protecting policy is equally adapted, and it is believed by the committee that the best preparation for national defence may be found in the rigorous cultivation of the arts of peace. Our people ought not to be perpetually dependent on orders in council or decrees of emperors. Our country ought not to wait, until invasion surrounds it, and then beg blankets from invaders to warm a shivering army, engaged in "national defence."

The President alludes to another species of industry having the importance to which he before had referred, and which may be expected, after "temporary protection, to compete with foreign labor on equal terms." This species of industry, in his opinion, merits "the same attention, in a subordinate degree," while, in speaking of objects "essential to national defence," he prescribes no limitation, either as to the extent of protection or its duration. The other class he considers entitled to the "same attention," yet qualified by the expression, in "a subordinate degree." This qualification seems to render it difficult, if not impossible to ascertain the extent of the rule which he has adopted for his own action, and the guidance of Congress. Instead of opening a luminous pathway, in which all branches of the Government may move on in union and safety, new embarrassments appear to be added to those already encountered by Congress in adjusting the detailed provisions of the tariff. It would seem to be the meaning of the President, that, after a temporary protection has been extended to a manufacture for a reasonable period, if it "cannot then compete with foreign labor on equal terms," it does not merit protection. This doctrine has been repeatedly advanced in Congress, and the committee presume it to be the doctrine of the message. But it will not stand the test of experiment. Prior to the late war, the coarse muslins consumed in the United States were imported from India, and cost the consumer about twenty-five cents the yard. By the war the supply was cut off—our cotton mills began to move, and a partial supply was furnished. At its close, when the India cottons were again imported, most of these establishments were ruined. By the tariff of 1816, establishing what was called the minimum duty on coarse cottons, the home market was effectually secured to our home manufacturers. Under its fostering influence they have flourished and multiplied; and such have been our improvements in skill, and labor, and machinery, that the consumer, instead of paying twenty-five cents, now purchases at home a much better article for eight cents the yard. Large exportations of them are made to foreign countries. They are carried to India, China, and South America, where they are sold to advantage. But suppose the protecting duty withdrawn, and the American manufacturer left to "compete with foreign labor on equal terms." Admit the cottons of India, England, and Scotland, and what would be the effect? Within two years not a single cotton mill in the United States would be in motion. The immense capital invested in them, amounting to many millions, would be utterly sunk to the country, and their owners irretrievably ruined. And why? Not because we cannot make goods as cheap as in Manchester and Glasgow, but because a war would be waged by British capital against American capital—a war of extermination. Such a war has been waged upon every article of American industry, whenever the protecting duty has been inadequate, or the law extending the duty so framed, that mercantile cupidity and the cunning of foreign manufacturers could evade it.

There is another rule laid down by the President which the committee have thought proper to examine. It is contained in the expression that "objects of national importance alone ought to be protected." The committee will not here enter into a discussion of the question whether Congress may not protect objects local in character. The States, in their original independence before the adoption of the constitution, could have used the power of imposing duties on imports for the express purpose of protecting local objects, according to the doctrine entertained by the President, in which the committee fully concur. The several States no longer possess that power. Where is it? Where has it fled? On what shelf is it laid? The Government of the Union possesses it, or it has become "extinct." If an object did present itself, purely local in its character, and its protection was demanded by the prosperity and happiness of a single State, and this could be best done, or done only, by the delegated power from the States to impose duties on imports, it should be well considered, before Congress rejected a proposition for that purpose. The discussion of this subject, at this time, is not intended. It may, however, be intimated that it is the duty of the General Government to protect every State, county, and town, in the Union from invasion. The Government of the Union is bound to protect every inch of our soil from a hostile bayonet. It has equal power to protect every finger of domestic industry against foreign competition. Let it be firmly exercised. It matters but little to real national independence, whether foreign guns or foreign labor conquer us. However this may be considered, it is fully believed by the committee, that the present tariff, taken together, or in the minutest detail, is national in its character, although the language of the President may seem to imply, that, in this respect, it is defective. He has also told us in his message, that, "it is an infirmity of our nature, to mingle our interests and prejudices, with the operation of our reasoning powers, and attribute to the objects of our likes and dislikes, qualities they do not possess, and effects they cannot produce," that our deliberations on this interesting subject should be uninfluenced "by partisan conflicts," and should not be made subservient "to the short-sighted views of faction." The committee have a due regard both to the admonition and the sentiments expressed by the President; and they also entertain a most ardent hope, that our fellow-citizens will keep a steady, searching eye on every movement of political ambition, in whatever quarter of our country it may appear. It may speak well and pleasantly to the public ear, in favor of a national protecting system, and yet, with a calm, fair, honest-looking countenance, scatter such mysterious, yet captivating doubts, as to the value of its different provisions, that "small minorities" may be taught how to form a "combination" to overthrow it.

What gives national importance to an object, or production of domestic industry? How is its national importance discovered? Whence derived—by what principle decided? Is it the place of production in the United States; that imparts to it the character of "national importance?" Must production be found in every narrow subdivision of the country? Must it, of necessity, be "general, not local?" Should the answer be in the affirmative, the concentrated wisdom of the nation would never provide a protecting tariff. Our various soils, our different climates, our diversified objects of industry, would present an impassable barrier against the adoption of any system of protection. The farmer who grows wheat, asks the aid of Government to protect that article. He knows that Poland, Russia, the Barbary States and France, may furnish, at times, wheat cheaper on the seaboard, than he can afford it. When he asks protection, an objection is made. Some portions of the Union do not produce wheat. Its production is not general. It must be rejected. Butter and cheese are presented for protection. Our farmers can produce them in abundance. The Irish tenant, who subsists on the humblest fare that unfeeling oppression deals out, may furnish them cheaper than the cultivators of our soil. Yet it is discovered, that portions of our extended country are unable to produce butter and cheese. They cannot be protected. They are "local" and not general.

Iron is named. This is indispensable in peace and war. It may, perhaps, be for a time, furnished by boors and serfs, laboring under the command of Russian and Swedish nobility, a little cheaper than the Pennsylvania and New Jersey forgers can produce it, and live as independent citizens ought to live in a free country. But iron is a "local object, not general." It must be rejected.

Hemp is named, an article so valuable to the independence of all branches of the navigation of our country. The strong arm of protection holds foreign navigation away from our domestic trade. It should unfurl American canvass with delight. It should also be well kept in mind, that the great body of American consumers of foreign productions sustain navigation engaged in foreign commerce. The splendid ship that carries and brings is still subordinate to the interests of those who buy and use, and pay for the cargo. The merchants on our seaboard may heap up wealth, build palaces, command the luxuries of life, but they must well keep in mind, that they all owe their prosperity to the strong arm of labor; they owe to the daily toil of our yeomanry, whether engaged in subduing the summits of the Green mountains, or cultivating the glens of the Allegany. Let, then, the hemp of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, be protected. Let the people of those States have a share in the advantages of that policy, which they are willing to defend. If it has so happened, that navigation engaged in our foreign trade, is suffering from foreign competition, it is owing to itself. All which it asked for protection was freely granted. When it had gained such an ascendancy, as it supposed would enable it to challenge foreign competition, it triumphantly told the Government that protection was no longer wanted. Hence treaty after treaty has been concluded for reciprocal navigation. This was urged by the advocates of free trade. If now it is a little crippled, if other nations supply us with a little more navigation, is it a greater evil than if foreigners supplied us with a little more iron, or hemp, or sugar, or cotton, or woollens? Must the great system of protection be abandoned, because navigation has been indulged in its wish and has been somewhat disappointed? The advocates of free trade ought rather to rejoice that our interest is free from the fetters of protection.

If foreign nations can build ships cheaper than the people of the United States, why not cheerfully employ them? According to the doctrines of free trade, so much would be gained. But yet if navigation wants assistance, there is every reason to believe that the power which protected its infancy, if desired, will come cheerfully again to its support, in every way and by all means consistent with the great interests of the country. But hemp is a "local not a general" production, and must, therefore, be rejected.

Sugar is proposed. It is an article of necessity, comfort, and luxury. It cannot be produced in Maine or Pennsylvania. Its production must be confined to the warm region of our country, where the great staples of other ports are uncongenial. But it must be rejected according to the rule. Its production is local—not general. The same may be said of cotton and wool, of every article named in the tariff. The greatest and most valuable productions of domestic industry are more or less local in their origin—not general. Hence, if the rule is, that every portion of the country must alike contribute to the production of an article, which the constitution will allow to be protected, there never can be a protecting tariff at all; human wisdom could not devise one which would confer the least benefit on the country.

The rule that any particular object of domestic industry must possess "national importance," to entitle it to protection, may be safely adopted, if properly understood and applied. A broad view might be taken of the condition of the country, of its productions, of its various business, of its perpetually blending and mingling interests. We must see the mutual relations which exist between the narrowest sections of our country, and ascertain how widely and generally the various productions of domestic industry are distributed amongst the people. We should ascertain, for the practical purpose of legislation, what articles of domestic production, great or small, may be required for general use; what articles the people want; what their comfort and convenience demand; what articles are gathered up and distributed by the trade, business, and commerce of the country. The names of the articles may be humble—it may be broadcloths, wood-screws, thimbles, bar iron, steam-engines, or the fabrics of cotton. But, whatever its name, the right of protection must be considered with reference to the great principles before mentioned.

By these principles, it is believed, the present tariff can be fully sustained.

The President has advised Congress, that the tariff is considered, by almost all, as defective in many of its parts. Suppose this correct, it is proposed to inquire whether greater perfection can be attained. If so, how? The President has left Congress unadvised. The Representatives of the people have recently, after their maturest deliberation, come to their best result. The details may be imperfect. As a system, it "works well." Those whose interests are involved are generally satisfied. It is a subject of so much delicacy, that "it should be touched with the utmost caution."

The committee must be fully convinced that improvements can be made, or they cannot, with a proper respect to the "extended interests it involves," hazard an effort. Such is the "infirmity of our natures," that the enemies of the protecting system would rejoice to have the benefit of little "likes and dislikes," to aid them in their attacks. The President also expresses his opinion, that "the effects of the present tariff are doubtless overrated, both in its evils and advantages." The committee are confident that its evils are most unreasonably "overrated." Its advantages are so manifest, that they have been, in the estimation of many, too greatly undervalued. The President advises us, that the decreased price of raw materials, manufactured articles, provisions, and lands, arises from a cause "deeper and more pervading than the tariff of the United States." He supposes "it may, in a measure, be attributable to the increased value of the precious metals."

The committee are unable to say how far this remark may apply to other countries. As applied to this country, it is clearly erroneous. Appreciation in any commodity, gold, silver, corn, or lumber, depends, in a great degree, on abundance or scarcity. If currency, whether composed of silver, gold, or bank notes, is plenty, the nominal price of all articles required for general consumption will rise, because the owners of currency must use it for profit. The greater the plenty, the more it will be used. In such case, less profit will satisfy. This cause enhances the price of every thing that currency purchases: for it must and will be employed. The precious metals are the base of our national currency. Our commercial operations are filled with them. Exchange on foreign nations was never lower; and if it seems to be against us, it is only because we have, by law, established a relative value between silver and gold, which the rest of the world will not adopt.

It cannot, therefore, be supposed, that the "reduced price" of domestic productions is caused by "the increased value" of the precious metals. It is to be attributed to domestic competition, and to an addition to the great supply of the world; and that the advance of the price of cotton, and the steady support of "other agricultural products," is owing to the diversified employments encouraged by the protecting system. Had the precious metals "increased in value," the benefits of the tariff would have been far more conspicuous. Prices would have been lower still. The tendency of such opinions of the President, as to the cause of the low prices of domestic manufactures, is to excite prejudice against the protecting system; to render it, in the estimation of our fellow-citizens, an object of little importance. The error of such opinions the committee consider it their duty to expose.

The President has informed us, that "the best, as well as the fairest mode of determining, whether, from any just considerations, a particular interest ought to receive protection, would be to submit the question singly for consideration. If, after due examination of its merits, unconnected with extraneous considerations—such as a desire to sustain a general system, or to purchase support for a different interest—it should enlist in its favor a majority of the Representatives of the people, there can be but little danger of wrong or injury in adjusting the tariff, with reference to its protective effect." The committee pass over the caution against "extraneous considerations;" that will be duly appreciated by the Representatives of the people. The suggestions of the President, which relate to the manner in which a protecting tariff should be formed, the committee believe cannot be adopted. If such views had prevailed since the adoption of the constitution, no tariff for the protection of domestic industry would have existed. If they now prevail, in all the branches of the Government, the tariff has no escape from total destruction.

The framers of our constitution were equally distinguished for profound intelligence and the purest patriotism. In their great design to provide a government for this republic, which should promote and secure the various interests of every portion, did they adopt a single provision, but with open and avowed desire to make a general system? Did not every State present, in bold relief, its separate claims and interests? Was not each separate and distinct claim and interest presented by the different members of the Convention, and well considered by the whole? It was by uniting interests, great and small, scattered far and wide, that our system of Government was adopted. Had "a particular interest" been submitted "singly," from some portion of the country, and that, alone, must have been regarded, the Convention must have dissolved without giving it a glance of notice. But the members of that august assembly did make mutual concessions and compromises, in order to establish a general system.

The President has advised Congress, that the power of protecting domestic industry, by the aid of duties on imports, belongs to the General Government. This, all know, is secured by a constitution, founded on liberal concession and compromise. The committee believe that the protecting power may be exercised, without exposure to impeachment for motives, on the same principles as governed the Convention which framed and recommended our constitution, and the people who ratified it. The application of this protecting power must be made by the Representatives of the people. There is no other way by which it can be exercised. Then, how can this be done? How can it be brought down, home, to business and bosom? If a blacksmith asks the Government of the Union to protect the manufacture of an axe, must this question be submitted "singly" for deliberation? Must a separate bill be introduced, and a vote of Congress taken? Shall abstract theory place the seal of silence on the lips of the blacksmith, and forbid him to say that he wishes the forge, the loom, the sugar plantation, also, to be protected? The consequences are too plain for extensive commentary. The great interests of the nation will hold generous communion among themselves. They will make common cause; they will make mutual concessions, compromises, and even sacrifices, to promote the general welfare, in imitation of the example set by the great founders of our Government. Different interests have a right to consult each other. They will do so. They have always done so. They must and will act in concert if they expect to exist. Mutual aid may be required by the civil interests of the country, as much as mutual assistance was once required from the different States at New Orleans, or Plattsburgh. Statesmen who understand human nature must admit it. It is sanctioned by the purest examples of our country—of all countries. In the adjustment of the existing tariff, it might be presumed by another branch of the Government that Congress did its duty; that it did not improperly obtain support for different interests. It must still be kept in mind, that if the infirmity of our nature rendered it defective in its origin, an attempt at revision might add to its imperfection.

American manufactures have had a long and arduous conflict with the popular, yet delusive doctrine, that additional duties for their protection are taxes on the consumer; and that every man who wears a coat pays the duty imposed into the pockets of the manufacturer. The committee will not go into any train of reasoning to show its fallacy. They will merely advert to a few facts; and they congratulate the friends of the American system, that the memory of every man in the nation can furnish abundant evidence that in all cases where the material is found at home, and the protecting duty has been adequate, the domestic article becomes cheaper in price, and improved in quality. Cotton goods furnish a striking example of this truth, and every man who wears a cotton shirt knows it. The article of nails furnishes another proof, as is well known to every man who builds a house. The committee might enumerate hundreds of articles, such as hats, caps, shoes, boots, and cheese, to sustain them—but they know it would be superfluous. The tax is not paid, because the articles are not imported. The duty secures the market to the home manufacturer; and domestic competition among the manufacturers reduces the cost to the lowest possible price, while, at the same time, it improves the quality. This is the plain truth of the matter; and it is now so well understood by the great mass of the nation, that the American system will not be surrendered nor abandoned so long as the people elect their own rulers. It has taken deep root in our soil—the tree is flourishing, its branches have extended far and wide, and the people will frown indignantly upon every effort to wither its leaf, or to blast its fruit.

The President having, in the proper exercise of his duty, submitted to Congress his views of the tariff, and these having been referred to the Committee on Manufactures, it became the committee to give them a candid and respectful consideration. This they have endeavored to do. Being representatives of the people, they have no apology to make for the freedom with which the opinions of the Chief Magistrate, on this interesting and delicate subject, have been examined.

In framing the tariff, they believe that the acknowledged principles of the constitution have been applied, as faithfully as "Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe," could have desired: that the present tariff, although it may be defective in parts, is adjusted on principles which those great statesmen approved. Had they been employed to consider its details, and adapt them to the present condition of our country, and the world, and their united wisdom had been exerted, every one might have discovered "imperfection in many of its parts;" yet, as a system, all of them would, most cheerfully, have given it their powerful and hearty support. They understood the "infirmity of our nature" too well, to designate a single interest, and trust it to single consideration. They would have made all interests that required protection come forth together, stand side by side, and then provide a system by which all could be mutually sustained.

The committee are satisfied that the provisions of the existing tariff are national in their character; that no interest, which it has undertaken to protect, is "too minute;" that it contains no evidence of attempts "to force manufactures for which the country is not ripe," of sufficient importance to require revision; that "no comforts of life are taxed unnecessarily high," with a proper regard to revenue and protection; that the "low prices of manufactured articles" have not been caused by the "increased value of the precious metals;" for the precious metals were never before so abundant and cheap in the United States; but, that the low prices of manufactured articles are caused, in a great degree, by the existing tariff, which has made the labor, skill, and enterprise of our people add a vast supply for consumption to the stores of the world.

The committee fully believe that the present general prosperity of the country is mainly to be attributed to the protecting system, and if our fellow-citizens can retain full faith and confidence, that our Government will firmly execute its repeated and solemn promises; that it will maintain the high assurance of support which our people have a right to demand from its dignity and honor, their prosperity will be daily and more rapidly promoted, and the resources of our country more and more amply developed.

The committee repeat that they cannot concur in the opinion of the President, that in framing a protecting tariff, each interest should be presented "singly for deliberation," without any reference to a general system. By such a rule, it is believed, that no protecting system could ever have been adopted, and by its influence, it is strongly apprehended, none can stand. The fears of the committee are the more explicitly declared, because enemies of the system have, in a manner that cannot be misunderstood, exposed their plan of operations. It is to present each object "singly" for deliberation, and conquer the whole system in detail.

The committee have thus presented to the House their undisguised and undissembled opinions on the subject referred, "with the freedom and candor which they considered the occasion for their expression" required. They believe that the tariff, having been so recently revised, any attempt to change its provisions, at this time, would spread alarm among the great interests of our country, shake confidence in the plighted faith of Government, destroy the supposed well-founded hopes of millions of our fellow-citizens, reduce them to penury, and expose the whole country to the dangers of a "most selfish policy which might be adopted by foreign nations."

COUNTER REPORT UPON MANUFACTURES.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN. 13.

MR. MONELL submitted the following report:

A minority of the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the tariff of duties on imports, and so much thereof as respects manufactures, not concurring in the whole matter or manner of the report preferred by the majority, beg leave to submit their views in a separate report.

With the President, we fully concur in the opinion that there is great cause for congratulation in the practical operation of the tariff, proving, as it conclusively does, that the injuries to our commercial interests, so confidently predicted by its opponents, have not been realized.

With the President, we also concur in the constitutionality of an adjustment of impost duties, with a view to the protection of our own agriculture and manufactures. It would be difficult to frame a more direct, convincing, and conclusive argument on that point than is presented in the message.

That the present tariff is defective in some of its details, we have the concurrent testimony of almost all who have written or spoken upon the subject during its discussion, and since its last modification. In his message to Congress, at the opening of December session, in 1828, President Adams remarked:

"The tariff of the last session was, in its details, not acceptable to the great interests of the Union; not even to the interest which it was specially intended to subserve. Its object was to balance the burthens on native industry, imposed by the operation of foreign laws, but not to aggravate the burthens of one section of the Union by the relief afforded to another. To the great principle sanctioned in that act, one of those upon which the constitution itself was framed, I hope and trust the authorities of the Union will adhere. But if any of the duties imposed by the act only relieve the manufacturer by aggravating the burthens of the planter, let a careful revisal of its provisions, enlightened by the practical experience of its effects, be directed to retain those which impart protection to native industry, and remove or supply the place of those which only alleviate one national interest by the depression of another."

During the progress of the bill in Congress, a distinguished friend of domestic industry from Vermont vainly attempted to amend it, and declared that "the manufacture of the coarse fabric (woollens) is ruined at a blow. Just as we are about to realize what the friends of the American policy have foretold that American skill, industry, and enterprise could accomplish, to make them subservient to some fancied benefit, we offer them up as a sacrifice to our enemies."

A friend of the protecting system from Massachusetts observed, "He was himself a wool grower, and was firmly of the belief that the bill was utterly destructive to that class of men; that it put the knife to the jugular vein of every sheep in the country; and that its effects would be equally destructive to the interests of the manufacturers."

A friend to the protecting policy from Maine, speaking the language of many others, said, "This explains to us why it is that those very manufacturers and their agents, who poured into the House petitions, beseeching that we would sustain their sinking establishments, now come here with remonstrances, conjuring us to save them from the tender mercies of this measure. It shows us, too, why the bill is condemned by the fast friends of domestic manufactures, and, among many others, by those champions of the American system, the veterans Niles and Carey."

"It is said that the proposed duty on coarse wool, which we now import from the Mediterranean and South America, is to benefit the agriculturist. It is certainly a great injury to the manufacturers and the consumers."

"While this stinted measure of protection is thus dealt out to the woollens, unexampled duties are proposed on other articles."

"This bill tends to oppress our navigation, and to destroy the markets for some of our productions."

"This bill greatly increases the expenses of ship building."

"This bill must powerfully aid and advance the colonial policy of Great Britain."

"Every manufacture in Maine, which this measure reaches, it injures and destroys."

"This bill, in its effects, co-operates with British policy. That favors the introduction of iron and hemp for their vessels; this taxes them for ours."

"If the question could be proposed to the British Parliament, they would pass this bill for us by acclamation; and should we of this committee adopt it in its present form, a British statesman might well say that we deserved a pension from his royal master."

To the authority of Mr. Adams and his cabinet, anticipated by the discussion of the present tariff before Congress, might be added that of almost every friend of the protecting policy in the United States.

On this point, therefore, the President concurs with President Adams and his cabinet, with the manufacturers themselves, and with all intelligent men.

We concur with the President in the opinion that those who dare not attempt to improve the tariff, and correct its imperfections, do injustice to the American people and to their Representatives. The people wish their Representatives to do right; nor will they consider it a sufficient excuse that they feared to do good lest evil might come. Such a plea will not be deemed very consistent with any valuable creed of political faith or code of good morals. Evil will never come out of good. The Representative who does right need not fear to meet his constituents. He only need fear and tremble, who, thinking right, seeing the evils of an existing system, and knowing it to be injurious and unjust in some of its details, shall, when called to account before his constituents, say, in his defence, I feared to trust myself and my colleagues in an attempt to do right, lest we should do wrong.

We felicitate the country that such is not the character of the President or his message. He advances boldly to his point. He does not fear to do right, lest he may do wrong. Fortified by honesty of purpose and patriotic devotion, he has full confidence that the people will sustain him in all his efforts to reform abuses and correct errors in our various systems of law and administration. He does but justice to the American people when he says, "My confidence is entire, that, to secure such modification of the tariff as the general interest requires, it is only necessary that that interest should be understood."

With the President, we think it probable that the reduced price of produce, raw materials, manufactured articles, and lands, is attributable, in some degree, to a reduction in the supply of the precious metals. That the products of the mines in Spanish America have been less within the last twenty years than they were in the twenty preceding, will not, we presume, be doubted. So far from diminishing, the demand for the precious metals has increased with the increase of civilized population and the extension of commerce. It was, therefore, natural that their value should increase. Undoubtedly, the establishment of extensive manufactories in America, and the improvements in machinery, have tended to reduce the general price of manufactured articles; but the same cause, had it operated separately, would, in this country, have increased the price of lands and agricultural products. Has such been the result? No; lands and agricultural products have declined in price almost as much as manufactured articles. The cause of this decline is not our tariff; it is something "deeper and more pervading." It is difficult to account for it in any other way than as the effect of an appreciation of gold and silver.

We are aware that money seems to be abundant in our commercial cities, and that it can be borrowed at a low rate of interest. This is not the effect of an increased supply of the precious metals, but of a stagnation of trade and business. So low are the products of commerce, of manufactures, and of agriculture, that rich men find no inducements to invest their capital in those pursuits. Money, therefore, accumulates upon their hands, and they are willing to lend it out, well secured, upon a moderate interest. But were a general war in Europe, or any change in the affairs of nations, to furnish a market for our agricultural productions, and revive our trade, the lending of money at a low interest would instantly cease, and, with the increased demand, apparent scarcity would succeed to apparent abundance.

Having asserted the constitutionality of the tariff, adjusted with a view to protection, the President gives, with characteristic point and clearness, his views of its policy. We quote his language:

"While the chief object of duties should be revenue, they may be so adjusted as to encourage manufactures. In this adjustment, however, it is the duty of the Government to be guided by the general good. Objects of national importance alone ought to be protected; of these, the products of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, essential to national defence, occupy the first rank. Whatever other species of domestic industry, having the importance to which I have referred, may be expected, after temporary protection, to compete with foreign labor on equal terms, merit the same attention in a subordinate degree."

A tariff adjusted on these principles, we are sure, would meet the wishes of all real friends of domestic industry and the interests of the country.

"Objects of national importance alone ought to be protected." It would be absurd to say that the "national importance" of an article depended on the generality of its protection. Lead is found in but two or three States in the Union, yet who will deny its national importance? Perhaps powder is not made in half a dozen States: yet who will deny its national importance? There are not, probably, a dozen cannon foundries in the Union; yet who will deny their "national importance"? If iron were made in only one State, would any man think of denying its "national importance"? To say that the President recommends the protection of only such articles as are produced or manufactured in all or most of the States, is to do violence to his language and evident meaning. Every thing of general necessity or general use, whether it be of general production or not, is an object of "national importance," and evidently embraced in the views of the President.

"Of these," he says, "the productions of our soil, our mines, our workshops, essential to national defence, occupy the first rank." We presume all the friends of domestic industry, and of our country's safety, will concur with the President in this sentiment. He speaks from the admonitions of experience. He has seen our brave militia called into the service of their country, and exposed to a ruthless invader, without arms, without ammunition, and almost without clothing. From want of means of defence he has seen our cities exposed to plunder, and sections of our country to conquest. It would be unwise in our Government not to provide against like dangers in future. "In peace prepare for war," is a maxim as true as it is trite. In the opinion of the President, it should be the first object of a protecting tariff.

But, it may be asked, what productions of our soil, our mines, and our workshops, are essential to our national defence? The President has not thought it necessary or proper to enter into a minute detail in his communication to Congress. Doubtless he did not think it respectful to inform Congress, that iron, lead, cannon, muskets, bullets, powder, soldiers' and sailors' clothing, ships, with their canvass and tackle, are articles essential to national defence. It was fair to presume that the experience, knowledge, and sagacity of Congress, were competent to fill up the list of these articles, without encumbering his message with details. We know that, with their accompaniments and component parts, embracing coarse woollens, blankets, hats, and shoes, they constitute that class of articles which he says are entitled to the first rank in a tariff of protection.

"Other species of industry," of a national importance, which, "after temporary protection," can compete with foreign labor on equal terms, merit the same attention in a subordinate degree.

We are at no loss to understand the President, nor do we hesitate to concur with him in the sentiment expressed. To produce the manufacture in our own country of all articles of general use among our citizens, and enable us to purchase them as cheap or cheaper than we can obtain them from abroad, is one of the chief objects of the tariff, and its most deservedly boasted effect. To attain an object so desirable, the President thinks a temporary tax on the imported article not unjust or improper. That a temporary protection will, in some branches of manufacture, produce this result, we have the evidence of facts. India cottons, it is stated, were formerly sold in the United States at twenty-five cents per yard. A better fabric is now made in the United States and sold at eight cents. Although the price of such cottons has much declined in India, yet the decline has fallen so far short of that in the United States, that our cottons now enter into successful competition with them in the markets of the very countries where they are manufactured. Our cottons successfully compete with the British cottons, also, in all countries where they are permitted to enter on equal terms; and, it is affirmed, might be sold in England itself at a profit, if they could be admitted free of duty. By a temporary protection, therefore, our cotton manufactories have been established, and brought to such perfection, that they successfully compete with foreign establishments, wherever they can meet them on equal terms.

If they can compete with foreign manufactures in the markets of other countries, loaded with freights and commissions, could they not maintain themselves without protection in our own markets? How does our tariff enable our manufacturers to undersell the India fabric in the India market? How does it enable them to undersell the British in the Levant and South America? It is obvious that the tariff can affect present prices only in our own market. It does not affect the price of coarse cottons, even at home: for competition has so reduced it that they can be bought at a less price in the United States than India cottons can in India. If the tariff were now abolished, these goods would continue to monopolise our own market, and compete with foreign fabrics in the markets of the world.

That India cottons would not again be seen in our markets is proved by the fact that our cottons are sold at a profit in the markets of that country. India cottons formerly sold at twenty-five cents. If the duty were taken off, they might probably be afforded in our market at twelve cents. Our own cottons, of a better quality, sell for eight. Who would buy the India cottons at twelve, when he could get our own and better at eight?

Nails are another article which domestic competition has reduced in price, so that, in some cases, we believe the whole cost does not now equal the duty.

The manufactures of hats, shoes, and cabinet ware, have, from the protection they have received, and the skill and industry of our manufacturers, attained such a force as to defy foreign competition. Those branches of our agriculture which produce cotton, wheat, beef, pork, and butter, though they may have required protection in their infancy, have outstripped all protection, furnish the cheapest and most abundant supply, and have acquired a vigor which defies foreign competition, and "counteracts the most selfish and destructive policy of foreign nations."

Many other articles might be enumerated, but these are sufficient to illustrate the views of the President. Temporary encouragement has been afforded. These "species of domestic industry" have been enabled "to compete with foreign labor on equal terms." The tariff upon these articles has ceased to be a tax: for they can be purchased lower in our own than in foreign markets, and their importation has either ceased or is fast diminishing.

In whatever cases the same effect can be produced, the President thinks, and we think, that the same means of protection should be employed. But if there be no hope of so establishing in this country a species of culture or manufacture that it will eventually be able "to compete with foreign labor on equal terms," to that a tariff of protection ought not to be applied. He would be esteemed a madman who should, by a tariff, endeavor to establish in this country the culture of tea, pepper, pimento, cinnamon, Peruvian bark, and many other products not adapted to our soil or climate, or to the habits of our people. There are species of manufactures which partake of the same character. A heavy duty upon them is an useless tax upon the consumer. It produces no present, and promises no prospective, good. Unless the proceeds be required for revenue, it ought not to be imposed.

As specimens of interest embraced in the present tariff, too minute and local to merit protection, we may name marble, capers, olives, figs, &c.; and as specimens of manufactures it attempts to force, for which the country is not ripe, we mention silks, worsted stuff goods, merino shawls, &c.

We fully concur with the President in the opinion that "the best as well as the fairest mode of determining whether, from any just considerations, a particular interest ought to receive protection, would be to submit the question singly for deliberation." We have not so little confidence in the people, or their representatives, as to believe that an appeal to local or individual interests is necessary to induce them to do what the general interest requires. If a single interest were presented, they would weigh the benefits and injuries which its protection might produce to the general interests of the country, and decide without the bias of local or selfish considerations. If, in their opinion, the general good required its protection, they would grant it. If, on the contrary, the injury would counterbalance the benefits, they would refuse it.

It is inconceivable to us how it can be made a general benefit to protect a combination of interests, each of which, taken separately, it would be injurious to protect. If it be injurious to protect each singly, the mass of injury is increased more readily than the benefits by their combination.

Suppose that Massachusetts has an interest which she wishes protected, but, after due consideration, it is the opinion of Congress that it will produce twice the harm that it would good. It is evident that her wishes ought not to be gratified.

New York has an interest which she presents for protection; but it is decided that the general injury of such a measure will be three times as great as the general good. Of course she ought not to be gratified.

Virginia presents an interest for protection; but it is the opinion of Congress that, in the general scale, such a measure will do five times as much harm as good. It is evident that the measure proposed by her ought not to be adopted.

Now, can these three measures become useful and proper by combining them together? Will not that of Massachusetts still be twice as injurious as it is beneficial; that of New York three times; and that of Virginia five times? Will not the injury of the combination be to the benefit as ten to three? Extend the same principle to ten States—twenty States—all the States. It is impossible that the combination of twenty-four bad measures can produce a good measure. As soon should we look to the concentration of all the vices to make a good man.

We, therefore, concede the justice of the rule laid down by the President. It is worthy of the mind whence it comes—a mind which marches straight to its object, and seeks no subterfuge to deceive the people, or evade responsibility. Its observance would promote purity of motive and justice of action in all our legislative acts.

We concur with the President in the opinion that the chief object of impost duties is revenue, and that their adjustment so as to protect manufactures is an incidental or secondary power. To lay duties for the sole purpose of protecting domestic industry, would be an anomaly in Government. What would be done with the money collected? If our national debt were paid, and we had no use for money in the concerns of Government, there would now be an accumulation in the treasury to the amount of twenty-four millions annually. If the sole object of the duty be to protect domestic industry, that object is accomplished when the money is paid into the treasury. Shall it be hid in the earth, sunk in the ocean, given to Government favorites, or distributed among the manufacturers?

We do not believe the people of the United States will consent to pay twenty-four millions, nor ten millions, nor five millions, for the sole purpose of protecting manufactures. If they perceive that the money raised by protecting duties is not devoted to useful and honest purposes, they will demand their reduction or repeal.

We therefore concur with the President in the opinion that the duties on articles constituting a portion of the necessities and comforts of life should be reduced or entirely repealed. A more certain means of preserving the protecting duties could not be recommended. What interest has any portion of our manufacturers, or agriculturists in preserving the duties on tea, coffee, cocoa, pepper, cinnamon, or any other foreign products or manufactures which do not come into competition with the fruits of their own labor? The duties on those articles yield no protection, but they produce a considerable amount of revenue. They will continue to do so after the national debt shall be extinguished. Is it not better for the labor of the country that the amount of these duties should be levied upon other articles, that come into competition with domestic products? If they continue to be levied upon these articles, they will diminish, as they do now, the amount collected from articles the manufacture or growth of which in our own country needs the encouragement of a protecting tariff.

To us nothing is plainer than that it is the interest of the true friends of a protecting tariff to repeal every duty which has no protective effect. The whole revenue of the country would then be adjusted upon imports, with a view to the protection of domestic industry. With a reduced revenue, the protection will then be more efficient than it is now; and there will be no danger of a ruinous reaction after the payment of the national debt.

The admonitions of the President are the voice of wisdom. Take off the duties on the necessities and comforts of life, and correct the abuses of the tariff. Adjust the whole revenues of the country on such imported manufactures and produce as compete with our own domestic labor: then will protection be confined to its legitimate objects, the system of protecting duties will be identified with the revenue system of the country, and cannot be shaken.

Most sincerely do we accord with the President in the sentiment, "that our deliberations on this interesting subject should be uninfluenced by those partisan conflicts that are incident to free institutions." "To make this great question, which unhappily so much divides and excites the public mind, subservient to the short-sighted views of faction, must destroy all hope of settling it satisfactorily to the great body of the people, and for the general interest. I cannot, therefore," says he, "on taking leave of the subject, too earnestly for my own feelings or the common good, warn you against the blighting influence of such a course."

It is not too much to say that from faction has the tariff derived most of its bad features; and it is faction only which endangers its good. Its provisions have been arranged too little with a regard to equality, justice, and the public good, and too much with reference to effect on political elections; satisfactory to nobody, injurious to many, and to some, as they allege, fatal. Members of Congress, fearing they should not be able to obtain a tariff at that time, did not think proper to vote against it, lest such an act might have a sinister influence on the election to the Presidency of a political favorite. Some, too, voted for it, believing that in a season of more tranquillity its errors would be corrected, and its defects supplied. Now, men dare not attempt to correct, or even acknowledge, imperfections and errors which they once condemned, lest they should impair its force as a political weapon.

Is this a safe basis on which to rest an essential branch of our domestic policy, involving one or two hundred millions of dollars, and the regular pursuits of many thousands of our citizens? Are these immense interests to be cast upon the waves of party strife, and rise and sink with the success or defeat of a particular candidate for the Presidency? Those who have an agency in producing a result so disastrous will have much to answer for to an injured people. They attempt to put to hazard the whole protecting system upon the doubtful result of an election. They destroy all certainty in this branch of our domestic policy, and fill those who have property embarked in manufactures with anxiety and alarm. Worse than the most desperate gamblers, they put to stake, not their own money, but the property, the pursuits, the means of subsistence, of tens of thousands of their fellow-citizens. They force men engaged in quiet occupations to embark in contests of party strife, as a means of promoting their private interests. They encourage, by theory and practice, a spirit of gaming in all the affairs of society, which will exhibit its deleterious effects, not on the broad theatre of the nation alone, but in States, towns, and corporations; hazarding public and private interests in struggles to gratify personal ambition. They destroy the efficiency of the tariff as a means of retaliating the selfish policy of foreign nations. Perceiving that our Government is actuated by no settled policy, and that its measures are adopted and rescinded with the alternate success of contending parties, instead of being brought to concession by the effect of our counteracting legislation upon their essential interests, they will await, and, perhaps, promote, a change of party, as a certain means of obtaining a change of policy. Our country will thus become powerless in its means of retaliation, if not the scene of foreign intrigue and corruption. Finally, they destroy the respect of the people for the tariff, and lead them to consider it, not as a permanent and essential interest of the country, but merely as a weapon of party warfare, to be shivered and struck from the hand of a political opponent, or consigned to the fate which awaits its advocates in defeat.

It has too often been the fate of good measures, in a republic, to be seized on by aspiring demagogues as a means of accomplishing their selfish purposes. Caring nothing for the public interests, and regarding only their self-aggrandisement, by professions of extraordinary zeal they have been enabled to assume the station of leaders. To maintain that position, and attain the prize of their ambition, they outstrip all the honest and prudent advocates of true policy, and push every popular measure to excess. Borne on the tide of public feeling, before their hypocrisy is discovered, they have sometimes been able to force themselves into the citadel of power. The successful examples of unprincipled ambition in other ages and countries may, in our own, inspire a hope of success by the use of the same means, in men of like habit and fortune.

Nothing can be so fatal to the true and lasting interests of manufactures, or any other essential interest of our country, as the intemperate and hypocritical support of such men; and yet, in the progress of our history, these great interests may justly dread their fatal friendships. Without indulging in any invidious anticipations, we may expect that, as in other countries, so in this, from among such men a leader may appear; with eloquent harangues and artful appeals he may scatter delusions and lead reason captive: he may induce them to think that a high tariff on articles which we cannot, as well as those which we can, produce, and an unrelenting persecution of all who oppose it, constitute the true policy of the republic: and that he alone, placed at the head of Government, can give it practical effect. In his grasp after power, he may seize upon every measure that appeals to the personal interests and sectional feelings of men, and rally around him a party pledged to sustain in its then condition the tariff, or any other measure, though deemed oppressive by many, and imperfect by all. He may denounce prudence and moderation in its support as hostility to the system, and stigmatise as traitors those whom he and his partisans may have studiously excited to violent opposition. He may denounce as hostility to the tariff all opposition to himself, and endeavor to force the community to consider the fate of the protecting policy as identified with his own. When such a leader and such a party shall appear, it will be the duty of wisdom and patriotism, and the interests of all honest men, to resist their machinations.

Do not all manufacturers see what, in such a case, would be the probable result of identifying themselves and their great interests with the ever-varying fortunes of party, the intemperate zeal of faction, and the madness of ambition? Do they not see that they must lose the confidence and support of many honest citizens? In such an alliance, must not their interests fall with the faction to whose merciless care they shall have confided them? And will they place their establishments, their interests, their all, in the hands of political gamblers as a stake?

The history of the past, indeed, assures us that the demagogue will never be without his instruments. These, too, for the benefit of their patron, and hope of future favor at his hands, are ready to convert the dearest interests of their country into footballs of party contention, and hazard the property and pursuits of their fellow-citizens in struggles for power. But it is sincerely hoped that they may never find their way into Congress. Here let us hope that all men will bring and retain an honest and a fearless heart to serve the public, and never so far forego their duty as to become the instruments of unchastened ambition—to rally at his watchword, set at nought the reasonable complaints of any portion of our fellow-citizens, refuse to amend defective laws, cast the essential interests of their country on the waves of party, and sneer at the counsels of age, the admonitions of experience, and the expostulations of patriotism.

But if, unfortunately for the interests of the republic, and for none more so than the interests of home industry, such a leader as we have alluded to should, by the aid of such partisans in Congress, be placed in the Presidential chair, what may the country expect? It may expect every corruption to be nourished, and every abuse to be cherished. It may expect a defective tariff to be made worse. Pledged, as he may be, to maintain it as it is, the country may expect protection to be refused to any interest to which our growth and improvement may require it should be extended. Instead of protection, it may expect taxation. It may expect its exactions to be increased by countless millions, and the moneys to be expended in rewarding followers, purchasing friends, pensioning dependents, and in efforts to buy over States and neighborhoods, by special favors, to the support of his re-election, or the election of a designated successor. It may expect, in the end, that here, as in other countries where ambition rules, taxation will be made to reach every article of food and clothing, lands, houses, fuel, hearths, the light of Heaven itself.

In return for these miseries, it may expect splendid projects and magnificent structures, honored and adorned by the gilded equipages of the rich, with the State Governments annihilated, property concentrated in the hands of a few, and the great mass of the people oppressed, poor, starving, desperate, and rebellious.

These mischiefs may be attempted, but we fear no such disastrous results. To save the tariff from all risks is our earnest desire. This, we are convinced, can only be done by rescuing it from the custody of demagogues and partisans, correcting its errors, amending its imperfections; and appealing to the good sense and justice of the community to give it a generous support. But if the prudent counsels of the chief who has saved his country in war, and is honestly seeking to promote her interests and preserve her institutions in peace, are to be unheeded or decided, and if there are men who are determined not to correct any of the admitted errors of the tariff, to tax unnecessarily high the necessities and comforts of life, and make it a party question, with them rests the responsibility, and on their heads be the consequences. With our venerable President, we will struggle to maintain all that is valuable in the present tariff of protection, and extend its benefits. But should the manufacturers and working men find themselves overwhelmed and ruined by a reaction of public opinion, which shall sweep away as well all that is good as all that is bad in the protecting system, they will inquire who it was that, by pertinaciously adhering to acknowledged error, defending admitted imperfections, insisting on unnecessary exactions, and hazarding all in a struggle for power, brought upon them irretrievable ruin. The counsels of age and experience will then be received with other feelings than derision; and the nostrums of quack politicians, too prejudiced to listen to truth, or too factious to regard it, will be remembered only with abhorrence.

We cannot better conclude than by repeating the warnings of the Chief Magistrate.

"That our deliberations on this interesting subject should be uninfluenced by those partisan conflicts that are incident to free institutions, is the fervent wish of my heart. To make this great question, which, unhappily, so much divides and excites the public mind, subservient to the short-sighted views of faction, must destroy all hope of settling it satisfactorily to the great body of the people, and for the general interest. I cannot, therefore, on taking leave of the subject, too earnestly for my own feelings or the common good, warn you against the blighting consequences of such a course."

DUTIES ON IMPORTED SUGAR.

IN SENATE, February 16, 1831.

MR. DICKERSON made the following report:

The Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill to reduce and fix the duties on sugars imported into the United States, have had the subject under consideration, and beg leave to report:

That, in making up their opinions upon this subject, they have not the aid of any petitions, remonstrances, or documents of any kind, to show the necessity or propriety of reducing the duties on sugars, in accordance with the provisions of the bill submitted to them.

Their attention, however, has been called to a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of the 19th of last month, upon the subject of the cultivation of the sugar cane, and the manufacture and refinement of sugar. In this they find much information, obtained from sources on which great reliance may be placed, showing the necessity of continuing the present duties upon sugars.

The duty of two and a half cents per pound upon brown sugar, when we obtained Louisiana, was evidently imposed for revenue alone; during the late war it was doubled for the purpose of revenue. Under these duties, however, the culture of the sugar cane and the manufacture of sugar grew up to a degree of importance, that well merited the attention of the National Legislature; and in 1816 the duty was fixed at three cents per pound. As this exceeds the duty laid before Louisiana was obtained, by a half cent per pound, it may be considered that the duty has been increased to that amount for the protection and encouragement of one of the most important products of agriculture and manufacture which this country can boast of.

Small as this additional duty was, its effects have been very decided and extensive. It has diverted a large portion of the capital and labor, heretofore less profitably employed in producing rice, cotton, and tobacco, to the production of sugar, thereby relieving, to a certain extent, the cultivators of those articles from the pressure created by over production.

It appears that a capital of about forty-five millions of dollars is invested in establishments for raising the sugar cane, and for manufacturing sugar and molasses, in Louisiana alone. That the produce of these establishments amounted, in the year 1828, to eighty-seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-five hogsheds of sugar, which is nearly two-thirds of all the sugar consumed in the United States. That the produce of the crops of 1830, in Louisiana, is estimated at one hundred thousand hogsheds. And it is further estimated that we have land enough, proper for the cultivation of sugar, to yield a sufficient supply of this article, for the entire consumption of the United States for fifty years to come.

This exhibits the most satisfactory evidence of the great resources of our country, and of the untiring industry and enterprise of our citizens; and it is a circumstance no less gratifying, that, while our establishments for producing sugar have been rapidly increasing, the price of the article has been constantly decreasing, and sugar, which five years ago sold in our markets for ten cents per pound, is now selling for six cents per pound. The competition between the foreign and domestic production has reduced and kept down the price, as well in our own markets as in the markets of the islands from which we make importations; so that, without doubt, the consumer, both here and there, purchases the article at a cheaper rate than he could do if no more sugar was produced in the United States now than was produced in the year 1816.

The price of sugar will continue to fall, if, as many believe, the profit of capital invested in establishments for producing sugar is greater than the capital employed in the production of rice, cotton, and tobacco; for the capital employed in the latter establishments will be transferred to the former, until there shall be an equality of profits among them. Increased production will increase competition in our markets, which must end in a reduction of prices.

The producers of sugar believe, and with good reason, that a reduction of the duties upon foreign sugar would be destructive of the investments which they have been invited to make by the laws of Congress. The benefits which have resulted from the protection of the additional half cent duty upon sugar would be lost, should that protection be withdrawn; and should the duty be reduced to one cent per pound on brown sugar, agreeably to the last section of the bill, it would carry ruin to a large portion of our citizens who have invested their capital in sugar plantations, and it would be attended with the loss of property to the amount of many millions of dollars.

As the production of sugar in the United States is now in a train of successful experiment, the committee think it would be contrary to every principle of sound policy to check its progress by removing the cause of its prosperity. They consider the production of this article, even if confined to Louisiana alone, as one of national importance, and one in which every State in the Union has a deep interest.

All who furnish the capital and labor, the steam engines, mills, kettles, tools, carts, wagons, ploughs, horses, mules, oxen, pork, beef, fish, corn, flour, and other provisions, and all articles of clothing necessary for those engaged in the production of sugar—all these participate in the advantages of this important branch of industry. This renders Louisiana dependent upon the Southern and Western States for a part of her capital, labor, and supplies, and the Middle and Eastern States for a large portion of the residue, and every State, in a greater or less degree, dependent upon Louisiana for an article indispensably necessary to the health and comfort of every individual in the Union.

This mutual dependence, which cannot fail to attach, by the strongest ties, the most southerly member of the confederation to those of the South, the North, and the West, is a consideration of high importance in a political point of view, when we are admonished, by the signs of the times, to strengthen, and not to weaken, the amicable relations among the States.

The transportation of domestic sugar is already an object of great importance to our commerce and navigation. To supply the Middle and Eastern States with this article from New Orleans, requires as much shipping as to obtain it from the West Indies, and affords to the shipper as good a profit in the one case as in the other. But the profits of the trade, if carried on with the West Indies, must be divided between the merchants of the two countries, while, if it is carried on with New Orleans, the whole profit must remain with our own citizens.

The bill provides that the permanent duties upon sugars shall be such as might have been levied by the act of the 4th of July, 1789, that is, three cents per pound upon loaf sugar, and one cent per pound upon brown sugar. This, therefore, in the opinion of the committee, is a bill for raising revenue upon sugar, as much so as it would be if no duties had heretofore been laid upon this article. A bill imposing duties upon articles of importation, whether such duties shall be greater or less than those established by pre-existing laws, is equally a bill for raising revenue, and can only originate in the House of Representatives.

The committee, therefore, direct that the bill referred to them be reported without amendment, and that their chairman, at the proper time, move for its indefinite postponement.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Message from the President of the United States, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate relative to the execution of the act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, passed the 30th March, 1802.

FEBRUARY 22, 1831.

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received your letter of the 15th instant, requesting me "to inform the Senate whether the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers,' passed the 30th March, 1802, have been fully complied with on the part of the United States Government; and, if they have not, that he inform the Senate of the reasons that have induced the Government to decline the enforcement of the said act;" and I now reply to the same.

According to my views of the act referred to, I am not aware of any omission to carry into effect its provisions in relation to trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, so far as their execution depended on the agency confided to the Executive.

The numerous provisions of that act, designed to secure to the Indians the peaceable possession of their lands, may be reduced, substantially, to the following: That citizens of the United States are restrained, under sufficient penalties, from entering upon the lands for the purpose of hunting thereon, or of settling them, or of giving their horses and cattle the benefit of a range upon them, or of travelling through them, without a written permission; and that the President of the United States is authorized to employ the military force of the country to secure the observance of these provisions. The authority to the President, however, is not imperative. The language is, "it shall be lawful for the President to take such measures, and to employ such military force as he may judge necessary, to remove from lands belonging to, or secured by treaty to, any Indian tribe, any citizen who shall make a settlement thereon."

By the 19th section of this act, it is provided that nothing in it "shall be construed to prevent any trade or intercourse with the Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of citizens of the United States, and being within the ordinary jurisdiction of any of the individual States." This provision I have interpreted as being prospective in its operation, and as applicable, not only to Indian tribes which, at the date of its passage, were subject to the jurisdiction of any State, but to such, also, as should thereafter become so. To this construction of its meaning I have endeavored to conform, and have taken no step inconsistent with it. As soon, therefore, as the sovereign power of the State of Georgia was exercised, by an extension of her laws throughout her limits, and I had received information of the same, orders were given to withdraw from the State the troops which had been detailed to prevent intrusion upon the Indian lands within it; and these orders were executed. The reasons which dictated them shall be frankly communicated.

The principle recognised in the section last quoted was not for the first time then avowed. It is conformable to the uniform practice of the Government before the adoption of the constitution, and amounts to a distinct recognition, by Congress, at that early day, of the doctrine that that instrument had not varied the powers of the Federal Government over Indian affairs, from what they were under the articles of confederation. It is not believed that there is a single instance in the legislation of the country in which the Indians have been regarded as possessing political rights, independent of the control and authority of the States within the limits of which they resided. As early as the year 1782, the journals of Congress will show that no claim of such a character was countenanced by that body. In that year, the application of a tribe of Indians residing in South Carolina, to have certain tracts of land which had been reserved for their use in that State, secured to them, free from intrusion, and without the right of alienating them, even with their own consent, was brought to the consideration of Congress by a report from the Secretary of War. The resolution which was adopted on that occasion is as follows:

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the Legislature of South Carolina to take such measures for the satisfaction and security of the said tribes as the said Legislature, in their wisdom, may think fit."

Here is no assertion of the right of Congress, under the articles of confederation, to interfere with the jurisdiction of the States over Indians within their limits; but rather a negation of it. They refused to interfere with the subject, and referred it, under a general recommendation, back to the State, to be disposed of as her wisdom might decide.

If, in addition to this act, and the language of the articles of confederation, any thing further can be wanting to show the early views of the Government on this subject, it will be found in the proclamation issued by Congress in 1783. It contains this language: "The United States, in Congress assembled, have thought proper to issue their proclamation, and they do hereby prohibit and forbid all persons from making settlements on lands inhabited or claimed by Indians, without the limits or jurisdiction of any particular State." And again:

"Resolved, That the preceding measures of Congress, relative to Indian affairs, shall not be construed to affect the territorial claims of any of the States, or their legislative rights within their respective limits."

It was not then pretended that the General Government had the power, in their relations with the Indians, to control or oppose the internal policy of the individual States of this Union; and, if such was the case, under the articles of confederation, the only question on the subject, since, must arise out of some more enlarged power or authority given to the General Government by the present constitution. Does any such exist?

Amongst the enumerated grants of the constitution, that which relates to this subject is expressed in these words: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes." In the interpretation of this power, we ought certainly to be guided by what had been the practice of the Government, and the meaning which had been generally attached to the resolves of the old Congress, if the words used to convey it do not clearly import a different one, as far as it affects the question of jurisdiction in the individual States. The States ought not to be divested of any part of their antecedent jurisdiction, by implication or doubtful construction. Tested by this rule, it seems to me to be unquestionable, that the jurisdiction of the States is left untouched by this clause of the constitution, and that it was designed to give to the General Government complete control over the trade and intercourse of those Indians only who were not within the limits of any State.

From a view of these acts referred to, and the uniform practice of the Government, it is manifest that, until recently, it has never been maintained that the right of jurisdiction by a State over Indians within its territory was subordinate to the power of the Federal Government. That doctrine has not been enforced, nor even asserted, in any of the States of New England where tribes of Indians have resided, and where a few of them yet remain. These tribes have been left to the undisturbed control of the States in which they were found, in conformity with the view which has been taken of the opinions prevailing up to 1789, and the clear interpretation of the act of 1802. In the State of New York, where several tribes have resided, it has been the policy of the Government to avoid entering into quasi treaty engagements with them, barely appointing commissioners occasionally on the part of the United States to facilitate the objects of the State in its negotiations with them.

The Southern States present an exception to this policy. As early as 1784, the settlements within the limits of North Carolina were advanced further to the west than the authority of the State to enforce an obedience of its laws; others were in a similar condition. The necessities, therefore, and not the acknowledged principles of the Government, must have suggested the policy of treating with the Indians in that quarter, as the only practicable mode of conciliating their good will. The United States, at that period, had just emerged from a protracted war for the achievement of their independence. At the moment of its conclusion, many of these tribes, as powerful as they were ferocious in their mode of warfare, remained in arms, desolating our frontier settlements. Under these circumstances, the first treaties, in 1785 and 1790, with the Cherokees, were concluded by the Government of the United States, and were evidently sanctioned as measures of necessity, adapted to the character of the Indians, and indispensable to the peace and security of the Western frontier. But they cannot be understood as changing the political relations of the Indians to the States, or to the Federal Government. To effect this would have required the operation of quite a different principle, and the intervention of a tribunal higher than that of the treaty making power.

To infer from the assent of the Government to this deviation from the practice which had before governed its intercourse with the Indians, and the accidental forbearance of the States to assert their right of jurisdiction over them, that they had surrendered this portion of their sovereignty, and that its assumption now is usurpation, is conceding too much to the necessity which dictated those treaties, and doing violence to the principles of the Government, and the rights of the States, without benefiting, in the least degree, the Indians. The Indians, thus situated, cannot be regarded in any other light than as members of a foreign Government, or of that of the State within whose chartered limits they reside. If in the former, the ordinary legislation of Congress, in relation to them, is not warranted by the constitution, which was established for the benefit of our own, not of a foreign people: if in the latter, then, like other citizens, or people resident within the limits of the States, they are subject to their jurisdiction and control. To maintain a contrary doctrine, and to require the Executive to enforce it by the employment of a military force, would be to place in his hands a power to make war upon the rights of the States, and the liberties of the country—a power which should be placed in the hands of no individual.

If, indeed, the Indians are to be regarded as people possessing rights which they can exercise independently of the States, much error has arisen in the intercourse of the Government with them. Why is it that they have been called upon to assist in our wars, without the privilege of exercising their own discretion? If an independent people, they should, as such, be consulted and advised with; but they have not been. In an order which was issued to me, from the War Department, in September, 1814, this language is employed: "All the friendly Indians should be organized and prepared to co-operate with your other forces. There appears to be some dissatisfaction among the Choctaws; their friendship and services should be secured without delay. The friendly Indians must be fed and paid, and made to fight when and where their services may be required." To an independent and foreign people, this would seem to be assuming, I should suppose, rather too lofty a tone; one which the Government would not have assumed if they had considered them in that light. Again: by the constitution, the power of declaring war belongs exclusively to Congress. We have been often engaged in war with the Indian tribes within our limits; but when have these hostilities been preceded or accompanied by an act of Congress declaring war against the tribe which was the object of them? And was the prosecution of such hostilities an usurpation, in each case, by the Executive which conducted them, of the constitutional power of Congress? It must have been so, I apprehend, if these tribes are to be considered as foreign and independent nations.

The steps taken to prevent intrusion upon Indian lands had their origin with the commencement of our Government, and became the subject of special legislation in 1802, with the reservations which have been mentioned in favor of the jurisdiction of the States. With the exception of South Carolina, who has uniformly regulated the Indians within her limits, without the aid of the General Government, they have been felt within all the States of the South, without being understood to affect their rights, or prevent the exercise of their jurisdiction, whenever they were in a situation to assume and enforce it. Georgia, though materially concerned, has, on this principle, forbore to spread her legislation further than the settlements of her own white citizens, until she has recently perceived, within her limits, a people claiming to be capable of self-government, sitting in legislative council, organizing courts, and administering justice. To disarm such an anomalous invasion of her sovereignty, she has declared her determination to execute her own laws throughout her limits; a step which seems to have been anticipated by the proclamation of 1783, and which is perfectly consistent with the 19th section of the act of 1802. According to the language and reasoning of that section, the tribes to the South and the Southwest are not only "surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States," but are now also "within the ordinary jurisdiction of the individual States." They became so from the moment the laws of the State were extended over them; and the same result follows the similar determination of Alabama and Mississippi. These States have each a right to claim, in behalf of their position, now, on this question, the same respect which is conceded to the other States of the Union.

Towards this race of people, I entertain the kindest feelings; and am not sensible that the views, which I have taken of their true interests, are less favorable to them, than those which oppose their emigration to the west. Years since, I stated to them my belief, that if the States chose to extend their laws over them, it would not be in the power of the Federal Government to prevent it. My opinion remains the same; and I can see no alternative for them, but that of their removal to the west, or a quiet submission to the State laws. If they prefer to remove, the United States agree to defray their expenses, to supply them the means of transportation, and a year's support after they reach their new homes—a provision too liberal and kind to deserve the stamp of injustice. Either course promises them peace and happiness, whilst an obstinate perseverance in the effort to maintain their possessions, independent of State authority, cannot fail to render their condition still more helpless and miserable. Such an effort ought, therefore, to be discontinued by all who sincerely sympathize in the fortunes of this peculiar people, and especially by the political bodies of the Union, as calculated to disturb the harmony of the two Governments, and to endanger the safety of the many blessings which they enable us to enjoy.

As connected with the subject of this inquiry, I beg leave to refer to the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing the order which proceeded from that Department, and a letter from the Governor of Georgia.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, February 21, 1831.

SIR: In reply to your direction, to be informed of the course which has been pursued at this Department to enforce the provisions of the act of March, 1802, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians, I have the honor to state:

During the last year, frequent complaints were made, that persons from Georgia and other States, had entered upon the lands of the Cherokee Indians, and were digging for gold. The prospect of gain from the pursuit had drawn many to the country. Riots had taken place, and serious disturbances were threatened and feared. To prevent them, a detachment of troops were ordered into the Indian country, under and in pursuance of the act of 1802, as will appear by orders to the commanding officer stationed at Fort Mitchell, hereto appended, marked 1, 2, 3.

On the 8th of November last, another order issued, directing the troops to retire from the country of the Cherokee Indians, and to resume their position again at their former encampment.—[See order marked 4.]

Within a day or two after this order was issued, information was officially communicated by the Governor of Georgia, that the Legislature, being in session, had entered upon the consideration of this subject, and that the laws of Georgia would be extended over the Indian country. His letter is annexed, marked A.

The opinion entertained by you being, that the United States cannot rightfully interfere within a State where the laws are extended, any application to place troops within Georgia, on account of the act of 1802, must, for the future, be disregarded.

Very respectfully,

J. H. EATON.

The President of the United States.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, WASHINGTON,

March 20, 1830.

SIR: I transmit to you, herewith annexed, a copy of instructions, dated 16th March, 1830, which I have received from the War Department, concerning the intruders upon the lands of the Cherokees.

You are charged with the execution of the intentions of the Government, as expressed in said instructions; and, taking them for your guidance, you will perform every thing directed therein. It is deemed unnecessary to be more particular in regard to that part of the instructions which relates to the Indians and intruders; but, as it respects the troops, it is desired that two companies of the 4th regiment of infantry should be stationed in the Cherokee nation, in conformity with the letter of the Secretary of War, above alluded to, and herewith annexed, leaving, at Fort Mitchell, the company of artillery, and one company of the 4th regiment of infantry. This is, however, on the presumption that two companies of the 4th regiment of infantry will have arrived in time to admit of the arrangement. You will be pleased to acknowledge the receipt of this letter; and, as often as any thing of importance occurs, you will communicate the same to me, in order that I may lay the same before the Secretary of War.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MACOMB,

Major General, commanding the Army.

Bvt. Brig. Gen. BROOKE,

Or Officer commanding the troops of the United States at Fort Mitchell, Alabama.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Nov. 16, 1830.

SIR: The President of the United States directs that you instruct the commanding officer at Fort Mitchell to remove the intruders from the lands of the Cherokees. The agent, Colonel Montgomery, will furnish him with a list of those who are not to be interfered with. Persons who are entitled to live in the nation, by virtue of any Indian law or regulation, who are married there, will not be interrupted. Those who have permits from the agents, and those who are seated on lands, from which, in pursuance of treaties, the Indians have removed, and which have been valued by commissioners for payment by the Government, he will not interfere with. All others will be notified to remove beyond the lines of the Cherokee Indians; and, after reasonable notice, the commanding officer will proceed to raze their houses and destroy their fences, that the laws of the country may be faithfully administered, intrusion prevented, and quiet preserved.

Having executed this order, he will assume a position at some healthful point, and occupy it with two companies, to prevent intrusions. The most eligible may be somewhere near the dividing ridge which General Coffee has fixed as the boundary to the south between the Creeks and Cherokees. The agent is furnished with a map showing the boundary. In selecting a position, regard must be had to health and good water, and to the object on account of which the troops are sent—the preventing intrusion.

He will issue notice to the Indians living south of this established line by General Coffee, to remove north of it, but will use no violence towards them until he shall report his proceedings to the Department, and obtain further instruction.

Very respectfully,

J. H. EATON.

Major Gen. A. MACOMB.

No. 2.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 17, 1830.

SIR: An order was yesterday directed to you concerning intrusions on the Cherokee lands. It is hoped that your appearance with the troops may impress upon the intruders the necessity of retreating, and thereby save you from a resort to forcible measures. The President would have you practise forbearance, and, by that means, effect peaceably, if it can be done, a removal of the settlers, and only to pursue the order of razing their houses, and destroying their fences, when every thing of peaceable effort has failed. If a course of violence shall be rendered unavoidable, through obstinacy of the settlers, the better course for you will be, to proceed to operate first upon some small and detached settlement, and, having acted, to wait a little while for the information to spread, and the example to become effective. To proceed directly and generally against any numerous and strong settlement, might wake up an excitement, which would, perhaps, operate prejudicially.

It is desirable, therefore, that, in executing the order directed to you, an exercise of prudence, caution, and sound judgment be constantly regarded. Every confidence is reposed in your discretion, that, in performing this unpleasant duty, it will be done in a way to avoid, as much as possible, any strong excitement.

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. EATON.

Major P. WAGER, Fort Mitchell, Alabama.

No. 3.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 17, 1830.

SIR: You will proceed, without delay, to make out a list of those persons within the Cherokee nation who have settled upon lands which the Indians, under treaties made with the United States, have abandoned, and which have been valued by commissioners appointed by the Government. These it is not now contemplated to interrupt, and the commanding officer from Fort Mitchell must be apprized of their names.

You will make a list, too, of those who rightfully may remain in the nation, whether under any legal sanction from yourself, or by the regulations and rules of the Indians. White men having Indian families will not be removed, unless their deportment and character be such, in your opinion, as to render it necessary.

The commanding officer from Fort Mitchell is ordered with a detachment of troops into the Cherokee nation, where he is directed to remain. Soon as you shall be advised of his approach to the southern boundary of the Cherokee nation, you will forward by the express to him the information directed to be given in this letter; also the map which was two days ago sent to you, together with the enclosed order. Very respectfully,

JOHN H. EATON.

To Col. HUGH MONTGOMERY,
Cherokee Agent, &c.

No. 4.

HEAD QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Washington, Nov. 8, 1830.

SIR: The purposes for which the troops were ordered into the Cherokee nation having, in a great measure, been answered, the Secretary of War deems it advisable, upon the approach of winter, that you retire to some position where the troops can be comfortably accommodated, and where they will be in striking distance to meet any contingency that may arise out of our Indian relations, and which cannot at this time be perceived. It is hoped, however, that no circumstance will occur which will render it necessary again to employ the troops among the Cherokees, particularly as the Legislature of Georgia, now in session, will doubtless take the proper and necessary steps to preserve tranquillity along the Indian borders. You will, therefore, with the detachment of the 4th regiment of infantry, retire upon Fort Mitchell; the artillery, with the exception of Captain Boden's company, now at Fort Mitchell, will return to their respective stations, viz: the men belonging to Lieutenant Colonel Fanning's company to Augusta arsenal, Captain Legate's company to Charleston, and Captain Taylor's to Savannah.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

ALEX. MACOMB,

Maj. Gen. commanding the Army.

Brevet Major P. WAGER,

4th regiment of infantry, commanding the troops in the Cherokee nation.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Milledgeville, Oct. 29, 1830.

SIR: By an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed at its last session, all the Cherokee territory, and the persons occupying it, were subjected to the ordinary jurisdiction of the State after the 1st of June then next ensuing. This act has gone into operation. The acknowledgment by the President of the right of the State to pass such an act renders it unnecessary to say any thing in its justification. The object of this letter is to request the President that the United States' troops may be withdrawn from the Indian territory within Georgia. The enforcement of the non-intercourse law, within the limits of the State, is considered inconsistent with the right of jurisdiction which is now exercised by its authorities, and must, if continued, lead to difficulties between the officers of the United States and State Governments, which it is very desirable should be avoided. No doubt is entertained that the object of the President, in ordering the United States' troops into the Cherokee territory, was the preservation of the peace of the Union. The motive is duly appreciated. The Legislature of this State is now in session. The special object of its meeting is the enforcement of the laws of the State within the Cherokee country, and the punishment of intrusion into it by persons searching for gold. Its powers are amply sufficient for that purpose. As it is expected that the law for the punishment of trespassers upon the public lands will go into operation within a few days, the President is therefore requested to withdraw the troops as soon as it can be conveniently done.

Information has been received at this Department that the digging for gold is still carried on in various parts of the Cherokee territory, and that the extent of country containing mines is so great, that it is wholly impossible to prevent it by the use of military force alone. It is said that the Indians are even more extensively employed in taking gold than before the arrival of the troops. This proceeds from their residence within the country, intimate acquaintance with it, and other means of avoiding the operation of the troops. The fear of the whites had restrained them previously.

The writer of the enclosed copy of a communication without signature is known, and is entitled to credit.

The President is assured that, whatever measures may be adopted by the State of Georgia in relation to the Cherokees, the strongest desire will be felt to make them accord with the policy which has been adopted by the present administration of the General Government upon the same subject.

Very respectfully yours, &c.

GEORGE R. GILMER.

To the PRESIDENT of the U. S.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 5, 1814.

SIR: Your letter of August 10th has been received. The avowed objects of the enemy, and the recent outrages of all principles of civilized warfare, warrant a belief and expectation that they will make their devastations as extensive as their means will enable them.

Your most prompt attention and vigorous operations will be required in the lower country. All the friendly Indians should be organized, and prepared to co-operate with your other forces. There appears to be some dissatisfaction among the Choctaws; their friendship and services should be secured without delay. The friendly Indians must be fed and paid, and made to fight when and where their services may be required.

It is desirable that you should repair to New Orleans as soon as your arrangements can be accomplished in the other parts of the district, unless circumstances should render another point more eligible.

I have, &c.

JAMES MONROE.

To Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

REPORT UPON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a resolution instructing that committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the twenty-fifth section of an act, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed on the 4th of September, 1789, report:

That the committee, profoundly impressed with the importance of the matter referred to their consideration, have bestowed upon it that deliberation it so eminently required; and the investigation has resulted in a solemn conviction that the twenty-fifth section of an act of Congress, entitled "An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed on the 14th September, 1789, is unconstitutional, and ought to be repealed.

The reasons that have induced this opinion the committee will now present for the consideration of the House.

The declaration of independence, the treaty of peace with Great Britain, and the articles of confederation, all announce to the world that the States of the confederacy were free, sovereign, and independent States, and that they had a right to make treaties, form alliances, and to do any other acts that any independent sovereignty could do. In the character of sovereign States, the old confederation and the present Federal Government were alike formed and established. The defects of the old confederation, which rendered necessary the existing Federal Government, were its inability to coerce a State to contribute its quota of supplies to the general treasury, and its want of adequate power to manage, conduct, and control our commercial and foreign relations.

It was perceived in the convention that framed the constitution, that a federal judiciary was indispensably necessary, as a co-ordinate department of the contemplated

Government; and the convention, accordingly, by the following clauses of that instrument, created such a department, and invested it with powers therein specified.

ARTICLE III.

SEC. 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such other inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation; which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

"SEC. 2. The judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and the citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

"In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make."

AMENDMENT—ARTICLE XI.

"The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

The twenty-fifth section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, is in these words:

"SECTION XXV.

"A final judgment or decree of any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State, in which a decision in a suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty or statute of, or commission held under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, especially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice or judge or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court; and the proceedings upon the reversal shall, also, be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision, as before provided, may, at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to the final decision of the same, and award execution. But no error shall be assigned as a ground of reversal in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute."

In the above mentioned sections, Congress gives the power of a direct appeal from a State court, to the Supreme Court of the United States; but in the opinions of the committee, the constitution of the United States gives the right of appeal only from such inferior courts, as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. If this opinion be wrong, then has the Supreme Court a supervisory and controlling power over twenty-four sovereign States. Before entering into a particular comparison of the above section of the judicial act of 1789, with the first and second section of the third article of the constitution of the United States, the committee beg leave to make a few preliminary remarks (which it is hoped will not be deemed impertinent to the matter referred) on the peculiar character and structure of our complex system of Government.

The most universally received maxim in the theory of political liberty, since the establishment of American independence, is, that the people alone have the right, either directly or by representative conventions, to make or alter their constitutions or forms of government, and that the Government can do neither. To preserve a Government thus formed, the division and distribution of its powers, into separate departments has also been as universally admitted to be the best security. If the Government, or any department of it, be allowed to change or alter the constitution, the essential and vital principle of theoretical liberty, as established here, with all its securities, must inevitably be destroyed.

This great maxim ought, therefore, to be vindicated, whenever violated. It has never, it is true, been contended that the Supreme Court of the United States, or Congress, or both powers together, can alter the form of the Federal Government; but if the power claimed for the Supreme Court be submitted to, and the twenty-fifth section of the judicial act be continued as a part of the judicial system of the United States, that court will have the power, without any possible check, to encroach upon the other political departments of the Government.

Much difficulty and embarrassment, in discussing questions of political powers and rights, arise from blending and confounding terms usually employed in expressing and describing political laws and judgments. A proper understanding of the distinction between them will always enable us to detect any attempt of the Government, or any department in it, to alter or change the constitution. Political law is made by the people to restrain Government; civil law is made by the Government to restrain individuals. The former is a rule of action for the governing; the latter a rule of action for the governed.

The Supreme Court virtually claims the right, under the constitution, to pronounce political judgments, and asserts the power, under the judicial act, of carrying them into execution, by coercing sovereign States. The committee readily admit that there is great difficulty in distinguishing between political laws and judgments, and civil laws and judgments, in most of the Governments of the world; but confidently believe that it was foreseen and provided for by the framers of the federal constitution, by the division and limitations of power we find there, between the federal and State Governments. None deny that such a division of powers was made by the constitution, between the federal Government and the States, by the grant of specific powers to the former, and the reservation of all ungranted powers to the latter; but a great diversity of opinion has existed as to the power to which resort must be had to determine questions and controversies that might arise between the several departments of our federative system. The question is not a new one. In the great political contest in 1798 and 1800, this very question made a distinction, and marked the line of division between the two parties that then divided the country. The federal party, who were then in power, asserted, that the federal court (which had just then declared and enforced as constitutional the alien and sedition laws,) was the tribunal of last resort established by the constitution, to judge of and determine questions of controversy between the departments of the Federal Government, and between the Federal Government and the States. The republican, or State rights party of that day, on the contrary, denied that the judicial department of the Federal Government, or all the departments of that Government conjointly, were empowered to decide finally and authoritatively, in questions of sovereignty, controversies between a State and the Federal Government, and asserted and insisted that there was no common tribunal established by the constitution for such a purpose, and that, consequently, each party had the right to judge of and determine the extent of its own rights and powers. The avowed political creed of that party was, that the Union was the result of a compact between the people of the several States, in their sovereign and corporate capacities and characters of separate and independent societies or States, and not as one entire people forming one nation. That these were the opinions and principles of the republican party of that day, is abundantly proven by Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and many other able constitutional lawyers.

The committee do not mention the names of these distinguished men for the purpose merely of using their opinions as authority for the principles they advocate, but to establish the fact that the great body of the American people did pass upon, sanction, and adopt these principles, as forming the true theory of our Government, which was manifested by the promotion of these gentlemen to the very stations where these principles were to be tested by action and practice. As it is now a matter of unquestioned history, that Mr. Jefferson penned the memorable resolutions commonly called the Kentucky resolutions, and that Mr. Madison wrote the Virginia report, the committee feel entitled to quote them as authority upon questions of constitutional law.

Kentucky Resolutions, passed November 10th, 1798.

"Resolved, That the several States composing the United States of America, are not united on the principle of unlimited submission to the General Government; but that, by compact, under the style and title of a constitution for the United States, and of amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes, delegated to that Government certain definite powers, reserving, each State to itself, the residuary mass of right to their own self-government; and that whensoever the General Government assumes undelegated powers, its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force; that to this compact each State acceded as a State, and is an integral party; that this Government, created by this compact, was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress."*

The committee beg leave to add the following extract from the same illustrious source:

"That the States of North America, which confederated to establish their independence on the Government of Great Britain, became, on that acquisition, free and independent States, and, as such, authorized to constitute Governments, each for itself, in such form as it thought best.

"They declared, in the second article of their first confederated Government, that 'each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, by this confederacy, expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled.' They afterwards entered into a compact, which is called the Constitution of the United States of America, by which they agreed to unite in a single Government, as to their relations with each other, and with foreign nations, and as to certain other articles particularly specified. They retained, at the same time, each to itself, the other rights of independent government, comprehending, mainly, their domestic interests.

"For the administration of their federal branch, they agreed to appoint, in conjunction, a distinct set of functionaries, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the manner settled in that compact, while to each, severally, and of course, remained its original right of appointing, each for itself, a separate set of functionaries, legislative, executive, and judiciary; also, for administering the domestic branch of their respective Governments.

"These two sets of officers, each independent of the other, constitute thus a whole of Government, for each State separately—the powers ascribed to the one, as specifically made federal, exercised over the whole—the residuary powers, retained for the other, exerciseable exclusively over its particular State—foreign, herein, each to the others, as they were before the original compact."

That this is the true exposition of the powers and authorities of the Federal and State Governments, is manifested from the guarded limitation and definition of the grants of power in the compact itself, and by the contemporary discussions and comments which the constitution underwent, which justified and recommended it, on the ground that the powers not given to Government were withheld from it. But to leave no doubt on the subject, the amendments to the constitution expressly declare, that the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The committee are of opinion that the delegated powers resulting from the compact of Governments to which the States are parties, are limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and are no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact, and that it is incumbent in this, as in every other exercise of power by the federal Government, to prove from the constitution that it grants the particular power exercised; that if the powers granted be valid, it is solely because they are granted; and all other powers not granted, are not valid.

Testing the 25th section of the act aforesaid, by the foregoing principles and expositions, the committee cannot perceive any grant of power in the constitution to warrant the enactment.

That the constitution does not confer power on the federal judiciary over the judicial departments of the States, by any express grant, is certain from the fact that the State judiciaries are not once named in that instrument. On the contrary, it declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish; thus giving power to organize a judicial system capable of exercising every function to which the judicial power of the United States extended, "and intending to create a new judiciary, to exercise the judicial powers of a new Government," unconnected with, and independent of, the State judiciaries.*

It is no more necessary to the harmonious action of the Federal and State Governments, that the federal courts should have power to control the decisions of State courts by appeal, than that the Federal Legislature should have power to control the legislation of the States, or the Federal Executive a State Executive, by a negative. It cannot be, that when a direct negative on the laws of a State was proposed in convention, as part of the federal constitution, and rejected, that it was intended to confer on the federal courts, by implication, a power subjecting their whole legislation, and their judgments and decrees on it, to this negative of the federal courts. It cannot be, that this prostration of the independency of the State judicatories, this overthrow of the State Governments as co-ordinate powers, could be left to any implication of authority.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that the power to enact the 25th section above recited, is not expressed in the constitution of the United States, nor properly an incident to any express power, and necessary to its execution. That, if continued and acquiesced in as construed by the Supreme Court, it raises the decision of the judiciary above the authority of the sovereign parties to the constitution, may be a warrant for the assumption of powers not delegated in the other departments, nor carried by the forms of the constitution before the judicial department, and whose decisions would be equally authoritative and final with the decisions of that department.

However, therefore, it may be admitted or denied, that the judicial department of the Federal Government is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort in relation to the authorities of the other departments of that Government, it can never be authorized so to decide in relation to the right of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial, as well as the other departments, hold their delegated trusts; on any other hypothesis, the delegation of judicial power would annul the power delegating it, and the concurrence of this department in usurped powers might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve.

"The authority of constitutions over Governments, and the sovereignty of the people over constitutions, are truths at all times necessary to be kept in mind,"* and it is matter of regret to the committee, that it should ever have been asserted, that the constitution, on whose face is seen so much labor to enumerate and define the several objects of federal power, could intend to introduce in the lump, in an indirect manner, and by a forced construction, the vast and multiform jurisdiction involved in the section of the law under consideration—a jurisdiction overshadowing the entire field of their legislation and adjudication—a jurisdiction that saps the foundation of the constitution, as a system of limited and specified powers—obliterates the sovereignty of so many republics, renowned for their defiance of tyranny, and whose jealous limitations of power had preserved their liberty, and secured for them a prosperity the wonder and admiration of the world.

Nor are the committee unmindful that, in practice, this disputed power has given rise to painful collisions in the State and Federal authorities, calculated to disturb the harmony of our system, and to weaken that confidence and affection which are due to the respective Governments in the constitutional exercise of all their functions.

The committee will only add one more extract from Mr. Jefferson, which is to be found in a second series of resolutions adopted by the Legislature of Kentucky, the 14th November, 1799:

"That if those who administer the General Government be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by the compact, by a total disregard to the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the State Governments, and the erection upon their ruins of a general consolidated Government will be the inevitable consequence: that the principle and construction contended for by sundry of the State Legislatures, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism, since the discretion of those who administer the Government and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers: that the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction: and that a nullification by those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts done under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

*Mr. Madison.

The committee will now proceed to examine the provisions of the twenty-fifth section, and compare them with the powers of the federal court, as conferred by the constitution of the United States; and then submit for the consideration of the House two judicial decisions of the highest respectability, declaring the said twenty-fifth section unconstitutional.

The whole judicial power of the United States is declared by the constitution to be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish. Can Congress, by legislation, invest State courts with any portion of that power? Did the convention contemplate, in using the term appellate jurisdiction, the right and power of taking an appeal from a State court to the Supreme Court? The answer to these questions must be found in the constitution. The Supreme Court is given original jurisdiction only in two classes of cases, to wit: in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party. The only cases in which a State can be party, are, 1st. where the controversy is between two or more States; and 2d, where the controversy is between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States. In all other cases, before mentioned, says the constitution, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction. What courts have the original jurisdiction in all those cases before mentioned, in the second section of the third article, of which the Supreme Court has only the appellate jurisdiction? Let the constitution answer: in "such inferior courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish." Is a State court an inferior court? The constitution does not say so. If the framers of the constitution had so considered them, and had intended the right and power of taking an appeal from their judgments to the Supreme Court, it was an easy matter, and they, doubtless, would have said so: their omitting to do so, is proof irresistible that the power was not intended to be given. It is unreasonable to believe that they who were so very precise and specific in the enumeration of cases and powers of infinitely less moment, would have left to implication and inference, a power that breaks down all the barriers between the State and Federal Governments.

The constitution not only invests the whole judicial power of the United States in two specified tribunals, but also prescribes and declares the duties, and rights, and tenure of office of the judges who shall constitute them; not one of which is applicable to the courts or judges of State courts. The courts, in the first place, must be such as are established by Congress; the judges must receive their appointments from the President, with the consent of the Senate; they are told to hold their offices during good behavior; their compensation cannot be diminished during their continuance in office; and are made liable to be impeached and removed from office by the Senate of the United States. Such are the courts and judges that the constitution invested with the jurisdiction of all "other cases before mentioned," in the second section of the third article of that instrument, with the exception of two classes of cases over which original jurisdiction is given to the Supreme Court. Not one of all these requisites characterize State courts or judges. The State courts are not established by Congress; the State judges do not receive their appointments from the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; they hold their offices not necessarily during good behavior, but by such tenure as the States shall choose; their compensation may be diminished at the pleasure of the States; and they are not responsible to, or liable to be impeached before, the Senate of the United States.

The committee are aware, that, since the able and unanswerable arguments on the twenty-fifth section in the Supreme Court of Virginia, the advocates of federal power have assumed the position, that the right of appeal is claimed for the federal court, on the ground, that the case arises under the laws, treaties, and constitution of the United States, and not on the ground that the State tribunal is an inferior one, from which a writ of error would lie. The natural result of this will be, that, if the position be true, it will prove too much. If the nature of the case be the only ground of jurisdiction, will it not authorize the Supreme Court to issue a citation or writ of error to a court of England or France, on the pretext that some one of the questions arose under a treaty of the United States? A judicial tribunal of one of those places is not more independent of the federal court than is a State court, if the character of the case be the only criterion or authority for federal jurisdiction. Will it be said that the right of jurisdiction is limited by the power to enforce the mandates of the court? This being admitted, will not vary the result of the present question. The federal courts have the same right to issue a mandamus, prohibition, or process of contempt, to a foreign judge. If the nature of the case can give jurisdiction, as it has, to a State judge, it has also precisely the same power to execute it. If the right existed in the first case, to issue and to execute process, the Supreme Court would virtually be invested with the power of declaring war; if in the latter case, that court will have the power to blot out from the map any State of the Union. If the right to issue a mandatory process to the legislative, executive, and judicial authorities of a State, be admitted to belong to the federal court under the constitution, the correlative obligation on these authorities to obey, and the rightful power to enforce it, are obvious and necessary sequents. The federal court, under these admitted principles, will have the power to prohibit State legislation by writs of injunction; to sequester State treasuries, and to imprison State functionaries, whether governors, judges, or State Legislatures, in a body. Indeed, the power will not stop here; the same reasoning will sustain a power in the federal court to attach and imprison the President and both Houses of Congress. The power by citation or writ of error, to take a case after judgment, from a State court, and to remove it, for final determination, to the supreme federal court, is a much greater outrage on the fundamental principles of theoretical and practical liberty, as established here, than the odious writ of quo warranto, as it was used in England by a tyrannical king, to destroy the rights of corporations. The end and aim, in both cases, were similar: in England, it was to make corporations subservient to the kingly pleasure; here, to make States subservient to federal extravagance and aggrandizement.

The last arguments used by the advocates of federal power is, that the action of the Federal Government will be so crippled by the repeal of the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1789, that its wholesome operations will be arrested. Although the committee will not acknowledge that such would be the necessary consequence, yet it may be admitted for the sake of argument, without changing the result.

The committee believe that it is the imperative duty of Congress to repeal, without delay, any of its acts in contravention of the constitution, be the consequences what they may. If Congress had no power to pass such laws, they are null and void, and ought not to remain on the statute book; if such be really necessary, the power that created the constitution can, and will amend it. Necessity and expedience are the pleas of the tyrant; amendment, the dictate of the constitution. By pursuing the former course, we trample upon the constitution; by following the latter, we go back to the people, the original source of all power.

It has also been urged as a branch of this argument, that the twenty-fifth section is indispensable to that supremacy of the federal court which is required to preserve the peace of the country with foreign Powers, and to render uniform all judgments in treaty cases. The answer to these objections to the repeal of the twenty-fifth section, the committee believe to be full and perfect in the case of Hunter vs. Martin, and prefer presenting it in the language of the able judge who delivered it:

"I have said that this controlling power was not essential to preserve the peace of the nation.* Without going to other considerations or authorities on the subject, it is sufficient to remark that the American people have decided that it is no cause of offence to foreign nations, to have their causes decided, and exclusively and finally decided by the State tribunals. In that amendment to the constitution, by which the jurisdiction of the federal courts is prohibited to suits brought against the States by foreign citizens or subjects, this construction is most undoubted, and has never been complained of.

"Since the adoption of that amendment, the election of jurisdiction has been entirely taken away from foreigners in all suits against the States; and those suits can now be brought in the States' courts in exclusion of every other; and that, too, in cases, in which, from the circumstances of the States themselves being parties, it might, perhaps, be plausibly urged that the Judges of the State courts were not free from bias. I consider that this declaration by the American people, and which has never excited a murmur in foreign nations, has put down the notion now in question. It has settled the question forever, that it is no cause of war to foreign nations, that the State judiciaries should finally decide the causes, elected to be brought therein by their subjects. It has consequently overthrown the only foundation on which the whole superstructure of the twenty-fifth section of the judicial act has been supposed to rest.

"That pretence is the only one on which the power in question could be attempted to be justified. That of rendering uniform all judgments in the case of treaties is still less tenable, and is even not attained by the actual provisions of the judicial act. Under that act, the appeal equally lies to the Supreme Court of the United States, where such uniformity already exists, and is denied where it is wanting.

"If, for example, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided against a treaty, and the Supreme Court of a State decides the same way, there this uniformity already exists, and yet the appeal is allowed. If, on the other hand, the former court decides against a treaty, and the latter in favor of it, this uniformity is wanting, yet the appeal is denied."

The following is the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of Virginia, in the above stated case.

"The court is unanimously of opinion, that the appellate power of the Supreme Court of the United States does not extend to this court, under a sound construction of the constitution of the United States; that so much of the 25th section of the act of Congress, to establish the judicial power of the United States, as extends the appellate judicial power of the Supreme Court to this court, is not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States; and that the writ of error in this case was improvidently allowed under the authority of that act; that the proceedings thereon in the Supreme Court, were coram non judicem in relation to this court, and that obedience to its mandate be declined by this court."

The committee will present one more judicial opinion of a State Court against the powers contended for by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Cobbett,* solemnly and unanimously refused to permit the defendant, who was an alien, to remove a cause in which he was sued by the State in its Supreme Court, into a Circuit Court of the United States, notwithstanding the comprehensiveness of the words of the twelfth section of the judicial act. The court, after deciding, in the most explicit terms, that all power not granted to the Government of the United States, remained with the several States; that the Federal Government was a league or treaty, made by the individual States as one party, and all the States as another; that when two nations differ as to the construction of a league or treaty existing between them, neither has the exclusive right to decide it; and that if one of the States should differ with the United States as to the extent of the grant made to them, there is no common umpire between them but the people, by an amendment of the constitution; went on to declare its own opinion on the subject, and overruled the motion on the ground that the sovereign State of Pennsylvania could not, on account of its dignity, be carried before that court. This was the solemn and unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of one of the most respectable and republican States of the Union.

The decisions of these tribunals, the committee consider of high authority and great weight; the judges who composed them were of exalted character, patriotism, learning, and ability. They had taken the same oath imposed upon the federal judges to support the constitution of the United States, together with the superadded obligation to maintain the constitutions of the States, whose judicial powers were confided to them.

The committee do not pretend to originality in the views and principles of this report; on the contrary, they believe they could not better discharge their duty, or render a more acceptable service to the House, than by presenting the authorities on which it is founded. Believing the section of the act referred to the consideration of the committee to be unconstitutional, they herewith report a bill to repeal the same.

COUNTER REPORT UPON THE JUDICIARY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN. 24.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, instructing them "to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the twenty-fifth section of an act entitled "an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed the 24th September, 1789, having made a report, accompanied by a bill to repeal the same, the minority of that committee, differing in opinion from their associates upon this important question, deem it to be their duty to submit to the House the following report:

The constitution of the United States has conferred upon Congress certain enumerated powers, and expressly authorizes that body "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying these powers into execution." In the construction of this instrument, it has become an axiom, the truth of which cannot be controverted, that "the General Government, though limited as to its objects, is supreme with respect to those objects."

The constitution has also conferred upon the President,

* Hunter vs. Fairfax—4th Munford.

* 3d Dallas, 473.

"by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the power to make treaties.

By the second section of the sixth article of this instrument, it is declared, in emphatic language, that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The constitution having conferred upon Congress the power of legislation over certain objects, and upon the President and Senate the power of making treaties with foreign nations, the next question which naturally presented itself to those who framed it was, in what manner it would be most proper that the constitution itself, and the laws and treaties made under its authority, should be carried into execution. They have decided this question in the following strong and comprehensive language: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." [Article 3, Sec. 2.] This provision is the only one which could have been made in consistency with the character of the Government established by the constitution. It would have been a strange anomaly had that instrument established a judiciary whose powers did not embrace all the laws and all the treaties made under its authority. The symmetry of the system would thus have been destroyed; and, in many cases, Congress would have had to depend exclusively for the execution of their own laws upon the judiciary of the States. This principle would have been at war with the spirit which pervades the whole constitution. It was clearly the intention of its framers to create a Government which should have the power of construing and executing its own laws, without any obstruction from State authority. Accordingly, we find that the judicial power of the United States extends, in express terms, "to all cases," in law and in equity, arising under the constitution, the laws, and the treaties of the United States. This general language comprehends precisely what it ought to comprehend.

If the judicial power of the United States does thus extend to "all cases" arising under the constitution, the laws and treaties of the Union, how could this power be brought into action over such cases without a law of Congress investing the Supreme Court with the original and appellate jurisdiction embraced by the constitution?

It was the imperious duty of Congress to make such a law, and it is equally its duty to continue it: indeed, without it, the judicial power of the United States is limited and restricted to such cases only as arise in the federal courts, and is never brought to bear upon numerous cases, evidently within its range.

When Congress, in the year 1789, legislated upon this subject, they knew that the State courts would often be called upon, in the trial of causes, to give a construction to the constitution, the treaties and laws of the United States. What, then, was to be done? If the decisions of the State courts should be final, the constitution and laws of the Union might be construed to mean one thing in one State, and another thing in another State.

All uniformity in their construction would thus be destroyed. Besides, we might, if this were the case, get into serious conflicts with foreign nations, as a treaty might receive one construction in Pennsylvania, another in Virginia, and a third in New York. Some common and uniform standard of construction was absolutely necessary.

To remedy these and other inconveniences, the first Congress of the United States, composed, in a considerable proportion, of the framers of the constitution, passed the 25th section of the judicial act of the 24th September, 1789. It is in the following words:

"Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That a final judgment or decree in any suit, in the highest court of law or equity of a State, in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party under such clause of the said constitution, treaty, statute, or commission, may be re-examined and reversed, or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice, or judge, or chancellor, of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same regulations; and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court; and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court, instead of remanding the cause for a final decision, as before provided, may, at their discretion, if the cause shall have been once remanded before, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution. But no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal, in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the beforementioned questions of validity, or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities, in dispute."

This section embraces three classes of cases. The first, those in which a State court should decide a law or treaty of the United States to be void, either because it violated the constitution of the United States, or for any other reason. Ought there not in such cases to be an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States? Without such an appeal, the General Government might be obliged to behold its own laws, and its solemn treaties annulled by the Judiciary of every State in the Union, without the power of redress.

The second class of cases is of a different character. It embraces those causes in which the validity of State laws is contested, upon the principle that they violate the constitution, the laws, or the treaties of the United States, and have, therefore, been enacted in opposition to the authority of the "supreme law of the land." Cases of this description have been of frequent occurrence. It has often been drawn into question before the State courts, whether State laws did or did not violate the constitution of the United States. Is it not then essential to the preservation of the General Government, that the Supreme Court of the United States should possess the power of reviewing the judgments of State courts in all cases wherein they have established the validity of a State law, in opposition to the constitution and laws of the United States?

The third class differs essentially from each of the two first. In the cases embraced by it, neither the validity of acts of Congress, nor of treaties, nor of State laws, is called in question. This clause of the 25th section merely confers upon the Supreme Court the appellate jurisdiction of construing the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, when their protection has been invoked by parties to suits before the State courts, and has been denied by their decision. Without the exercise of this power, in cases originating in the State courts, the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, would be left to be finally construed and executed by a judicial power, over which Congress has no control.

This section does not interfere, either directly or indirectly, with the independence of the State courts, in finally deciding all cases arising exclusively under their own constitution and laws. It leaves them in the enjoyment of every power which they possessed before the adoption of the federal constitution. It merely declares, that, as that constitution established a new form of Government, and consequently gave to the State courts the power of construing, in certain cases, the constitution, the laws, and the treaties of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States should, to this limited extent, but not beyond it, possess the power of reviewing their judgments. The section itself declares that no other error shall be assigned or regarded as a ground of reversal, in any such case as aforesaid, than such as appears on the face of the record, and immediately respects the before mentioned questions of validity or construction of the said constitution, treaties, statutes, commissions, or authorities in dispute.

The minority of the committee will now proceed to advance, in a more distinct form, a few of the reasons why, in their opinion, the 25th section of this act ought not to be repealed.

And, in the first place, it ought to be the chief object of all Governments to protect individual rights. In almost every case, involving a question before a State court under this section of the judiciary act, the constitution, laws, or treaties, of the United States are interposed for the protection of individuals. Does a citizen invoke the protection of an act of Congress upon a trial before a State court, which decides that act to be unconstitutional and void, and renders judgment against him? this section secures his right of appeal from such a decision to the Supreme Court of the United States.

When a citizen, in a suit before a State court, contends that a State law, by which he is assailed, is a violation of the constitution of the United States, and therefore void, (if his plea should be overruled,) he may bring this question before the Supreme Court of the United States.

In like manner, when an individual claims any right before a State court under the constitution or laws of the United States, and the decision is against his claim, he may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

If this section were repealed, all these important individual rights would be forfeited.

The history of our country abundantly proves that individual States are liable to high excitements and strong prejudices. The judges of these States would be more or less than men if they did not participate in the feelings of the community by which they are surrounded. Under the influence of these excitements, individuals, whose rights happen to clash with the prevailing feeling of the State, would have but a slender hope of obtaining justice before a State tribunal. There would be the power and the influence of the State sovereignty on the one side, and an individual who had made himself obnoxious to popular odium on the other. In such cases, ought the liberty or the property of a citizen, so far as he claims the same under the constitution or laws of the United States, to be decided before a State court, without an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on whom the construction of this very constitution and these laws has been conferred, in all cases, by the constitution?

The Supreme Court, considering the elevated character of its Judges, and that they reside in parts of the Union remote from each other, can never be liable to local excitements and local prejudices. To that tribunal our citizens can appeal with safety and with confidence, (as long as the 25th section of the judicial act shall remain upon the statute book) whenever they consider that their rights, under the constitution and laws of the United States, have been violated by a State court. Besides, should this section be repealed, it would produce a denial of equal justice to parties drawing in question the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States. In civil actions, the plaintiff might then bring his action in a federal or State court, as he pleased, and as he thought he should be most likely to succeed; whilst the defendant would have no option, but must abide the consequences without the power of removing the cause from a State into a federal court, except in the single case of his being sued out of the district in which he resides; and this, although he might have a conclusive defence under the constitution and laws of the United States.

Another reason for preserving this section is, that, without it, there would be no uniformity in the construction and administration of the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. If the courts of twenty-four distinct, sovereign States, each possess the power, in the last resort, of deciding upon the constitution and laws of the United States, their construction may be different in every State of the Union. That act of Congress which conforms to the constitution of the United States, and is valid, in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Georgia, may be a direct violation of the provisions of that instrument, and be void, in the judgment of the Supreme Court of South Carolina. A State law in Virginia might in this manner be declared constitutional, whilst the same law, if passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, would be void. Nay, what would be still more absurd, a law or treaty of the United States with a foreign nation, admitted to be constitutionally made, might secure rights to the citizens of one State, which would be denied to those of another. Although the same constitution and laws govern the Union, yet the rights acquired under them would vary with every degree of latitude. Surely the framers of the constitution would have left their work incomplete, had they established no common tribunal to decide its own construction, and that of the laws and treaties made under its authority. They are not liable to this charge, because they have given express power to the Judiciary of the Union over "all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

The first Congress of the United States have, to a considerable extent, carried this power into execution by the passage of the judicial act, and it contains no provision more important than the 25th section.

This section ought not to be repealed, because, in the opinion of the minority of the committee on the judiciary, its repeal would seriously endanger the existence of this Union. The chief evil which existed under the old confederation, and which gave birth to the present constitution, was, that the General Government could not act directly upon the people, but only by requisition upon sovereign States. The consequence was, that the States either obeyed or disobeyed these requisitions, as they thought proper. The present constitution was intended to enable the Government of the United States to act immediately upon the people of the States, and to carry its own laws into full execution, by virtue of its own authority. If this section were repealed, the General Government would be deprived of the power, by means of its own judiciary, to give effect either to the constitution which called it into existence, or to the laws and treaties made under its authority. It would be compelled to submit, in many important cases, to the decisions of State courts; and thus the very evil which the present constitution was intended to prevent would be entailed upon the people. The judiciary of the States might refuse to carry into effect the laws of the United States; and without that appeal to the Supreme Court which the 25th section authorizes, these laws would thus be entirely annulled, and could not be executed without a resort to force.

This position may be illustrated by a few striking examples. Suppose the Legislature of one of the States, believing the tariff laws to be unconstitutional, should determine that they ought not to be executed within its limits. They accordingly pass a law, imposing the severest penalties upon the collector and other custom-house officers of the United States within their territory, if they should collect the duties on the importation of foreign merchandise. The collector proceeds to discharge the duties of his office under the laws of the United States, and he is condemned and punished before a State court for violating this State law. Repeal this section, and the decision of the State court would be final and conclusive; and any State could thus nullify any act of Congress which she deemed to be unconstitutional.

The Executive of one of the States, in a message to the Legislature, has declared it to be his opinion, that the land belonging to the United States within her territory is now the property of the State, by virtue of her sovereign authority. Should the Legislature be of the same opinion, and pass a law for the punishment of the land officers of the United States who should sell any of the public lands within her limits, this transfer of property might be virtually accomplished by the repeal of the 25th section of the judicial act. Our land officers might then be severely punished, and thus prohibited by the courts of that State from performing their duty under the laws of the Union, without the possibility of redress in any constitutional or legal form. In this manner, the title of the United States to a vast domain, which has cost the nation many millions, and which justly belongs to the people of the several States, would be defeated or greatly impaired.

Another illustration might be introduced. Suppose the Legislature of Pennsylvania, being of opinion that the charter of the Bank of the United States is unconstitutional, were to declare it to be a nuisance, and inflict penalties upon all its officers for making discounts or receiving deposits. Should the courts of that State carry such a law into effect, without the 25th section there would be no appeal from their decision; and the Legislature and courts of a single State might thus prostrate an institution established under the constitution and laws of the United States.

In all such cases, redress can now be peaceably obtained in the ordinary administration of justice. A writ of error issues from the Supreme Court, which finally decides the question whether the act of Congress was constitutional or not; and if they determine in the affirmative, the judgment of the State court is reversed. The laws are thus substituted instead of arms, and the States kept within their proper orbits by the judicial authority. But if no such appeal existed, then, upon the occurrence of cases of this character, the General Government would be compelled to determine whether the Union should be dissolved, or whether there should be a recurrence to force—an awful alternative, which we trust may never be presented. We will not attempt further to portray the evils which might result from the abandonment of the present judicial system. They will strike every reflecting mind.

It has of late years been contended, that this section of the judicial act was unconstitutional, and that Congress do not possess the power of investing the Supreme Court with appellate jurisdiction in any case which has been finally decided in the courts of the States. It has also been contended, that, even if they do possess this power, it does not extend to cases in which a State is a party. On this branch of the question, we would refer the House to the very able and conclusive argument of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of Martin vs. Hunter's lessee, (1st Wheaton, 304,) and Cohens vs. the State of Virginia, (6 Wheaton, 264,) by which the affirmative of these propositions is clearly established. It may be proper, however, that we should make a few observations upon this part of the question. Those who have argued in favor of these positions, assert that the general words of the constitution, extending the judicial power of the Union "to all cases, in law and equity," arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, ought, by construction, to be restricted to such cases, in law and equity, as may originate in the courts of the Union. They would thus establish a limitation at war with the letter, and, in our opinion, equally at war with the spirit of the instrument. Had such been the intention of the framers of the constitution, they well knew in what language to express that intention. Had it been their purpose to restrict the meaning of the general language which they had used in the first clause of the section, they could have done so with much propriety in the second. This clause, after providing "that, in all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction," proceeds to declare "that, in all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the Congress shall make." On the supposition contended for, it is wholly unaccountable that the framers of the constitution did not limit the natural effect of the words used in the first clause, by making the second to read "that, in all the other cases before mentioned," arising in the inferior courts of the United States, "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction." But no such restriction exists; and, from the fair import of the words used in both clauses, the Supreme Court possess the power of finally deciding "all cases, in law and equity," arising under the constitution, the laws, and the treaties of the United States, no matter whether they may have originated in a federal or in a State court, and no matter whether States or individuals be the parties.

But it is not our intention to enter into a protracted constitutional argument upon the present occasion, because this question has long since been put at rest, if any constitutional question can ever be considered as settled in this country. The Federalist, which is now considered a text-book in regard to the construction of the constitution, and deservedly so, as well from the great merit of the work, as the high character of its authors, is clear and explicit on this subject. After reasoning upon it at some length, the author of the 83d number of that production arrives at the following conclusion: "To confine, therefore, the general expressions which gave appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court to appeals from the subordinate federal courts, instead of allowing their extension to the State courts, would be to abridge the latitude of the terms, in subversion of the intent, contrary to every sound rule of interpretation."

The Federalist, it will be recollected, was written between the formation of the constitution and its adoption by the States. Immediately after its adoption, Congress, by passing the 25th section of the judicial act, now sought to be repealed, fully confirmed this construction. This appellate jurisdiction has ever since been exercised by the Supreme Court in a great variety of cases; and we are not aware that the constitutionality of its exercise has ever been questioned by the decision of any State court, except in a single instance, which did not occur until the year 1815. And even in that case, (Hunter vs. Fairfax,) the judgment of the Supreme Court was carried into effect according to the existing law, without endangering the peace of the country.

The last topic to which we would advert is, the claim which has been set up to exempt the judgments obtained by the States of this Union, before their own courts, in civil and criminal suits, prosecuted in their name, from being reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error. Much stress has been laid by those who sustain this claim, upon the general proposition that a sovereign independent State cannot be sued, except by its own consent. But does this proposition apply, in its extent, to the States of this Union? That is the question for discussion.

We have in this country an authority much higher than that of sovereign States. It is the authority of the sovereign people of each State. In their State conventions they ratified the constitution of the United States; and so far as that constitution has deprived the States of any of the attributes of sovereignty, they are bound by it, because such was the will of the people. The constitution, thus called into existence by the will of the people of the several States, has declared itself, and the laws and treaties which should emanate from its authority, to be "the supreme law of the land;" and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Why, then, should a State, who has obtained a judgment in her own courts against an individual, in violation of this "supreme law of the land," be protected from having her judgment reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States? Is there any reason, either in the constitution or in natural justice, why judgments obtained by a State in her own courts should be held sacred, notwithstanding they violated the constitution and laws of the Union, which would not apply, at least with equal force, in favor of individual plaintiffs? The constitution subjects to the review of the Supreme Court all cases in law or equity arising under itself, or the laws of the Union. It excepts no case bearing this character. Whether the party be a State or an individual, all must alike bow to the sovereign will of the people, expressed in the constitution of the United States.

In suits brought by a State against an individual in her own courts, there is much greater danger of oppression, considering the relative power and influence of the parties, than there would be in controversies between individuals. And are these to be the only cases selected, in which the citizen shall not be permitted to protect himself by the constitution and laws of the Union before the Supreme Court of the United States? Is it not sufficient that, under the constitution, the States cannot be sued as defendants, without adding to this, by a strained and unnatural construction, the additional privilege that the judgments which they may obtain as plaintiffs or prosecutors before their own courts, whether right or wrong, shall in all cases be irreversible?

We will not repeat the considerations which have been already urged to prove, that, unless this provision of the constitution applies to the States, the rights of individuals will be sacrificed, all uniformity of decision abandoned, and each one of the States will have it in her power to set the constitution and laws of the United States at defiance.

The eleventh amendment to the constitution of the United States interferes in no respect with the principles for which we have contended. It is in these words:

"The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit, in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, has given so clear, and, in our opinion, so correct an exposition of the true construction of the amendment, that we shall, in conclusion, present to the House a few extracts from that opinion, instead of any argument of our own. He says that "the first impression made on the mind by this amendment is, that it was intended for those cases, and for those only, in which some demand against a State is made by an individual in the courts of the Union. If we consider the causes to which it is to be traced, we are conducted to the same conclusion. A general interest might well be felt, in leaving to a State the full power of consulting its convenience in the adjustment of its debts, or of other claims upon it; but no interest could be felt in so changing the relation between the whole and its parts, as to strip the Government of the means of protecting, by the instrumentality of its courts, the constitution and laws from active violation. The words of the amendment appear to the court to justify and require this construction.

"To commence a suit, is to demand something by the institution of process in a court of justice; and to prosecute the suit, is, according to the common acceptance of language, to continue that demand. By a suit commenced by an individual against a State, we should understand a process sued out by that individual against the State, for the purpose of establishing some claim against it by the judgment of a court; and the prosecution of that suit is its continuance. Whatever may be the stages of its progress, the actor is still the same. Suits had been commenced in the Supreme Court against some of the States before the amendment was introduced into Congress, and others might be commenced before it should be adopted by the State Legislatures, and might be depending at the time of its adoption. The object of the amendment was not only to prevent the commencement of future suits, but to arrest the prosecution of those which might be commenced when this article should form a part of the constitution. It therefore embraces both objects; and its meaning is, that the judicial power shall not be construed to extend to any suit which may be commenced, or which, if already commenced, may be prosecuted against a State, by the citizens of another State. If a suit, brought in one court, and carried by legal process to a supervising court, be a continuation of the same suit, then this suit is not commenced nor prosecuted against a State. It is clearly, in its commencement, the suit of a State against an individual, which suit is transferred to this court, not for the purpose of asserting any claim against the State, but for the purpose of asserting a constitutional defence against a claim made by a State.

"Under the judiciary act, the effect of a writ of error is simply to bring the record into court, and submit the judgment of the inferior tribunal to re-examination. It does not, in any manner, act upon the parties; it acts only on the record. It removes the record into the supervising tribunal. Where, then, a State obtains a judgment against an individual, and the court rendering such judgment overrules a defence set up under the constitution, or laws of the United States, the transfer of this record into the Supreme Court, for the sole purpose of inquiring whether the judgment violates the constitution or laws of the United States, can, with no propriety, we think, be denominated a suit commenced or prosecuted against the State, whose judgment is so far re-examined. Nothing is demanded from the State. No claim against it, of any description, is asserted or prosecuted. The party is not to be restored to the possession of any thing. Essentially, it is an appeal on a single point; and the defendant who appeals from a judgment rendered against him, is never said to commence or prosecute a suit against the plaintiff, who has obtained the judgment. The writ of error is given rather than an appeal, because it is the more usual mode of removing suits at common law; and because, perhaps, it is more technically proper, where a single point of law, and not the whole case, is to be re-examined. But an appeal might be given, and might be so regulated, as to effect every purpose of a writ of error. The mode of removal is form, not substance. Whether it be by writ of error or appeal, no claim is asserted, no demand is made by the original defendant; he only asserts the constitutional right to have his defence examined by that tribunal whose province it is to construe the constitution and laws of the Union.

"The only part of the proceeding which is in any manner personal, is the citation. And what is the citation? It is simply notice to the opposite party that the record is transferred into another court, where he may appear, or decline to appear, as his judgment or inclination may determine. As the party who has obtained a judgment is out of court, and may, therefore, not know that his cause is removed, common justice requires that notice of the fact should be given him; but this notice is not a suit, nor has it the effect of process. If the party does not choose to appear, he cannot be brought into court, nor is his failure to appear considered as a default. Judgment cannot be given against him for his non-appearance; but the judgment is to be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed, in like manner as if the party had appeared and argued his cause.

"The point of view in which this writ of error, with its citation, has been considered uniformly in the courts of the Union, has been well illustrated by a reference to the course of this court in suits instituted by the United States. The universally received opinion is, that no suit can be commenced or prosecuted against the United States; that the judiciary act does not authorize such suits; yet writs of error, accompanied with citations, have uniformly issued for the removal of judgments in favor of the United States into a superior court, where they have, like those in favor of an individual, been re-examined, and affirmed or reversed. It has never been suggested that such writ of error was a suit against the United States, and therefore not within the jurisdiction of the appellate court.

"It is, then, the opinion of the court, that the defendant who removes a judgment rendered against him by a State court into this court, for the purpose of re-examining the question whether that judgment be in violation of the constitution or laws of the United States, does not commence or prosecute a suit against the State, whatever may be its opinion, where the effect of the writ may be to restore the party to the possession of a thing which he demands."

All which is respectfully submitted.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS FUNDS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 28, 1831.

Mr. POLK, from the select committee to which was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the "distribution of the surplus funds which may at any time remain in the Treasury after the national debt shall have been paid, among the States, in proportion to the number of their representatives, to be applied by them to objects of internal improvement," have had the subject under consideration, and submit the following report:

The proposition to distribute the surplus revenue among the States for purposes of internal improvement, submitted by the Executive to the consideration of Congress, is so intimately connected with the whole subject of internal improvement, in whatever form, or with whatever modifications, power over the subject has been heretofore attempted to be exercised by the Federal Government, that a comparative view of the whole subject, as well of the objections to each mode as heretofore attempted to be practised on, as to the plan proposed, and of the advantages of each, is believed to fall within the scope of the appropriate duties of the committee, and is indispensable to a full development of the reasons which have induced them to come to the conclusions at which they have arrived.

They propose, therefore, as briefly as they can, to examine these various modes, as well in regard to their constitutionality as to their expediency, for the purpose of being enabled to present more distinctly and clearly the views which they entertain upon the particular proposition submitted by the President, and referred to their consideration by the House.

Before they do so, however, it may not be improper to state, that they fully concur with the President in recommending, for the present, "a rigid application of that portion of the public funds which might otherwise be applied to different objects, to that highest of all our obligations, the payment of the public debt;" and that, until the debt shall be finally extinguished, no money should be appropriated from the Treasury, to be applied either directly by the United States to objects of internal improvement, or to be distributed among the States, to be applied by them to such objects.

It may be proper to state, also, that, when the debt shall have been paid off, they are of opinion that the taxes should be either wholly repealed or greatly reduced upon many articles, especially upon such as are not produced in the United States, or, if produced, but to a limited extent; and upon such as may be considered necessities of life, consumed by the poor as well as by the rich, and the duties on which impose onerous burthens on all classes.

These preliminary considerations, which the committee have deemed it proper to state in this place, will be more fully noticed in a subsequent part of this report.

Attempts have been made to exercise a power on the part of the Federal Government over objects of internal improvement in three modes:

1st. To construct works of internal improvement within the limits of the States, assuming jurisdiction over the territory which they occupy, with a power to preserve them when constructed, and to punish offences committed on them.

2d. "To appropriate money from the national treasury, in aid of such works when undertaken by State authority, surrendering the claim of jurisdiction;" and,

3d. To aid in the construction of such works by "subscribing to the stock of private associations" or incorporated companies.

On a question so often and so ably discussed as that of the constitutional power of the General Government to construct or aid in the construction of works of internal improvement within the limits of the States, in any of these modes, the committee do not propose to make an extended argument, but simply to state the principles and authorities on which they rest their opinion.

In Mr. Madison's celebrated report of December, 1799, (a production believed to contain the soundest exposition of the true principles of the Federal Government extant,) a rule is laid down, which the committee adopt as a sound one, by which to determine whether a given power is granted by the constitution or not. That rule is this: "Whenever a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power, the first question is, whether the power be expressed in the constitution. If it be, the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be, whether it is properly an incident to an expressed power, and necessary to its execution. If it be, it may be exercised by Congress. If it be not, Congress cannot exercise it." Let, then, the power claimed be tested by this rule. It is not pretended that the power to make roads and canals is to be "found among the powers expressly vested in the Congress." If, then, it is not found among the powers expressed in the constitution, "is it properly an incident to an express power, and necessary to its execution?" Is it an incidental power, without the aid of which any of the express powers cannot be executed. Incidental powers are confined in the constitution to the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the enumerated powers; but under this power it cannot be claimed to do any thing which, in the opinion of Congress, might indirectly tend or remotely lead to such a result. A power, to be incidental, must not be exercised for ends which make it a principal or substantive power, independent of the principal power to which it is an incident. To be an incident to a principal expressed power, "necessary and proper" to the execution of that principal expressed power, it must be "accessorial and subordinate to," and "obviously flow from" that expressed power. It must be a power "appertaining to or following another, as more worthy or principal." It must be "derivative, not primary and independent." By applying these rules of construction to the constitution, the committee came irresistibly to the conclusion, that the incidental power to make roads and canals is not necessary to the execution of any of the granted or express powers; that each of them may be carried into full effect without the aid of such an incident; and that, therefore, if assumed, it must be as a principal or substantive and distinct power of itself, no where to be found among the enumerated powers of the constitution; and that it results, therefore, that no such power exists.

As the Federal Government possesses no other powers than those specifically granted to it by the constitution, and as by the tenth amendment of the constitution, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people," those who affirm the existence of any particular power, whether express or implied, must produce the constitutional authority under which it is claimed, and that authority should be so clear as to leave no reasonable doubt of the fact of its existence, before its exercise can be justified; for the committee lay it down as a sound rule of legislative action, that, in all cases of well founded constitutional doubt, it is safest and wisest for all the functionaries of the Government to abstain from exercising the doubtful power. By acting affirmatively, they would assume the exercise of a doubtful power, which may not exist, and may thereby exceed their authority, and produce an infraction of the constitution. Have the advocates of the particular power in question produced the clear and undoubted constitutional authority under which it is claimed? They all claim it as an incident to some one or other of the enumerated or granted powers, but have not been able to agree among themselves to which of the granted powers it is properly incidental. It is obvious, therefore, that it does not necessarily "appertain to" or "obviously flow from" either of them. They may all be executed and carried fully into effect without its aid. That clause of the constitution, in regard to the "general welfare," has, it is believed, been very generally abandoned, even by the advocates of the broadest construction of the constitution, as containing no enlargement of the specific granted powers. Have those, it is repeated, who maintain the existence of this power, produced the clear and undoubted constitutional authority under which it is claimed? or have they not rather, at the same time that they differ in opinion with each other as regards the sources from which it is to be derived, by implication and forced construction, assumed its exercise without any practicable limitations, and thus made it a principal power, no where to be found in the constitution?

A construction of the constitution so broad as that by which the power in question is defended, tends imperceptibly to a consolidation of all power in a Government intended by its framers, and so declared by the parties to it, to be one of limited and specific powers. "To consolidate the States into one sovereignty," says Mr. Madison, in his report before referred to, "nothing more can be wanted than to supersede their respective sovereignties, in the cases reserved to them, by extending the sovereignty of the United States to all cases of the 'general welfare'; that is to say, to all cases whatever."

"That the obvious tendency and inevitable result of a consolidation of the States into one sovereignty would be to transform the republican system of the United States into a monarchy, is a point which seems to have been sufficiently decided by the general sentiment of America. In almost every instance of discussion relating to the consolidation in question, its certain tendency to pave the way to monarchy seems not to have been contested. The prospect of such a consolidation has formed the only topic of controversy."

To guard, therefore, against the assumption of all powers which encroach upon the reserved sovereignty of the States, and, consequently, tend to consolidation, is the duty of all the true friends of our political system. The assumption and the exercise, by the Federal Government, of constructive and far-fetched incidental powers, are the passes through which, if ever, our liberties may be invaded. In a Government like ours, there is less danger from an open enemy to our system, who unmasks himself, and boldly avows his purpose, than from the gradual, silent, and almost imperceptible encroachments by the Federal Government. Our experience has shown, it is believed, the continually manifested propensity of the departments of the General Government to amplify and strengthen its powers at the expense of the reserved sovereignties of the States. And who can doubt, if all the incidental and constructive powers which have at different times been claimed, (each resting on no worse foundation than the one in question,) had been assumed and exercised, that the whole character of our Government would have been radically changed? And yet each, when considered separately and by itself, did not seem likely to portend such consequences. The committee would not, if they could, excite any unjust odium against the opinions (honestly entertained, they have no doubt,) of those who differ with them in regard to the existence and tendency of the particular power in question; yet they must say that the general course of reasoning by which the power to pass the "alien law," and also the "sedition law," was defended, is substantially of the same character as that employed to sustain the power in question. Let this be illustrated according to the rule which they have adopted as a sound one. There is no express power granted in the constitution authorizing Congress to pass either of those obnoxious laws. It was claimed by its advocates as a power incidental to some of the granted or express powers, "necessary and proper" to carry such express power into execution. The power to pass the "alien law" was claimed as an incident, by a committee of Congress, in a report to the House of Representatives of February 21, 1799, in the following terms: "The right of removing aliens, as an incident to the power of war and peace, according to the theory of the constitution, belongs to the Government of the United States." The power to pass the "sedition law" was claimed by one of the States [Massachusetts,] in her response to the Virginia resolutions, in the following terms: "Whenever, therefore, it becomes necessary to effect any of the objects designated, it is perfectly consonant to all just rules of construction to infer that the usual means and powers, necessary to the attainment of that object, are also granted." Thus, by construction, the constitutional power to pass the "sedition law" was claimed, as the particular power now in question is, as an incidental power, or, what is precisely the same thing, as the "usual means and powers" necessary to the execution of some of the granted powers. It is true that the "sedition law" was a palpable violation of that article of the constitution which provides that "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press;" but that does not change the nature of the argument by which these constructive and incidental powers are claimed; for it was gravely maintained that the "sedition law" was no "abridgment of the freedom of speech or of the press," but was a punishment inflicted for the abuse of this license.

It is no part of the purpose or of the duty of the committee, in this place, to discuss the constitutionality of the "alien and sedition laws." Their object was simply to bring to the notice of the House the general reasoning by which the power to pass them was gravely claimed by their advocates, as illustrative of the danger of departing from the plain sense and intention of the constitution, and resorting to vague constructions and inferences, on which to exercise power. The moment we resort to these loose generalities on which to found powers, they become the chief or principal powers, restrained only by the discretion or accidental will of Congress; render nugatory all the limitations of power in the constitution; and make the Government, in fact, one of unlimited powers.

There is no want of patriotism or attachment to our free institutions among our citizens; but the great misfortune under which the country labors on the subject of internal improvement is, the difficulty of rousing the attention of our people to the great importance of adhering to the written constitution. The usurpation of the power to pass the "alien and sedition laws" shocked the public on points on which they were sensitive—the "liberty of the person," and the "freedom of speech and of the press;" and by one general sentiment it was arrested, and its advocates hurled from power. The cause of the different effects upon public sentiment, produced by the exercise of the power thus usurped and promptly arrested, and the power now claimed to carry on a system of improvement, by means of roads and canals, constructed by the General Government, within the territorial jurisdiction of the States, is not that they are powers of a different genus, for both are derived as incidents, and sustained by the same latitudinous mode of construction; but the difference is, that, in the latter case, the usurpation is sweetened and rendered palatable by addressing itself to the selfish interests of sections; the promises it holds out of individual benefit and national prosperity are so seductive as to blind us to the fatal tendency of the principles by which it is sustained. Large amounts of the people's money are promised to be expended in unequal proportions, in particular sections of country, and its recipients are very naturally reluctant to turn from their real or supposed immediate interests, and to examine the dry and abstract, but at the same time vital, question—does the constitution confer upon the Government of the United States the power to tax the whole people of the Union for our local and sectional advantage? Thus, very many honestly acquiesce in the usurpation of the power, who, if they could examine it apart from the influence of its connexion with their immediate interests, would not only admit the alarming tendency of the principles on which alone it can rest, but come to the conclusion that there was no constitutional warrant for its exercise, and that it was important to the success of the great experiment which we are making for the world, as to the capacity of man for self-government, and the value of written constitutions, that it should not be usurped.

The committee think that such an examination, if the public mind could be roused from the apparent lethargy and false security in which it reposes, and induced to make it, would result in satisfying all disinterested men of all parties, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, in the last communication which he ever made on the subject, (that to Mr. Madison, of December 24th, 1825,) that the "right to construct roads, open canals, and effect other internal improvements within the territory and jurisdictions exclusively belonging to the several States," "has not been given to that branch [the General Government] by the constitutional compact, but remains to each State among its domestic and unalienated powers, exercisable within itself and by its domestic authorities alone;" and also with him to "declare to be most false and unfounded the doctrine, that the compact, in authorizing its federal branch to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States, has given them thereby a power to do whatever they may think or pretend would promote the general welfare, which construction would make that of itself a complete government without limitation of powers; but that the plain sense and obvious meaning were, that they might levy the taxes necessary to provide for the general welfare, by the various acts of power therein specified and delegated to them, and by no others."

It has been urged that this power must exist, and is fairly to be inferred, because of the necessity which existed for the exercise of such a power at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and from the supposed fact that these avenues and highways are indispensable to connect together distant parts, and bind in indissoluble chains the union of the States. If such artificial ligaments were indispensably necessary for the prosperity of the country or the preservation of the Union, it is but reasonable to suppose that the constitution would have contained an express grant of a power conceived to be so important. None such was granted; but, on the contrary, propositions to confer it were more than once expressly refused by the federal convention which framed the constitution. One of these propositions, made in the convention, and which they refused to adopt as a part of the constitution, was, to establish the office of * "Secretary of Domestic Affairs," and to make it his duty to "attend to matters of general police, the state of agriculture and manufactures, the opening of roads and navigations, and the facilitating communications through the United States." The federal convention, then, having the subject expressly before them, failed to insert in the constitution a grant of a power now claimed to be so indispensable; and the inference, therefore, is conclusive, that they intended to confer no such power.

The committee, without attempting to adduce all the arguments or authorities upon the question, come to the conclusion with the President, that the power to construct roads and canals within the States has not been conferred by the constitution; and they are also of opinion, that the power to appropriate money to aid in their construction, although sanctioned to some extent by usage, is of too doubtful a character to justify its exercise without a previous amendment of the constitution. They agree with him, that "the successful operation of the federal system can only be preserved by confining it to the few and simple, but important, objects for which it was designed." They agree with him, too, in the conviction "of the importance of sustaining the State sovereignties, as far as is consistent with the rightful action of the Federal Government, and of preserving the greatest attainable harmony between them;" and "that the political creed which inculcates the pursuit of these great objects as a paramount duty, is the true faith, and one to which we are mainly indebted for the present success of the entire system, and to which we must alone look for its future stability."

The committee having thus arrived at the conclusion that the power to prosecute works of internal improvement, in either of the three modes stated, has not been conferred by the constitution on the Federal Government, or, if conferred, is at least of too doubtful character to justify its exercise, the inquiry next occurs, whether the power to make the proposed distribution of the surplus funds among the States, for purposes of internal improvement, has been conferred by the constitution.

On this point the committee would remark, that the objections stated to the former seem to apply with all their force to the latter. It requires no argument to prove that what the Federal Government does not possess the power to do directly, it cannot do indirectly. The committee do not understand the President, in his several messages, as affirming the existence of the power; but, after stating the insuperable objections to the present plan, he says, "To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation; and, should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and when its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. If experience points out the necessity of an enlargement of these powers, let us apply for it to those for whose benefit it is to be exercised, and not undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions." If, then, it were even matter of doubt, we should rather seek an enlargement of the power in the constitutional mode than assume its exercise without it. The committee are, therefore, of opinion, that the proposed distribution of the surplus, should it hereafter be the policy of the Government to adopt that plan, must be authorized by an amendment of the constitution. On this point, too, the committee are not without authority. The Bonus Bill, rejected by Mr. Madison as unconstitutional, on the 3d of March, 1817, was, in many respects, analogous in its provisions to the proposition now under consideration. That bill appropriated, set apart, and pledged a fixed sum annually, being the Government bank bonus, and the dividends on the Government stock in the Bank of the United States, for purposes of internal improvement. By the provisions of that bill, this annual sum, thus appropriated and set apart, was to be apportioned and divided, as it annually accrued, among the several States, in the ratio of their representation in Congress, to be applied, with the assent of each State, by the Federal Government, to objects of improvement within each State. The proposed plan is to distribute the annual surplus for the same purposes, and in the same ratio, but to be applied by the States. The difference between the two plans consists simply in the agent to be employed in the application of the money. The former required the permission of the State within whose limits the improvement was to be made, to authorize the United States to apply it; the latter proposes to give the money to the States, to be applied by them, each within its own limits. So far as the constitution is supposed to confer the power to do either the one or the other, it is difficult to perceive the difference, and none, in fact, is believed to exist. Assuming that Mr. Madison was right in putting his veto on the Bonus Bill, the committee conceive that they are sustained by the weight of his high authority in denying to the Federal Government the power in question, and that it cannot be safely exercised without a previous amendment of the constitution.

The attention of Mr. Jefferson, too, was at an early period called to the subject, in anticipation of an expected surplus in the Treasury, "not wanted for any existing purpose;" and, in his annual message of December, 1806, he submits to Congress what disposition it might be proper to make of it; and, after suggesting as objects to which it might be beneficially applied, "public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of federal powers," he adds, "I suppose an amendment to the constitution, by consent of the States, necessary, because the objects now recommended are not among those enumerated in the constitution, and to which it permits the public moneys to be applied." To dispose of the surplus, therefore, in any mode, for those objects, he supposed an amendment of the constitution necessary.

If the power to make the proposed distribution be now vested in Congress by the constitution, the inquiry may well be made, how the Government of the United States is to enforce the faithful application of the funds when distributed to the States. A State, for instance, receives her quota in the general dividend, and chooses to put it into her State treasury, and to apply it, not to objects of improvement within her limits, as intended by Congress, but to the support of her own Government. How is she to be forced to do so? She cannot be arraigned at the bar of the Federal Government, and tried and punished for her default. Is her quota for the future to be withheld from her, and given to others? That would be unjust; for a proportion of the federal taxes, from which the surplus has been derived, has been paid by her citizens. How, then, is she to be coerced to apply the money as directed by Congress? A law without a sanction is a dead letter, unless the party upon whom the obligation is imposed shall voluntarily perform it. Without such sanction, on the one hand, the object of the Government of the United States in making the distribution would be dependent on the separate will of each State; and, on the other, it would behave the States to consider how far such sanction, if assumed without a previous amendment of the constitution, with proper limitations and guards, might destroy or weaken the separate and independent sovereignties of the States. These, among other difficulties inseparably connected with the subject, are merely stated by the committee for consideration and reflection, should Congress undertake, without a previous amendment of the constitution, to adjust this most difficult and vexatious question.

If the Government of the United States possess the power, under the constitution, to distribute the common funds of the Union in the manner proposed at all, it must possess it to the most unlimited extent. If Congress may, by means of impost duties and excises, first collect from the people an amount limited only by their discretion, and next divide it out again among the States, without any power or control over the States in its expenditure, each State may, if it chooses, repeal its internal taxes, and apply its dividend to the support of its own State Government. The General Government would thus become the mere agent or tax-gatherer of the States, to collect the State revenue, and, as must happen, in unequal proportions, from the whole people in the Union, to be applied to the support of the State Governments. At the formation of the constitution, was any such agency necessary, or was any such intended to be conferred? In looking to the causes which led to the adoption of the present constitution, it was never heard of as one, that the States had any difficulty, under the articles of confederation, in collecting the necessary revenue for the support of their respective State Governments. That constituted no part of the evil or inconvenience complained of, and intended to be remedied or provided for by the new constitution. Nor did the States intend to confer upon the new Government which they were about to create a power to collect revenue for any such purpose. That was a part of their inherent sovereignty, which they chose to retain; and, had they parted with it, they would have been reduced to a state of dependence on the new Government, wholly subordinate to it, and utterly incompatible with the idea of their reserved sovereignty, which it cannot be seriously urged by any was intended. Yet, give to the Federal Government an unlimited power to collect money by taxes on the people, and an unlimited power to disburse it by distribution among the States, without any power over its application when disbursed, and this will be the practical operation. And if this be the practical operation, it is difficult to conceive what more is wanted to make the Government of the Union one of consolidated power. The power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," was conferred, not for the purpose of raising money, that it might be given back again to the States, either for the purpose of supporting the State Governments, or for any other purpose, but for great national and general purposes, enumerated and limited by the constitution itself. It was granted to the Federal Government, because it was absolutely necessary to the continued existence and successful operation of the new Government itself. It was granted, first, to render the taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, which might be imposed, and their collection, uniform in all the States, and thereby to remedy the evil and inconvenience, not to say injustice, of the countervailing regulations, which, before that time, were frequently resorted to by the States, as against foreign nations, and against each other; and, secondly, to enable the new Government to provide for its own necessary support, and to pay the debts, without being dependent on the tardy and uncertain contribution of the quotas before that time required to be furnished by the States.

The committee have now presented to the House the opinions which they entertain, as well as the reasons and authorities on which those opinions rest, in regard to the question of constitutional power, which they have regarded as the paramount question involved in the examination of the subject referred to them. If the House shall not concur with them in opinion, but shall believe that the power has been conferred upon the Federal Government to engage in a system of internal improvement in either of the three modes first above specified, constituting the present plan, then the following may be stated as some of the objections to the expediency of prosecuting such a system in either of those modes, which, it is believed, would not apply to the plan of distribution of the surplus funds among the States, should the House be of opinion, also, that the power has been conferred, or that it would be expedient hereafter, by a suitable amendment of the constitution, with proper limitations and guards, to confer it.

1st. Owing to an unavoidable difference of opinion, extensively prevailing both in and out of Congress, in regard to the present plan, our past experience has shown that one section of the Union has been found arrayed against another: State has been opposed to State; and, by looking to the votes in Congress upon all appropriations for improvement, in whatever shape proposed, they will be found to be strongly marked by geographical boundaries. The people of different sections of the Union are thus made to regard each other rather as domestic enemies and rivals in interest, than as members of the same common Government, possessing a common interest. Prejudices are engendered, and sectional feelings excited, calculated to produce the most deleterious and fatal effects upon the harmony of our Union, and against which our first venerated Chief Magistrate, drawing upon the fund of his ample experience, and speaking from his extensive observation and intimate practical knowledge of our political condition, warned us.

2d. It tends inevitably to corruption—to what, in common parlance, is understood by political "log-rolling," and to a wasteful and improvident expenditure of the public money. Combinations of sectional and local interests will be formed, strong enough to carry through Congress every proposition for improvement, whether useful or not, whether local or national in its character, and without regard to the general interests of the whole.
